(Supreme Court of California. July 2, 1910.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 621*)—TRANSCRIPT.

Supreme Court rules 2 and 5 (78 Pac. vii, viii) relative to the time for filing a printed transcript of the record have no application, to the filing of a transcript which need not be printed, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a–953c.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 621.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 627*)—TRANSCRIPT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, provides that when an appellant desires to have the record presented other than by a printed record, he shall file with the clerk a certain notice within 10 days after notice of entry of the order. Held, that where an appellant within 10 days after the entry of an order filed a notice of appeal therefrom, but did not give the required notice within 10 days thereafter and no transcript was filed, the appeal would be dismissed, though no formal written notice of the entry of the order was served on appellant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 627.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 628*)—FAILURE TO FILE TRANSCRIPT—DISMISSAL.

The Supreme Court, on a motion to dismiss an appeal for failure to file a transcript within the required time, will grant relief to appellant, where the delay was due to the inadvertence and excusable neglect of his attorney.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2750–2764; Dec. Dig. § 628.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 628*)—FAILURE TO FILE TRANSCRIPT—DISMISSAL.

Where an appellant who has failed to file his transcript in time seeks relief against a motion to dismiss the appeal, he should show that he has been advised by counsel, and that he has reasonable grounds to expect a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2750–2764; Dec. Dig. § 628.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 628*)—DISMISSAL.

On a motion to dismiss an appeal for failure to file a transcript within the required time, appellant offered as an excuse that his attorney elected to have the record prepared under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, and erroneously conceived that it would not be necessary to give the required notice to the clerk within 10 days after entry of the order appealed from, unless notice of the entry of the order had been served on appellant's attorney. It appeared that there was a stipulation on file, signed by the attorney, dismissing the appeal. Appellant declared that he did not authorize it, and the affidavit of the attorney stated that he made the stipulation without his client's consent, as he believed the appeal had been rendered futile because of delay in filing the transcript. Held, that no ground was shown excusing the delay.

In Banc. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. C. Rives, Judge.

Judicial proceedings in the estate of Andrew J. W. Keating, deceased. Motion by respondents to dismiss the appeal of William N. Hamaker from an order refusing to confirm a sale of real estate. Appeal dismissed.

Edward A. Meserve, for appellant. J. Wiseman Macdonald, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The respondents move the court to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that no transcript of the record on appeal has been filed, and that the time allowed therefor has expired.

On January 28, 1910, the superior court made an order refusing to confirm the sale of the real property of the estate theretofore made, and reported to the court for confirmation by certain persons claiming to act as trustees. The order was entered by the clerk on the day on which it was made. On February 5, 1910, Hamaker, the purchaser at said sale, filed a notice of appeal from said order. The notice of motion to dismiss the said appeal was served and filed on April 1, 1910. No transcript of the record on appeal has been filed. The time elapsing between the perfecting of the appeal and the filing of the notice of motion to dismiss the same was 55 days. Rule 2 (78 Pac. vii) of this court requires the printed transcript of the record to be filed within 40 days after the appeal is perfected. Rule 5 (78 Pac. viii) provides that the appeal may be dismissed, if the transcript of the record is not filed within the time prescribed, or before a notice is given of a motion to dismiss the same.

These rules were made prior to the enactment of sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that the transcript required on appeal need not be printed when it is prepared in the method therein prescribed. At the time this motion to dismiss was instituted no rule had been made by this court fixing any limit of time within which, after taking an appeal, the appellant shall file the transcript of the record, in case he proposes to prepare it in the new method and not have it printed. The appellant now declares that he intends to follow this new method and he claims that rule 2 does not apply, and that he is not in default for not filing the transcript within the time mentioned.

The motion is not based on the ground that the appeal has not been prosecuted with reasonable diligence, but solely upon the claim that there has been a failure to file the transcript within the 40 days prescribed by said rule. It is obvious that the rule has no application to the filing of a transcript which need not be printed. This answer to the motion would be sufficient if it appeared that there yet remained an opportunity to the appellant to take advantage of sections 953a, 953b, and 953c by filing a typewritten transcript of the record prepared in the manner therein provided. But an examination of the facts disclosed upon the hearing satisfies us that the appellant has lost the right to follow this proceeding.

Section 953a provides that when the appellant desires to have the record presented in the new method he may file with the clerk of the court below "a notice stating that he desires and intends to appeal, or has appealed therefrom, and requesting that a transcript of the testimony offered or received, and all rulings, instructions, acts, or statements of the court, also all objections or exceptions of counsel, and all matters to which the same relate, be made up and prepared. Said notice must be filed within 10 days after notice of the entry of the judgment, order, or decree. * * * The stenographic reporter shall, within 20 days after said notice has been filed with the clerk, prepare a transcript of the phonographic report of the trial, including therein copies of all writings offered or received in evidence and all other matters required by the notice above referred to to be therein contained, and shall file the same with the clerk. * * * If the judgment, order, or decree appealed from be not included in a judgment roll, the party desiring to appeal shall, on the filing of said notice, specify therein such of the pleadings, papers, records, and files in said cause as he desires to have incorporated in said transcript, in addition to the matters hereinbefore required, and the same shall be included." Section 953b requires the appellant who thus proceeds under section 953a, to file with the notice to the clerk an undertaking, with sureties, to pay to the clerk the costs of preparing such transcript. Section 953c provides that after the transcript is prepared in the manner specified in section 953a, "it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court from which the appeal is taken, within 10 days after the preparation of the record, to transmit to the clerk of the court to which the appeal is taken, the record prepared."

In the present case the order appealed from was not one which required a judgment roll to be made up, and hence a notice to the clerk to have the transcript prepared would be necessary in order to enable him to know what papers were to be included therein. It is admitted that no notice was ever given or filed with the clerk as required by section 953a. Under said section the notice to the clerk must be filed within 10 days "after notice of the entry of the judgment, order, or decree." It appears by the affidavits filed upon the hearing that the appellant was present at the time the order was made and announced in open court, and that a few days thereafter he was in the clerk's office and read the order and stated that he was satisfied with its form. The filing of a notice of appeal therefrom on the 5th of February, 1910, is, of course, conclusive evidence that he knew of said order and of its contents at that time. It is therefore proven by incontrovertible evidence that he had full knowledge of the order at least as early as February 5, 1910. If this fixed the beginning of his time to give the notice to the clerk, then that time had elapsed long before the proceeding to dismiss the appeal was initiated. We think it does fix at least the latest point of time for the beginning of that period, and that by failing to give that notice he has lost his right to proceed with the preparation of the transcript on appeal in that manner. The only course then remaining to him was to have the transcript of the record on appeal printed and filed in the ordinary manner, and within the time prescribed by rule 2, aforesaid. No proceeding to obtain a bill of exceptions has been begun. Hence, the time for filing the transcript has not been extended thereby, as provided by the exception stated in that rule. Relief from the failure to give notice to the clerk, under section 953a, if it can be given at all, must be sought in the lower court. No application for such relief has been made to that court. The failure to file the printed transcript might be excused by this court, if good cause was shown therefor. No sufficient excuse appears. The motion to dismiss the appeal must therefore be granted.

It is suggested by the appellant that the 10 days within which he should file with the clerk a notice to prepare the transcript does not begin to run until the service upon him of a written notice of the entry of the order, that a conclusive admission of notice appearing of record is not sufficient, and that, there having been no service of formal written notice, his time to proceed under section 953a has not expired, and hence, that he is not in default for not filing the transcript. The proposition that a written notice of the entry of the order is necessary to start running the time for filing the notice to the clerk by the appellant is not sustained, as we understand the authorities. This statute has not been construed, but other decisions upon similar statutes establish the rule to be applied. Section 476, Code Civ. Proc., provides that the time to amend or answer a pleading after a demurrer has been sustained thereto runs from the time of service of notice of the decision or order. In Barron v. Deleval, 58 Cal. 96, it was decided that a written notice was not necessary to set this time running, and that where the party is present in court at the time the ruling is made and requests additional time to that given by the statute, these facts are equivalent to notice or to a waiver thereof, and that his time begins to run immediately. This decision has been followed in Mullally v. Benevolent Society, 69 Cal. 559, 11 Pac. 215; Kelleher v. Creciat, 89 Cal. 41, 26 Pac. 619; Waddingham v. Tubbs, 95 Cal. 251, 30 Pac. 527; Wall v. Heald, 95 Cal. 367, 30 Pac. 557; Forni v. Yoell, 99 Cal. 177, 33 Pac. 887, and Mallory v. See, 129 Cal. 359, 61 Pac. 1123. A somewhat different rule was stated in Biagi v. Howes, 66 Cal. 470, 6 Pac. 100. Section 659 as then existing provided that a notice of intention to move for a new trial must be given within 10 days "after notice of the decision of the court." It was held in the case just cited that the notice of the decision of the court must be in writing and that actual notice was not sufficient to set the time running. This decision seems to have been based chiefly on the provision of section 1010, Code Civ. Proc., that notices must be in writing. This decision was in department and it was overruled in California Imp. Co. v. Baroteau, 116 Cal. 139, 47 Pac. 1018. In that case, after referring to the fact that the decision in Biagi v. Howes, supra, had not been followed in the later cases, the court says: "That case, however, seems to have been based upon authority of cases where there was a statutory provision that there must be a written notice of the decision, and upon that ground it was distinguished from the other cases upon the subject in the opinion of the court in Mullally v. Benevolent Society, supra; and if it cannot be so distinguished, it must be held as overruled by the later decisions above cited." It may be observed further that section 941b, which makes new provisions regarding the method of giving a notice of appeal, provides that such notice must be filed "within 60 days after notice of entry of said judgment, order or decree has been served upon the attorneys of record appearing in said cause or proceeding," or not later than six months after entry, if no notice thereof is given. From that language it may be a fair inference that the notice there contemplated is necessarily a notice in writing which may be served in the ordinary manner of serving a writing. In section 953a, the provision departs from the language of 941b, and specifies only that the notice to the clerk must be filed "within 10 days after notice of entry of the judgment, order, or decree." It does not refer to or require the service upon the party of any such notice of the entry. The language is therefore precisely the same in effect as that of the various statutory provisions which were under consideration in the cases which we have cited, in which it is held that actual notice, established by satisfactory evidence of record, will start the statute in motion without the service of a formal written notice.

The principal point urged by the appellant in opposition to the motion to dismiss is that his failure to file the transcript within the prescribed period was due to the inadvertence and excusable neglect of his attorney. There can be no doubt that where such default is made under circumstances which would show good cause for relief, under the decisions on that subject, in applications under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, whether that section be applicable to the Supreme Court or not, this court should grant similar relief, allow the transcript to be filed after the time fixed by the rule, and retain the appeal. But the facts do not bring the case within those rules. The only excuse offered is that the attorney, after filing the notice of appeal, elected to have the record prepared in accordance with section 953a, and thereupon conceived the idea that the notice to be given to the clerk for the preparation of the transcript under that section would not have any effect and would not be mandatory upon the clerk, unless there was on file in his office at the time a duly served notice to the appellant's attorney of the entry of the order appealed from, and that, with this idea in mind, he deferred giving any notice to the clerk and awaited the service of notice to himself of the entry of the order from which the appeal was taken, and of which he already had full knowledge. There is nothing whatever in the language of the statute which furnishes any plausible reason for such idea. A mistake so palpable and groundless should not serve as a ground for relief from the delay it caused. It was itself without excuse. Furthermore, there is on file a stipulation signed by the same attorney on the 23d of March, 1910, which was after the time for filing the printed transcript had expired, and before service of the notice of motion to dismiss, in which he states that the appellant does not desire to prosecute the appeal and agrees that it may be dismissed. The appellant declares that he did not authorize the making of the agreement and that he repudiates it. In the affidavit of said attorney to show excusable neglect he says the stipulation to dismiss was made by him in good faith, without his client's consent, and solely because he then believed that by the delay in filing the transcript the appeal was rendered futile. It is clear therefore that when he filed this stipulation he was aware of his mistake. If he had applied to this court for additional time within which to file the transcript stating the facts, it would no doubt have been granted. Eight days elapsed before the notice of motion to dismiss was given. No application for time was made in the meantime and no reason is offered for failing to apply therefor.

Lastly, if rules similar, to those governing applications for relief under section 473, Code Civ. Proc., are to be applied here, the party asking relief from his default must, at least, show that he has consulted counsel and has been advised by them that in their opinion he has reasonable grounds to expect a reversal of the order appealed from if the appeal were considered on the merits. No assertion of this character is made. The appellant stands contending merely for the technical right.

The appeal is dismissed.

ROBINSON v. ROBINSON. (Sac. 1,817.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 11, 1910.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 183*) — APPEAL — FAILURE TO SERVE AND FILE TRANSCRIPT WITHIN STATUTORY TIME—EXCUSE.

The absolute inability of a wife, appealing from an adverse judgment in her action for divorce, to procure from the husband necessary money to print the transcript, despite her diligence, justifies a refusal to dismiss the appeal for her failure to serve and file the transcript within the time fixed by law, pending her appeal from an order denying her motion to require the husband to furnish additional money to enable her to print the transcript.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

2. DIVORCE (§ 280*)— ORDERS APPEALABLE.

An order denying the motion of a wife, appealing from an adverse judgment in her action for divorce, to require the husband to pay her an additional sum deemed necessary to enable her to print the transcript on appeal, is appealable.

3. DIVORCE (§ 184*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE.

The merits of an appeal from an order denying the motion of a wife, appealing from an adverse judgment in her action for divorce, to require the husband to pay an additional sum to enable her to print the transcript on appeal, are not reviewable on a motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment, on the ground of the failure of the wife to serve and file the transcript within the time fixed by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Dec. Dig. § 184.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 628*)—FILING TRANSCRIPT ON APPEAL—EXCUSE FOR NONCOMPLIANCE.

Good cause for failure to comply with the rule of the court as to the filing of the transcript on appeal is a sufficient answer to a motion to dismiss the appeal, on the ground of such failure.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal taken by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant, in an action brought by plaintiff to obtain a divorce. The ground of the motion is that appellant has failed to serve and file her printed transcript of the record within the time allowed by rule 2 of this court (78 Pac. vii), or at all. The appeal from the judgment was perfected November 17, 1908, but under the rule, by reason of the pendency of a motion for new trial, notice of which was given prior to perfecting the appeal from the judgment, the time for serving and filing the transcript did not begin to run until the disposition of such motion, which occurred on December 10, 1909. Under the rule appellant had 40 days from the last-named date in which to serve and file the transcript, viz., to and including January 19, 1910. The notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was given on February 5, 1910, at which time no transcript had been served or filed, and none has since been served or filed.

The answer of appellant to this motion is the absolute inability on her part thus far to procure the money necessary for the printing of this transcript, despite her diligent effort to obtain the same from the respondent. The case being one in which the wife being without the necessary means, the husband may be called upon to pay such money as is reasonably necessary to present her appeal to this court, the facts shown on this motion to dismiss are such as to warrant us in holding her answer to the motion good. The case is one in which the trial court has decided that the plaintiff must have money from the respondent in order to print her transcript, having allowed her, long prior to the settlement of the bill of exceptions, the sum of $100 for the printing of transcript and points and authorities. It is quite clearly made to appear that the bill of exceptions as subsequently settled is of such length that the amount so allowed is entirely inadequate for the printing of the transcript alone, and that the doing of such printing cannot be obtained, unless she is afforded further aid by respondent. Appellant makes a satisfactory showing of diligence as to her endeavors to secure the money necessary. In January, 1910, she gave notice of a motion to be made in the superior court on February 7, 1910, for an order requiring respondent to pay her the additional sum deemed necessary. The superior court denied her motion to the extent of refusing to award her effectual relief, making only an order for a sum contended to be inadequate, and deferring the payment thereof until the transcript is printed. This order is appealable, and it is not questioned that appellant is in good faith proceeding with an appeal therefrom. It is impossible to determine the merits of the appeal from this order on this motion. We are of the opinion that the appeal from the judgment should not be dismissed, pending the decision or other disposition of the appeal from the order. The ultimate question involved on the appeal from the order is whether the respondent should be required to pay additional money for the purpose of enabling the appellant to present the record required on her appeal from the judgment, and thus have that appeal determined on its merits. Until that question is finally determined her appeal from the judgment should be retained, so that if it be finally determined that respondent must pay the money necessary to enable appellant to present her appeal to this court, she will still have the opportunity of so presenting it. Good cause for failure to comply with the provisions of our rule in regard to the filing of the transcript on appeal is always a sufficient answer to a motion to dismiss the appeal, based on the ground of such failure, and we are of the opinion that it should be held that good cause is sufficiently shown here.

The motion to dismiss the appeal from the judgment is denied.

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 315*)—DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATE—CONSTRUCTION OF DECREE.

A decree of distribution gave testatrix's husband a sum of money for his use during his life, and on his death such sum to certain other persons; and on appeal the decree was modified so as to give him such sum for his use during his life, and on his death the unused portion to the remaindermen. Held, that the husband took a life interest with power to use during his life as much of the principal as he deemed proper for his own use, but that he had no power to dispose of any of the corpus by gift.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 526*)—CONSTRUCTION—OPINIONS.

The Supreme Court, in determining the sense in which a word was used by the Court of Appeal, in a decree may consider the opinion of such court.

3. WILLS (§ 634*)—REMAINDER.

Where testatrix's husband took a fund with the right to use it during his life, with remainder of an unused portion to certain persons, they took, under Civ. Code, §§ 693–695, a vested remainder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1488–1510; Dec. Dig. § 634.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 314*)—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION.

An interest in property created by a will is to be adjudicated and distributed by the decree of distribution, and the fact that there is a future interest in respect to the time of enjoyment is immaterial.

5. Wills (§ 671*)—Creation of "Trust"—Personal Property—Limitations over.

Where testatrix's husband was given the use of a fund for life, with remainder in any unused portion of the fund to certain persons, there was no "trust" created, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1699, providing for the settlement of accounts of the trustee by the probate court.

6. Wills (§ 634*)—Rights of Remaindermen.

On the death of the life tenant it was not necessary that there should be further proceedings in the estate of testatrix to vest in the remaindermen the immediate possession, nor was any proceeding in the estate of the life tenant essential to the rights of the remaindermen to recover the property from those to whom it had been given by the life tenant, without authority and with full notice of his rights.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

L. T. Hatfield and W. T. Phipps, for appellants. George & Hinsdale and C. E. McLaughlin, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment given against them in an action brought by plaintiff to obtain a decree that she is the owner of an undivided one-fourth of certain property, real and personal, possessed by them and of which they claim to be the absolute owners, and to obtain an accounting as to said property and a delivery to her of her share or the reasonable value thereof.

The defendants are Frank J. Mayhew and Charles P. Mayhew, sons, and Mary E. Phipps, daughter of Judge Horace Allen Mayhew, who died March 3, 1907, and of Mary Jane Mayhew, who died August 3, 1903, and W. T. Phipps, husband of said Mary E. Phipps. The plaintiff is the sole surviving child of George H. Mayhew, a deceased son of said Judge Mayhew and Mary Jane Mayhew. The property involved in this action is an undivided one-fourth of practically all the property delivered to Judge Mayhew under a decree of partial distribution in the matter of the estate of said Mary Jane Mayhew. Judge Mayhew claimed on his application for partial distribution that under the will of Mary Jane Mayhew he was entitled to have the property, a legacy of $40,000, distributed to him absolutely. His claim in his behalf was resisted by plaintiff. The superior court having jurisdiction of the estate construed the will as giving him only the use of this money with the right to the custody of the principal, for his life, with remainder over to the other parties named in its decree, and distributed to him the sum of $40,000 of the moneys of said estate "for his use, during his natural life, and on his death said sum to Chas. P. Mayhew, Frank J. Mayhew, the sons, to Mary E. Phipps, the daughter, and to Florence A. Hardy, the granddaughter of said deceased, in equal shares, each one-fourth thereof," and directed the executors to pay said $40,000 to him "for his use for the term of his natural life." Appeals were taken by both parties, and the District Court of Appeal, concluding that the will contemplated that the legatee might use the principal sum according to his discretion for his "comfort or pleasure"—even to the extent of using it all, modified the decree by inserting the words "the unused portion of" before the words "said sum to Chas. P. Mayhew," etc., making the decree read, "for his use, during his natural life, and on his death the unused portion of said sum to Chas. P. Mayhew," etc. Estate of Mayhew, 4 Cal. App. 162, 87 Pac. 417.

The basic theory of plaintiff's case is that under this decree Judge Mayhew took only a life interest, with the power to use during his life as much of the principal as he deemed proper for his own use, and that the other distributees took the remainder, viz., the whole property, subject only to such life interest in Judge Mayhew with such power on his part to use the principal, and that upon his death such distributees became entitled absolutely to the possession of all of said property that had not been so used, that Judge Mayhew had no right or power under such decree to dispose of any of the corpus of such property by gift, and that those so taking from him by gift took no more than he had the right to give, and must account to the distributees therefor. The case made by the complaint is, substantially, that a few months before his death, with the intent to deprive plaintiff of the share in said property that would otherwise come to her upon his death, Judge Mayhew gave practically all of the same to his three surviving children, the other distributees, and that they received the same with the same intent and hold the same. The trial court so found, finding further that the property so received by Mary E. Phipps was of the value of $17,500, that received by Frank J. Mayhew $11,000, and that received by C. P. Mayhew, $10,700. There were also allegations of conspiracy and undue influence on the part of defendants in this matter, but the evidence demonstrates and the trial court found that there was no basis for any such charge, and that the gifts so made by Judge Mayhew were not solicited in any way by any of the defendants, but were absolutely free and voluntary. On October 26, 1906, each of the three children, at the suggestion of Mr. Phipps, executed a writing reciting that in consideration of gifts made by Judge Mayhew he promised and agreed in future to pay to him the sum of $50 per month, so long as he shall live. It very clearly appears from the evidence that all of the parties regarded the transfers by Judge Mayhew as gifts.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

We are satisfied that plaintiff's theory stated above is correct. The decree of partial distribution in Mrs. Mayhew's estate as modified by the District Court of Appeal, is, of course, a conclusive adjudication as to the construction to be given to Mrs. Mayhew's will in this regard, and the rights of the respective parties must be measured solely by that decree. Though entirely immaterial in view of the conclusiveness of this decree, it may be said in passing that we are satisfied that the decree as modified was certainly as favorable to Judge Mayhew as the will warranted. The decree distributed the property to him "for his use, during his natural life, and on his death the unused portion of said sum to" the three children and the grandchild in equal shares. Herein was clearly a distribution to Judge Mayhew of a life estate simply, an estate limited by express terms to his natural life, with the power of disposing of the principal, even to the extent of entirely consuming it, in such ways as might be consistent with his "use" thereof, and a distribution of the remainder to plaintiff and the three children in equal shares. This power of disposition and consumption in the life tenant is to be implied solely from the words "unused portion of" inserted in the decree by the District Court of Appeal; for without this addition the word "use" in the decree, applied as it was to the money distributed, would mean a use without impairment of the principal. The added words, however, necessarily give to the word "use" a different meaning, and make it include not only a mere appropriation of the profits or interest, but also an impairment or consumption by the distributee of a part or even all of the principal, to the extent that he might deem proper in his use of the same. But it appears very clear to us, and our conclusion is fully supported by the language of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, which we have the right to consider in determining the sense in which the word was used by that court, that the "use" authorized was only such personal use as the distributee might desire to make of the money for himself, and that it did not include a disposition of practically the whole thereof either by will or by gift during his life, especially a gift made for the very purpose of excluding one of the remaindermen from participating in what otherwise would have been "unused" by him at the time of his death. If the District Court of Appeal had concluded that such was the effect of the provisions of the will in this regard, it would necessarily have modified the decree of the superior court in accord with the contention of the petitioner, making it one whereby the $40,000 was distributed to him absolutely, and not merely for his life.

As determined by the modified decree the interest given to Judge Mayhew was the kind of interest referred to in 2 Underhill on Wills, at section 689, a life interest by its express terms, with the power of disposing of a part or all of the property itself for a particular purpose only, as for the support and maintenance of the life tenant, with a valid gift over to the other distributees which might be disappointed by the exercise of his power by the life tenant and the application of the principal to the purposes indicated. As to such a life tenant Mr. Underhill says substantially, in another section, he may not use the proceeds of a sale of the property for another purpose, he cannot give them away, nor can he devise the land, and also that those who take what remains unused, do not take by descent, as heirs of the first taker, but as purchasers and remaindermen under the will of the testator (section 687). The author is here speaking of real property, but the rule declared is necessarily applicable to such personal property as money. Given a life interest therein, with the power to use the principal for certain purposes, the life tenant may not use it for any other purpose and may not give it away. The distinction between the case of an intended gift of an absolute title to one with an attempted gift over of simply "what remains unexpended" by the donee at the time of his death, where the gift over is void because in derogation of the absolute fee given the first taker, and the case of a gift of a life estate with a power of disposition for a particular purpose only, with an express gift over of what remains unused for such purpose, is recognized by all the authorities.

The cases supporting our conclusion are numerous, and a few of these may properly be referred to. In Downing's Ex'r v. Johnson, 45 Tenn. 229, the gift by will was to the testator's wife of the whole estate "for and during her natural life, to be by her freely possessed and enjoyed," and "the balance * * * that may be on hand at the death of my wife, I dispose of in the following manner," etc. Personal property was involved. It was held that this created a life estate in the wife, with power to consume such as she may deem proper for her support and maintenance, and a remainder in the second takers. It was said that a court might restrain fraudulent and extravagant waste by the life tenant. In Lewis v. Pitman, 101 Mo. 281, 14 S. W. 52, it was held, personal property being involved, that where an express life estate is created, an added power of disposition does not convert the estate into a fee, and that there was no power to dispose of the property by will. In Burleigh v. Clough, 52 N. H. 267, 13 Am. Rep. 23, the gift was of all the estate to the wife to her use and disposal during her natural life, and what is remaining at her decease, undisposed of by her to others named. It was held that the wife took only a life estate, with power to dispose of such of the property, even to the extent of the whole, as her needs, her comfort, or her gratification should demand, and that the provision as to a gift over created a vested remainder. The question whether she had power to dispose of the property by will was left undecided; the court concluding that her will did not affirmatively show any attempt to execute the power. In Green v. Hewitt, 97 Ill. 113, 37 Am. Rep. 102, a gift of real and personal property to the wife "as long as she remains my widow. At the expiration of that time the whole, or whatever remains, to descend to my daughters" was held to be one to the wife for widowhood only, with a vested remainder in the daughter. In Eubank v. Smiley, 130 Ind. 393, 29 N. E. 919, a gift to the wife of all the husband's property "to do with and dispose of after my decease as she may think best" and at decease of the wife, the real estate to be equally divided among my heirs, was held to give only a life estate in the real estate. Here the wife had conveyed the real estate to a daughter for a nominal consideration, and the deed was held to convey only a life estate. In Gadd v. Stover, 113 Mich. 689, 71 N. W. 1111, the husband's will gave all his property, real and personal, and including a farm, to his wife "to use the same as she may desire and wish for and during her natural life, with full power and authority to grant and convey, in her own name, any part or portion," etc., and gave the property remaining at her death to others. The wife conveyed the farm to a daughter, taking back an agreement for support during her life. It was held that the wife had a life estate only, and that the power of disposition was limited to specific purposes. The court held the conveyance to the daughter ineffectual to defeat the remaindermen, saying, among other things: "It is evident that the intent and purpose of the conveyance made to Mrs. Stover was to subvert the intent of the testator," and that the limitation of good faith will be affixed by the law in determining the effect of the conveyance. In Goudie v. Johnston, 109 Ind. 427, 10 N. E. 296, the gift was to the wife "for her use during her natural lifetime, * * * she to have the control and management of the same, and at her death all of said personal estate remaining * * * shall go to," etc. Personal property only was involved in the case. It was held that the wife took only a life estate, with the power perhaps to consume such as was necessary for her support, but certainly without absolute power of disposition for any other purpose. In Johnson v. Johnson, 51 Ohio St. 446, 38 N. E. 61, the will gave to the wife all property, real and personal, with full power to dispose of the same as she may think proper, but if, at the time of her decease, any of said property shall remain unconsumed, the same was to be equally divided among his brothers and sisters and their children. According to the allegations of the complaint, the wife during her lifetime had given all of the property to the defendant, and the suit was one by the remaindermen for an accounting, etc. The court held that the intention of the testator was to give his wife a life estate only, with power to consume so much thereof during her lifetime as she might deem necessary for her support and maintenance, and to give the property, subject to this estate and use, to his brothers and sisters and their children—that the wife had no power to dispose of the fee by gift during her life or by will at her death—that the brothers and sisters and their children had a vested remainder in so much of the estate as should remain unconsumed at the wife's death, and that one coming into possession of the property with knowledge of the terms upon which it was held by the wife could be held accountable therefor to the remaindermen. See, also, Giles v. Little, 104 U. S. 291, 26 L. Ed. 745; Brant v. Virginia, etc., Co., 93 U. S. 326, 23 L. Ed. 927; Mansfield v. Shelton, 67 Conn. 390, 35 Atl. 271, 52 Am. St. Rep. 285; Chase v. Ladd, 153 Mass. 126, 26 N. E. 429, 25 Am. St. Rep. 614; Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 68, 8 L. Ed. 322; Wager v. Wager, 96 N. Y. 164, 172.

It appears to be settled by the overwhelming weight of authority that the mere fact that the first taker is invested with the power to dispose of or consume the whole of the property for certain purposes does not invest him with the absolute ownership thereof and render the gift over void, where, taking the whole instrument together, it is concluded that the intent was to give only an estate for life, with limited power of disposal or consumption. As expressly indicated in some of the decisions referred to above, the interest of the remainderman expressly designated, in this case Chas. P. Mayhew, Frank J. Mayhew, Mary E. Phipps, and plaintiff, was a vested remainder. Neither the person in whom nor the event upon which it was limited to take effect was in any degree uncertain. Civ. Code, §§ 693 to 695.

The decree of distribution operated to remove all the property from the estate of Mary Jane Mayhew and to distribute to the remaindermen the interest which they were thereby determined to have under the will.

The claim of defendants that distribution can be had only as to those persons who are entitled to immediate possession of the property distributed is not well founded and is not supported by the decision cited, Martinovitch v. Mariscano, 137 Cal. 357, 70 Pac. 459. The court in that case was discussing the question of the power of the court in probate on distribution in regard to one having a judgment lien on the property of an heir, devisee, or legatee, and it was in regard to such a person that it said that distribution can be made to only these persons entitled to receive "immediate possession of the property distributed," meaning simply that the rights of third persons against those entitled to take directly from the deceased as heirs, devisees, or legatees were not within the proper scope of distribution proceedings. Necessarily any interest in property created by a will is to be adjudicated and distributed by decree of distribution, and the fact that it is a future interest in respect to the time of enjoyment is immaterial. There was no trust created by the will of Mary Jane Mayhew, within the meaning of section 1699 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing for the settlement of the accounts of the trustee by the probate court. That section refers exclusively to express trusts created by will. Judge Mayhew was a trustee only in the sense that the duty rested on him, as a life tenant merely, to have due regard for the rights of those in remainder, a duty in the nature of a trust constituting him an implied or quasi trustee for the remaindermen. See Perry on Trusts, § 540; Johnson v. Johnson, supra. There is therefore nothing in the claim that further proceedings were essential in the estate of Mary Jane Mayhew upon the death of Judge Mayhew to vest in the remaindermen the right to immediate possession of such of the property as had not been appropriated by him to an authorized use.

Nor was any proceeding in the estate of Judge Mayhew essential to the right of the remaindermen to recover the property to which they were entitled from those to whom it had been given by him without authority, and who had full notice of the limits of his authority in regard thereto. As we have seen, such remaindermen do not take by descent, as heirs of Judge Mayhew, but as remaindermen under the will of Mary Jane Mayhew. The property constituted no part of his estate. The remaindermen were not restricted to proceedings against his estate for any improper disposition of their property, but could recover the same in the hands of any person who had taken it by gift, and the legal representative of the estate of Judge Mayhew was not a necessary party to such an action.

In view of what we have said, it is clear to us that the complaint stated a good cause of action within the jurisdiction of the superior court of Sacramento county, and that the demurrer thereto was properly overruled. We have carefully examined the complaint with reference to the claim that the trial court in denying a motion to strike out portions thereof, and are entirely satisfied that if there was any error at all in the ruling, it was entirely without prejudice to defendants.

The findings clearly sustain the judgment. It is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support some of these findings. No attack is made in the briefs on finding 1, which is that paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 14, and 18 of the first cause of action set forth in the complaint are true. By these findings are established the death of Mary Jane Mayhew, the proceedings leading to the distribution of the property, the distribution of the same, the delivery of the possession of the property to Judge Mayhew under the modified decree, including in lieu of $6,500 of the legacy of $40,000 principal and $1,863.38 interest thereon, a lot of land in the city of Sacramento, and in lieu of $10,000 thereof, 10 Realty Syndicate investment certificates of the par value of $1,000 each, and $25,363.58 in cash, the death of Judge Mayhew on March 3, 1907, the demand of plaintiff on defendants for an accounting as to such of the property as they had received from Judge Mayhew and the delivery to her of her share and the refusal of defendants, together with the claim on their part that she had no interest therein. Finding 8 is in favor of defendants to the extent that it finds that neither of the defendants "by any act or words, conspired, persuaded, enticed, or induced Horace Allen Mayhew to give * * * to the defendants or either or any of them, any property whatever." But it further finds that for the purpose and with the intent to deprive plaintiff of her share in the money and property elsewhere described in the findings, they received from Judge Mayhew gifts of the same, and hold and claim the same as their own. This property is described in findings 12, 13, 16, and 17, by which it is found that for the purpose of depriving plaintiff of her share, Judge Mayhew gave to Mrs. Phipps, Charles P. Mayhew, and Frank J. Mayhew property received by him under such decree, as follows: To Mary E. Phipps, the $6,500 lot of land in Sacramento, nine of the Realty Syndicate certificates valued at $9,000 and $2,000 in cash; to Charles P. Mayhew certain notes and mortgages and money and property amounting to a total value of $10,700; to Frank J. Mayhew certain notes and mortgages, money and property, aggregating in value $11,000.

It is claimed that these findings are not sustained by the evidence in that there is no evidence to show that the property so received by the respondents was property received by Judge Mayhew under the decree of distribution. It is not claimed by the defendants that the evidence is insufficient to support the conclusion that property of the kind and to the value specified was given by Judge Mayhew to them. In addition to the fact that the evidence is sufficient to support a conclusion that nearly all of the property given to defendants by Judge Mayhew was clearly identified as property received by him under the decree, a careful examination of the pleadings satisfies us that it must be held that it stands admitted thereby that such property as was so given to them was property so received by him under the decree. We are of the opinion, also, that the evidence was sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial court that the intent and purpose of Judge Mayhew and the defendants in the making and acceptance of these gifts was to subvert the intent of the decree of distribution, to the extent of depriving plaintiff of any share in the property distributed thereby. Doubtless all felt that solely by reason of the death of her father, George H. Mayhew, plaintiff was given by the decree of distribution property that Mary Jane Mayhew had never contemplated that she would receive under her will, and it is not surprising that Judge Mayhew, in view of such a belief, and also in view of the opposition made by plaintiff to his petition for distribution, desired to exclude her from participation in the remainder. But the effect of the decree in her behalf could not legally be obviated in the manner attempted.

Most of the alleged errors of law in the matter of the reception of evidence are disposed of by what we have already said in discussing other points. We have considered such as are not so disposed of, and find in the rulings of the court thereon no error warranting reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

BALLARD v. TITUS et al. (S. F. 5,043.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 9, 1910. Rehearing Denied June 8, 1910.)

1. Easements (§ 1*)—"Right of Way."

A "right of way" is the mere privilege of passing over the land of another in some particular line, with the implied right to make such changes in the surface of the land as are necessary to make it available for travel in a convenient manner.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6230-6234; vol. 8, pp. 7790, 7791.]

2. Easements (§ 44*)—Right of Way—Extent of Right.

The owner of a right of way, the width of which is specified, has the right to use to the limits of such width, though the result is to give him a wider way than necessary.

3. Easements (§ 44*)—Right of Way—Reservation of Certain Width.

A grant or reservation of a right of way 30 feet in width does not, in the absence of circumstances showing that by the "right of way" a roadway of that width was intended, authorize appropriation of land outside such width, so as to give a roadway 30 feet wide.

4. Easements (§ 44*)—Right of Way—Reservation of Certain Width.

Where the evident intention of a reservation of a right of way, 30 feet in width, over land granted from the F. road to land still owned by the grantor, was to have the F. road practically continued to such land, it will be treated merely as a reservation of such width for right of way purposes, though within such strip there can be constructed, without trespassing on land outside it, a roadway only 16 feet wide at its narrowest portion; this being as wide as the roadway of the F. road.

5. Easements (§ 48*)—Right of Way—Location.

Where an unlocated right of way is granted or reserved, the owner of the servient estate has the right in the first instance to designate a reasonable way; and only on his failure to do so may the owners of the dominant estate designate it.

6. Easements (§ 48*)—Right of Way—Location—Reasonableness.

Even if the owner of the servient estate has failed to act, so as to entitle the owner of the dominant estate to select the route of an unlocated right of way, he must select one reasonable as to both parties, in view of all the circumstances.

7. Easements (§ 61*)—Right of Way—Location—Reasonableness.

Evidence, in a suit for location of a right of way, held to warrant the conclusion that the route selected by the owner of the dominant estate was unreasonable, in view of all the circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

8. Easements (§ 61*)—Right of Way—Location—Suit in Equity.

Where the parties cannot agree on a reasonable route for an unlocated right of way, granted or reserved, the location may be determined in equity.

9. Easements (§ 61*)—Right of Way—Location—Suit in Equity—Pleadings.

The allegations of the complaint showing that the action is in fact one in equity to have a right of way over defendants' lands, reserved by plaintiff's deed, but not located therein, located and determined by a judicial decree, the owners of the servient estate refusing to recognize or permit such a location as plaintiff deemed herself entitled to, and the answer admitting the reservation, denying refusal by defendants to locate the route, denying that the route selected by plaintiff was reasonable, and designating another route, and alleging that it would be reasonable and less burdensome to them, and that they had always been willing to allow it, the court is authorized, without a cross-complaint, to designate such way as it may find to be reasonable, under all the circumstances, though the prayer of the complaint is that plaintiff's title to a specifically described strip selected by her be granted; such prayer not making the action one simply to quiet plaintiff's title to such strip.

Action by Maria V. Ballard against Louis Titus and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded with directions.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action is one brought by plaintiff to obtain a decree quieting her title to an alleged right of way over a strip of land 30 feet in width specifically described in the complaint, the same being a portion of a parcel of land in Alameda county, generally described in her complaint, conveyed by her to one Frederick E. Magee, subject to a reservation of a right of way, and conveyed by a successor in interest of said Magee to defendant Claremont Hotel Company, the present owner.

The claim of plaintiff was based upon allegations of her complaint showing that the land so conveyed, being a parcel of about 13 acres, was the "front portion" of a tract of about 40 acres owned by her, that in her deed to Magee she expressly reserved a permanent right of way 30 feet in width beginning at a point on the parcel conveyed where the same touched a public road and leading thence to the "rear portion," that defendants had refused to designate or locate said right of way, and that she had therefore selected and surveyed the same. It was further alleged that the route selected by her is the only accessible and reasonably suitable approach to the "rear portion," and that it imposes no unnecessary burden on defendants, but that defendants refuse to recognize or permit such selection, and exclude her from such right of way. By amendment to her complaint she alleged that under such reservation she was entitled to an actual roadway 30 feet in width, and that to obtain the same she was entitled outside of the 30 feet to make such changes in the surface of defendants' land as are necessary to construct said road to such width, and asked that the decree adjudge her rights in that regard. By another amendment she alleged her right to have such road free of gates or bars, and asked that the decree so adjudge. By their answer defendants admitted that the deed from plaintiff to Magee contained the following reservation, which was, in fact, the only reservation contained therein, viz.: "Save and excepting therefrom a right of way 30 feet in width, beginning at the old Ballard bridge on the Old Fish Ranch road, said bridge being across Harwood creek, and leading thence over said above described tract of land to the remaining land of said Maria Virginia Ballard, to the rear and east of the land hereby conveyed." They denied that they had ever refused to designate or locate a right of way, and denied that the route selected by plaintiff was the only accessible or reasonably suitable approach to plaintiff's land, and denied that it would impose no unnecessary burden on defendants, setting up in detail why it would be most detrimental to them and materially and irreparably injure them. They alleged that another route, generally described, would be more direct and an equally accessible approach and much less burdensome to them, and that they had at all times been willing to allow such route. They denied plaintiff's right to insist on a roadway 30 feet wide, insisting that plaintiff must be confined to building a road within a strip 30 feet in width, and that plaintiff could not go outside of such strip for any purpose, and also denied that she had a right to a road without gates or bars. At the close of the argument, an order was made, on application of the respective parties and without objection or exception, that plaintiff be permitted to file certain amendments, and that defendants be allowed to amend their answer to conform with the proofs by inserting a particular description of the right of way tendered by defendants "being the amendments to answer presented in court." By that amendment defendants set forth a particular description of a proposed route, practically the same as the one known in the case as the Huggins route or survey, alleged to be reasonable and suitable and to correspond to the route generally described in their original answer, and alleged that prior to the commencement of the action, defendants offered a right of way substantially in accord therewith, but that plaintiff refused to accept the same or any other route than the one she had selected, which was the one known as the Prather route or survey. By an amendment they offered the route so described therein. In their original answer they had asked that if the court found plaintiff to be entitled to a right of way, it should decree that she is entitled only to the route referred to therein. The trial court found with the defendants on all their contentions, concluding therefrom that plaintiff is not entitled to the right of way described in her complaint or to any other right of way than the one specifically described in the amendment, that she is the owner of the latter, that she is entitled to construct a roadway thereon, but cannot in so doing disturb or change the surface of the land of the Claremont Hotel Company outside of the 30-foot strip described, and that the hotel company may maintain gates, both at the old Ballard bridge and at the point where said way reaches the line of plaintiff's property. Judgment was given accordingly. This is an appeal by plaintiff from such judgment.

The claim of plaintiff that the trial court was not warranted in authorizing the maintenance of any gate or gates on the way established need not be considered, in view of the written waiver filed by defendants consenting that the judgment may be modified by striking therefrom the provision relating thereto, and by inserting therein a provision to the effect that the way awarded is "an open way, unobstructed by gates." Upon all the other points made by plaintiff we are of the opinion that the conclusions of the learned trial judge were right. For a better understanding of the various claims it is necessary to make a brief statement of some of the undisputed facts.

The agreement for the sale of the 13-acre tract to Magee recited a consideration of $37,500, and was made October 12, 1905. The provision therein as to right of way was that "a permanent right of way is to be given to Maria V. Ballard, or successors, to enter her land immediately to the rear and east of above-described land at or about the Ballard bridge on old Fish Ranch road over Harwood creek." It does not appear that there was then any knowledge on the part of plaintiff that it was contemplated using the granted premises for hotel purposes. The conveyance was made to Magee in pursuance of this agreement on November 10, 1905, containing the reservation as to right of way hereinbefore set forth, and on the same day Magee conveyed the property to Titus, acting for the hotel company. The 40-acre tract, of which the 13 acres conveyed were known as the "front portion," was situated in the Berkeley Hills, and was somewhat rectangular in shape. The front portion, which had for a long time been divided by a fence from the rear portion, had been used as a family residence, while the rear portion had practically been unused. Along the westerly and northerly sides of the front portion and the northerly side of the rear portion for about 117 feet ran a public highway known as the Fish Ranch road, but on account of the steepness of the slope of the rear portion bordering on that road, a practical entrance could not be obtained directly from the road to such rear portion. The nearest practical point of entrance from the Fish Ranch road was apparently the old Ballard bridge, thus rendering necessary the reservation of a right of way therefrom if access to the Fish Ranch road was to be had. This road was an ordinary country road constructed over a hilly country, with a roadway, so far as we can make out from the testimony, much narrower than 30 feet. Without anything apparently having been previously said on either side as to the location of the reserved right of way, plaintiff in the latter part of the year 1906 instructed Prather to survey a line from the Ballard bridge to a point on her line near the southeasterly corner of the "front portion," and the result was the Prather location, a winding strip commencing at the bridge on the northerly line of such front portion and running in a general southeasterly direction through the easterly portion almost to the southeasterly corner of the hotel company's land, its length being about 750 feet. Upon being notified of such location defendants refused to consent thereto, and expressed their willingness to allow a road commencing at the bridge and running nearly parallel with Harwood creek through the northern portion of their land to the rear portion, a route substantially complying with the Huggins route subsequently surveyed, and practically adopted by the trial court. This route did not exceed 300 feet in length. By reason of the character of the land included in and adjoining the same, it would cost considerable more to construct and maintain a road over the Huggins route reasonably available to the use of the rear portion than it would over the Prather route, but the trial court was amply warranted in finding that the Huggins route was a practically reasonable one and would constitute an accessible approach to plaintiff's land. On neither route would it be possible to construct a roadway 30 feet wide, without trespassing on land without the 30-foot strip, the Huggins route giving a roadway of 16 feet in its narrowest portion. There was nothing in the evidence to indicate that at the time of the conveyance the parties had in mind any particular, contemplated use by plaintiff of the rear portion, such as the subdivision of the same for sale in building lots.

The substance of the evidence in support of the findings to the effect that the Prather location would inflict irreparable injury on the hotel company, and impose an unreasonable burden upon its land was correctly set forth in the opinion of the district court of appeal in this case as follows: "It appears to be shown with reasonable clearness by the evidence that for the purposes of a tourist hotel the property conveyed by the appellant to Magee would be materially and greatly deteriorated in value, if the right of way insisted upon by plaintiff were granted. It is a matter of common knowledge that one of the main and most advantageous and attractive features of such a hotel are the grounds upon which it is situated, and that to disturb the beauty and artistic symmetry of such grounds by running through them a highway, over which the public would have the right to pass and repass, and at the same time practically dividing the grounds into two parts, and, in order to build such highway, necessitating the destruction of large ornamental and umbrageous trees constituting one of the essential attractions of the establishment, would result in materially diminishing the attractions of the hotel and thus greatly depreciating its value for the purposes for which it is intended. The evidence shows that the Prather road, or the route selected and located by the plaintiff, would cut diagonally through a grove of trees at the rear of the hotel. This grove, which consists of eucalyptus, Monterey pine and cypress trees, is of value to the hotel not only because of their great beauty and attractive effect upon the grounds of the hotel, but because they also serve as a windbreak. The plan of the hotel company is to build trails and paths, summerhouses, tea gardens and other like attractive features through and in the grove. Moreover, the evidence discloses that the road as designated by plaintiff would be within 100 feet of the hotel, with which on the east side it would parallel, 'beginning at about the level of the second floor and rising to the level of the fourth floor' for a distance of some two or three hundreed feet. Being so near the windows on that side of the hotel, it is obvious that the privacy of the rooms located on the east side of the building would be thus materially interfered with, and the rental value of such rooms most certainly lessened." At the time of the commencement of this action the construction of such a tourist hotel to cost nearly $1,000,000 had already been commenced. It is clear that the Prather route was an unreasonable location, if such a one as was reasonably adequate and within the contemplation of the parties could be located through the northerly portion more nearly parallel with Harwood creek.

The lower court was fully warranted in concluding that plaintiff was limited under this reservation to a strip 30 feet wide within which to construct her road, even though the effect of such limitation was that her actual roadway would be thereby reduced in width to 16 feet. The words of the reservation were "a right of way 30 feet in width." These words did not necessarily imply a "road" or "roadway" 30 feet in width. In fact the reasonable implication therefrom was the reservation for right of way purposes of a "strip of land" to be thereafter located 30 feet wide. It is doubtless true that plaintiff was entitled to have such strip so located as to enable her to construct thereon a roadway which was, under all the circumstances, of necessary or convenient width, if such a location could possibly be made, but it would appear unreasonable to construe a grant or reservation of a mere right of way 30 feet wide as an authorization for an exclusive and permanent appropriation by the owner of the easement of a strip 44 feet wide, the latter appearing from the evidence to be the width necessary to enable plaintiff to construct and maintain a roadway 30 feet wide, and especially where the evidence was such as to warrant the conclusion that such a roadway as could be constructed within such width of 30 feet, would, under all the circumstances, be one of sufficient width. The very object of the specification of width would appear to be to place without the realm of controversy all questions as to the amount of land the owner of the dominant estate might take and the owner of the servient estate be compelled to give for the purposes of the easement. A "right of way" is defined simply as "the privilege which one person, or particular description of persons, may have of passing over the land of another in some particular line" (Kripp v. Curtis, 71 Cal. 62, 63, 11 Pac. 879), a mere privilege of passage over such land, under the circumstances of this case, with the implied right, of course, under such circumstances, to make such changes in the surface of the land as are necessary to make it available for travel in a convenient manner. Where the width of this mere right of way is expressly specified, the owner may have the absolute right to use to the limits of the specified width, even though the result be to give him a wider way than is necessary (see 14 Cyc. 1202; Tudor Ice Co. v. Cunningham, 8 Allen [Mass.] 139; Dewire v. Hanley, 79 Conn. 454, 65 Atl. 573; Herman v. Roberts, 119 N. Y. 37, 23 N. E. 442, 7 L. R. A. 226, 16 Am. St. Rep. 800), free of interference by the owner of the servient estate.

But we have found no authority to the effect that such a grant or reservation, in the absence of language from which such an intent may be inferred, authorizes the appropriation of land lying beyond the specified width. In Wheeler v. Wilder, 61 N. H. 2, relied on by plaintiff as being exactly in point, the grant was of the right to cut a canal "said canal to be of sufficient width to carry the water, with the right to dig the same 1¼ rods wide if needed." The right to dig a canal to the full width specified was thus in terms granted, and that grant carried with it whatever was necessary for its reasonable use and enjoyment, including what was found to be the reasonable necessity of throwing the excavated soil upon other land of the grantor and leaving it there. In Thompson v. Uglow, 4 Or. 369, the easement was one to convey a stream of water over land by ditch or water race. The principal question involved was whether one having such an easement may dig up the soil adjacent to the race for the purpose of repairing the banks, in case the same repairs can be made by other but more expensive means. The contract by which the easement was created was not before the court, and the record on appeal was not in such condition as to enable the appellate court to ascertain whether the necessary repairs could be made without digging up the soil. The decision goes no further than to hold that the right to make necessary repairs in the case of such an easement is essential to the enjoyment of the thing granted and necessarily passes by the grant, and that, where the deed leaves the matter of repairs to be implied, the owner of the easement may make such repairs as are essential to enjoyment, even to the extent of taking and using other soil of the owner of the servient estate, each case to be "determined according to its own peculiar circumstances." Neither of these cases constitutes authority for the proposition that a "right of way" of the kind here involved limited by its terms to a certain width authorizes the appropriation to purposes of the way of a greater width. It may be conceded that the circumstances under which such a reservation was made may be such as to show that the term "right of way" of a designated width is intended to denote a roadway of that width, but here the circumstances under which the reservation was made are such as to fully sustain a conclusion that the parties did not contemplate a 30-foot roadway at all, and that the language was intended to mean what it in substance says, viz.: That a strip 30 feet wide was reserved for right of way purposes. We regard it as a very potent fact, in this connection, that it was access to the Fish Ranch road that was sought by the reservation to be preserved. It was the Fish Ranch road practically continued to her property that plaintiff apparently desired, and this road as we have seen, was a narrow, hilly, country road. It is not questioned that the so-called Huggins route will enable plaintiff to have a roadway within the 30-foot limit that will be as wide as the roadway of the Fish Ranch road. Giving full force to the provision of our statute, that "a reservation in any grant * * * is to be interpreted in favor of the grantor" (Civ. Code, § 1069), we are satisfied that the reservation here involved limits plaintiff's use of the servient tenement to a strip 30 feet wide.

It is settled law that where an unlocated right of way is granted or reserved, the owner of the servient estate may in the first instance designate a reasonable way, and if he fails to do so, the owner of the dominant estate may designate it. Jones on Easements, § 337; Kripp v. Curtis. 71 Cal. 62, 65, 11 Pac. 879; Blum v. Weston, 102 Cal. 362, 369, 36 Pac. 778, 41 Am. St. Rep. 188. Findings sufficiently sustained by evidence establish that there was no such failure in this case as to entitle plaintiff to make the selection. But had she been so entitled, she would still have been required to select a route that was reasonable as to both parties, in view of all the circumstances, one "that will not unreasonably interfere with the grantor in the enjoyment of his estate." Jones on Easements, § 337. The trial court was warranted in concluding that the route selected by plaintiff was unreasonable, in view of all the circumstances. The case before us is simply one where the parties have been unable to agree upon a reasonable route in which event the location may be determined in equity. Jones on Easements, § 354; Gardner v. Webster, 64 N. H. 520, 522, 15 Atl. 144.

We are satisfied that the decree does not limit the use of the way decreed to any particular person or persons. By it, as modified under the waiver of defendants as to gates, the way will be an open highway appurtenant to the land of plaintiff, regardless of the manner in which it may hereafter be subdivided, and available for the use of all who may have occasion to go to or from such land.

It is earnestly urged, upon the theory that this is simply an action to quiet plaintiff's title to a strip of land specifically described in the complaint, that, especially in the absence of any cross-complaint, the trial court was not warranted in locating and designating as plaintiff's right of way another strip than that designated in the complaint, and that its judgment could have been, at most, simply one adjudicating plaintiff to be without title as to the strip of land described in her complaint as the right of way desired. We are of the opinion that in making this contention learned counsel for plaintiff are mistaken as to the scope of the cause of action stated in their complaint. That is not conclusively determined by the prayer of her complaint asking that plaintiff's title to the specifically described strip be granted. The allegations of her complaint show that her action was, in fact, one in equity to have a right of way over defendants' land, alleged to be reserved by her deed to Magee, but not located therein, located and determined by a judicial decree; the owner of the servient estate refusing to recognize or permit such a location as she deemed herself entitled to. Such, in fact, was the only kind of action she could maintain under the circumstances alleged in her complaint. She could not be held to have actually acquired title as to any specific route by reason of her mere designation thereof, in no way acquiesced in by the owner of the servient estate, and of which she never acquired possession. If the defendants failed to designate any reasonable route and refused to allow her to exercise any rights under the reservation, which was the case made by the facts alleged in the complaint, her only remedy was to apply to a court of equity to enforce her reservation by locating the way and decreeing her rights therein. In the action thus instituted, the route selected by her, if not an unreasonable route under all the circumstances, should doubtless be awarded her, but any action based upon such facts as were alleged is primarily one for the adjudication of the right to a way and the location of the same by the court. Incidentally the plaintiff, of course, seeks to have the route selected by her designated by the court as the particular way to which she is entitled, but failing in this she was still entitled under the allegations of her complaint to have the court adjudicate her right to a way and locate the same. The admissions of the answer and the evidence showed her to be entitled to such rights in the hotel company's land, and it would have been prejudicial error to have refused to decree those rights, for the effect thereof would probably have been to forever debar her from the assertion of any right under the reservation. The matters adjudicated were all within the issues made by complaint and answer, and no cross-complaint was necessary to authorize the court to designate for plaintiff such way as it might find to be reasonable in view of all the circumstances.

It cannot be held that the trial court erred in permitting to be filed the amendment specifically describing the right of way fixed by the judgment. As we have seen, there was no objection by plaintiff to such action on the part of the court. The filing was with the consent of plaintiff. Nor can it be held that the court erred in refusing to reopen the case on the request of plaintiff. The case had been very thoroughly tried on the issues as to the relative merits of the Prather and Huggins routes, and the trial court was warranted in concluding that there was no good reason for the taking of further evidence. It is claimed that the description in the amendment does not in all its details correspond with the route shown on the map in evidence known as the Huggins route, and as to which the evidence was given on the trial. It is claimed by defendants that it corresponded very closely with such Huggins route as shown on said map, and is substantially the same thing. We need not discuss this matter further, in view of the fact that defendants consent in their brief that plaintiff may have the exact route shown on the map, if she so desires, and that the judgment may be modified accordingly.

There is no other matter requiring notice.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in accord with the old judgment, except in the following respects, viz.: The provision relating to gates shall not be inserted, and in lieu thereof there shall be inserted a provision to the effect that the way awarded is an open and unobstructed way; and further, if plaintiff within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur from this court so demands in writing filed in the superior court, the description of the way awarded shall be changed so that the same shall correspond in all respects to the Huggins route, as shown on the map in evidence in this cause.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; MELVIN, J.

(Supreme Court of California. May 27, 1910.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 254*)—"VENDOR'S LIEN"—ORIGIN.

A "vendor's lien" is not the result of any agreement or intention of the parties, but is an equity raised by a court of chancery for the benefit of vendors of realty and is not created by Civ. Code, § 3046, providing that one who sells real property has a vendor's lien thereon, independent of possession, for so much of the price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7288-7290, 7827.]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 251*)—VENDOR'S LIEN—PRESUMPTION.

Where there is nothing to indicate an intention of the parties as to a vendor's lien, the lien is presumed to exist and is an incident to the transaction of sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 624; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 266*)—VENDOR'S LIEN—NATURE OF RIGHT—WAIVER.

A right to a vendor's lien is a right personal to the vendor which it may waive without consideration and without writing, and when once waived cannot be resuscitated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 757; Dec. Dig. § 266.*]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 266*)—VENDOR'S LIEN—WAIVER.

Where a contract for the sale of mining claims indicated a scheme to convey the claims to a corporation to be formed, free from all incumbrances, and that 90 per cent. of the stock of the corporation should be deposited in a bank to be dealt with in a prescribed manner, such shares to be subject to sale by the vendee or his associates, a stated proportion of the price to go to plaintiff in satisfaction of the purchase price of the stock, etc., it being intended that stock should be issued and sold to the amount of £225,000, while the purchase price of the claims was but $312,000, the nature of the contract indicated a waiver by plaintiff of any right to a vendor's lien to secure an unpaid portion of the price under the rule that any act of the vendor manifesting an intention not to rely on a lien will operate to waive the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 713; Dec. Dig. § 266.*]

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 251*)—VENDOR'S LIEN—CREATION—PAYMENT OF PRICE—DEFAULT.

Failure of purchaser of realty to pay the price cannot of itself create a vendor's lien, where none had theretofore existed, because of the vendor's election to convey the property free from incumbrance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 624; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

6. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 105*)—MINING CORPORATIONS—MORTGAGES—ASSENT OF STOCKHOLDERS.

St. 1880, c. 118, as amended by St. 1897, c. 92, declares that it shall not be lawful for the directors of any mining corporation to sell, lease, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part of the mining ground owned by the corporation, nor to purchase or obtain in any way, except by location, any additional mining ground unless such act be ratified by the holders of at least two-thirds of the stock of such corporation then outstanding, which ratification may be either in writing signed and acknowledged by the stockholders or by resolution passed at a regularly called stockholders' meeting. Held, that the act goes to the power or authority of directors to act, and not merely to the personal liability of the directors, so that a mortgage of the mining ground of a mining corporation, executed prior to the repeal of the act, in the absence of a ratification by the stockholders, passed no title from the corporation.

7. Mines and Minerals (§ 105*)—Mining Companies—Mortgages—Ratification by Stockholders—Effect.

Where a mining company executes a mortgage on its mining ground without ratification by its stockholders, as required by St. 1880, c. 118, as amended by St. 1897, c. 92, such objection, though unavailable to a stranger who does not connect himself with the title of the corporation, may be raised by the corporation itself or its stockholders to avoid the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 229, 229½; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

8. Mines and Minerals (§ 105*)—Mining Companies—Mortgages—Ratification by Stockholders—Mode.

St. 1880, c. 118, as amended by St. 1897, c. 92, provides that it shall not be lawful for the directors of a mining corporation to mortgage any part of its mining ground unless such act be ratified by the holders of at least two-thirds of the stock of such corporation then outstanding, which ratification may be either in writing signed and acknowledged by such stockholders, or by a resolution passed at a regularly called stockholders' meeting. Held, that the mode prescribed for such ratification should be regarded as illustrative only and not mandatory and exhaustive, so that, where the holders of two-thirds of the stock of a corporation had in a formal and unequivocal way announced their assent to a proposed mortgage, it was valid though not in the mode prescribed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 229, 229½; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

9. Mines and Minerals (§ 105*)—Mortgages—Ratification by Stockholders—"Stockholders."

"Stockholders" of record of a mining corporation holding the stock for a lawful purpose, though not the beneficial owners thereof, are stockholders authorized to ratify a mortgage of the corporation's mining ground within St. 1880, c. 118, as amended by St. 1897, c. 92, requiring such mortgage to be ratified by the holders of two-thirds of the stock.

10. Corporations (§ 197*)—Stockholder's Right to Vote.

In general the test of a stockholder's right to vote at corporate meetings is the ownership of shares as disclosed by the proper record books of the corporation.

11. Mines and Minerals (§ 105*)—Mining Corporations—Mortgage of Assets—Ratification—Right to Vote—Statutes.

Civ. Code, § 312, provides that at all elections or votes had for any purpose there must be a majority of the subscribed capital stock or of the members represented, either in person or by proxy in writing, and that each person acting therein in person or by proxy must be a member thereof or a bona fide stockholder having stock in his own name on the books of the corporation at least 10 days prior to the election. Held, that the section is sufficiently broad to cover a vote taken at a meeting of the stockholders of a mining corporation called to ratify a mortgage of its mining ground as required by St. 1880, c. 118, as amended by St. 1897, c. 92, at which meeting the right to vote would reside in every bona fide stockholder having stock in his own name on the stock books of the corporation 10 days prior to the meeting or at least at the time of the meeting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 229, 229½; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

12. Corporations (§ 197*)—"Bona Fide Stockholder."

A "bona fide stockholder," within Civ. Code, § 312, providing that only bona fide stockholders shall be entitled to vote at corporate meetings, need not necessarily be the owner of the stock; it being sufficient that the stock stands in his name in good faith for a proper purpose and that he is holding the same either for himself or in trust for another.

13. Mines and Minerals (§ 105*)—Mining Corporations—Mortgages—Ratification.

Where a director of a mining corporation was the bona fide holder of two-thirds of the corporation's stock, his act in executing a mortgage on the corporation's mining property as director of the corporation operated as a ratification of the mortgage by two-thirds of the corporation's stock required by St. 1880, c. 118, as amended by St. 1897, c. 92, to give the mortgage validity.

14. Mines and Minerals (§ 105*)—Mining Corporations—Mortgages—Ratifications by Stockholders.

While the persons holding the legal title to two-thirds of the stock of a mining corporation are persons authorized by St. 1880, c. 118, as amended by St. 1897, c. 92, to ratify a mortgage of the corporation's mining ground, the courts may also look behind the apparent ownership and sustain a ratification made by the beneficial owners of the stock.

15. Mines and Minerals (§ 105*)—Mining Corporations—Mortgages—Estoppel.

Under St. 1880, c. 118, as amended by St. 1897, c. 92, providing that it shall not be lawful for the directors of a mining corporation to mortgage its mining ground unless the act is ratified by at least two-thirds of the outstanding stock, such a mortgage lacking the requisite ratification cannot be rendered valid by estoppel.

16. Mines and Minerals (§ 106*)—Mining Corporations — Mortgages — Invalidity —Issues.

Where, in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage on the realty of a mining corporation, all the pleadings in effect admitted the authorization and making of the mortgage and based objections to its validity solely on the ground that it had not been ratified by the stockholders as required by St. 1880, c. 118, as amended by St. 1897, c. 92, an objection that it was also invalid because executed to H. as one of the trustees, and that H. himself was a director whose vote was necessary to authorize the execution of the mortgage, was unsustainable as not within the issues.

In Bank. Appeals from Superior Court, Calaveras County; A. I. McSorley, Judge.

Action by the Royal Consolidated Mining Company against the Royal Consolidated Mines (California) Company, Limited, and others, and by Leon Ephraim Morris and others, cross-complainants, against the Royal Consolidated Mining Company and others. From judgments settling the rights of the parties, the cross-complainants appeal from so much as denied their right to relief prayed, foreclosing a deed of trust and denying their motion for a new trial; plaintiff appeals from parts of the judgment decreeing that it recover nothing, that its action be dismissed, that cross-complainants have judgment against it for a specified sum, that defendants recover from plaintiffs their costs; and the Royal Consolidated Mines (California) Company, Limited, appeals from so much of the judgment as gives to the cross-complainants, trustees, a money judgment and costs against said corporation. Portions of the judgment denying foreclosure of the deed of trust and decreeing the money judgment to the cross-complainants reversed and that portion dismissing plaintiff's complaint affirmed.

Bishop, Hoefler, Cook & Harwood (Alfred J. Harwood, of counsel), for appellants. Nicol & Orr, Campbell, Metson & Campbell, S. D. Woods, Solinsky & Wehe, Jesse W. Lilienthal, and Vogelsang & Brown, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. On the 9th day of February, 1898, the Royal Consolidated Mining Company, a corporation (designated in this opinion as the "vendor" or the "California corporation"), entered into a written contract with J. C. Kemp Van Ee for the sale by it to him of certain mining properties in Calaveras county. The terms of the contract, which will be set out at greater length hereafter, provided for the incorporation by the purchaser of a company under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts of Great Britain, for the purpose of acquiring the properties. Such company, the Royal Consolidated Mines (California) Company, Limited (which will be referred to by us as the "British corporation"), was formed, and title to the properties in question became vested in it. In 1902 this corporation executed, or attempted to execute, to Frederick Rheinwald Bullock, William Bryson Butler, and John Thomas Hodson, as trustees, an instrument purporting to convey said properties to the trustees as security for the payment of £75,000 of debenture stock to be issued by the corporation (and in fact subsequently issued by it) to persons lending money on the faith of such debentures. Pending this action, Bullock, one of the trustees, died, and was succeeded by Leon Ephraim Morris.

This action was brought by the California corporation against the British corporation, J. C. Kemp Van Ee, the trustees above named, and other defendants designated by fictitious names, to foreclose a vendor's lien upon the property conveyed by said plaintiff, its claim being that some $312,000 with interest was due on the purchase price of the mines, and that it was entitled to a lien for such unpaid balance. Each of the named defendants appeared and resisted plaintiff's claim. Albert Raymond, appearing as a defendant sued by a fictitious name, also denied the existence of plaintiff's asserted lien. Raymond himself claimed a lien on the property by virtue of an attachment for the sum of $64,421 and interest, levied in an action brought against the British corporation. The trustees, Morris, Butler, and Hodson, filed in addition to their answer a cross-complaint, seeking foreclosure of the instrument executed to them to secure payment of the £75,000 of debentures. The trial resulted in findings upon which the court entered its judgment: (1) That plaintiff recover nothing and that its action be dismissed against defendants and cross-complainants; (2) that cross-complainants take nothing as against plaintiffs and defendants, except that cross-complainants have and recover from the British corporation the sum of $242,500 with interest; (3) that defendants recover costs from plaintiff; (4) that Van Ee and Raymond recover costs from cross-complainants; (5) that cross-complainants recover costs from the British corporation. In other words, the court determined in the original action that the plaintiff had not established its right to a vendor's lien, and, in the cross-action, that the instrument under which the trustees claimed was not a valid mortgage and could not be foreclosed, but that such trustees were entitled to a money judgment against the British corporation for the sums actually advanced to it by the debenture holders.

From this judgment three appeals have been taken. No. 1,744 is the appeal of the cross-complainants (trustees) from those parts of the judgment denying them the relief of foreclosure, giving them a money judgment, and awarding costs against them. They appeal also from an order denying their motion for a new trial. No. 1,750 is the appeal of plaintiff from the parts of the judgment decreeing that it recover nothing, that the action be dismissed, that cross-complainants have judgment for $242,500, and that defendants recover from plaintiff their costs. No. 1,764 is an appeal taken by the British corporation and J. C. Kemp Van Ee from the part of the judgment whereby cross-complainants (trustees) recover a money judgment and costs against said corporation.

The bills of exceptions presented by the respective parties are, except for the assignments of error, identical, and for this reason, among others, the various appeals can most conveniently be considered in a single opinion. It will be well to take up first the questions arising on plaintiff's appeal (No. 1,750) from the judgment declaring that it is not entitled to a vendor's lien. Some of the facts to be stated in this connection will be important in considering the other appeals.

The complaint sets forth at length the terms of the agreement of February, 1898, between the plaintiff, the then owner of the properties in question, and Van Ee. This agreement, after reciting that the plaintiff is the owner of the mining properties in question, and that Van Ee is desirous of acquiring such property, provides that the vendor (plaintiff) agrees to sell, and Van Ee agrees to purchase, the aforesaid properties for the sum of $400,000, payable as provided in the agreement. The purchaser, it is agreed, shall, on the signing of the agreement, pay the sum of $60,000 to the credit of the vendor with the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, at its San Francisco office, on account of the purchase consideration. The third paragraph reads as follows: "The purchaser shall proceed forthwith to incorporate a company in London under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts of Great Britain, for the purpose of acquiring the aforesaid properties, and said company shall have a nominal capital of 250,000 shares of one pound each, of which 25,000 shares, at the par value, shall be reserved for the purpose of providing working capital for the said properties, and the balance of shares, namely, 225,000 shares, shall be issued fully paid up and be deposited in London with the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, as security for the payment of the balance of the purchase consideration of $400,000 for the said properties, and upon the allotment and deposit of said 225,000 shares, the property shall be duly and legally conveyed by the purchaser to the company to be formed as aforesaid to acquire the same, free from all incumbrances." The agreement further provides that the balance of the púrchase price, namely, $340,000, "shall be paid in the manner following, that is to say, an amount equal to eighty per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the working of said mines shall be paid to the vendor monthly on or before thirty days after the time of each and every clean-up, and shall be credited as aforesaid on account of the purchase consideration; provided, however, that as sales are made of said 225,000 shares, or any part thereof, as herein provided, the purchaser shall pay only such proportion of said amount equal to said eighty per cent. of said net proceeds as the number of shares remaining in said bank bears to the total of 225,000 shares." The following paragraph provides that "the purchaser, however, shall have the right from time to time to otherwise discharge so much of the purchase consideration as he may think fit by the sale of as many of the said 225,000 shares as he may think necessary or advisable, always provided that none of the said shares shall be sold for less than their par value, and that in any event, as the same may be sold, they may be withdrawn by the purchaser or released, as he shall direct, against a payment to said bank for account of said vendors of ninety per cent. of the par value of said shares, to apply upon said purchase consideration." After the payment, however made, of the balance of the purchase price, all the shares remaining in the hands of the bank are to be delivered to the purchaser. The vendors agree in paragraph 8 that upon the payment of the $60,000 they will deposit with the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, in San Francisco, a good and sufficient deed conveying to the purchaser, his nominee or nominees, satisfactory title to all of said properties free and clear of all incumbrances whatsoever, together with a letter of instructions authorizing and directing said bank to deliver such deed upon receiving from the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, in London, a cablegram to the effect that the said 225,000 shares have been deposited with the said bank in London to be dealt with in accordance with the terms of the contract. It is provided that until the payment of the balance of $340,000 the vendors may have a representative upon the properties, but that upon the payment of the $60,000 possession of the properties is to be turned over to the purchaser. By the terms of paragraph 11 it is agreed that if the whole purchase consideration shall not have been paid at the expiration of four years "then the balance of shares remaining in said bank shall, at such time thereafter as may be determined by said vendors, be divided between vendors and purchaser so that the purchaser receive such proportion of said shares as the whole amount of money paid by him hereunder bears to the entire amount of said purchase consideration; and the vendors shall receive the balance of shares in satisfaction of the purchaser's covenant to purchase." The agreement further provides that it is to be binding upon and inure in favor of the heirs, representatives, successors, and assigns of the respective parties.

Upon the execution of said agreement of February 9, 1898, Van Ee paid to the plaintiff the sum of $60,000, and plaintiff delivered up the possession of the said properties in accordance with the terms of the contract, which possession was held by Van Ee until the organization of the British corporation. At the same time plaintiff executed its deed of the properties to Van Ee, and deposited such deed in escrow with the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited. In May, 1898, Van Ee and John Thomas Hodson, who was interested with him in the transaction, caused to be incorporated a company in London under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts of Great Britain for the purpose of acquiring the property described in the contract. (The contract of February, 1898, had theretofore been assigned by Van Ee to Hodson.) This corporation, known as the Royal Consolidated Mines (California) Company, Limited, is the one herein referred to as the "British corporation." It was organized with a nominal capital of 250,000 shares of £1 each. Upon its organization it entered into a contract with Hodson, whereby Hodson agreed to sell, and the British corporation to purchase, free from incumbrances, the properties here in controversy, for the sum of £225,000, to be paid and satisfied by the allotment to the vendor, or his nominee, of 225,000 fully paid shares in the company of £1 each. It was provided that the sale should be completed on the 20th day of July, 1898, and that the company should before that time issue certificates for the said 225,000 shares as required by Hodson, and lodge the same with the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, at its London office. The 225,000 shares of capital stock of said British corporation were issued fully paid to Hodson, and were by him deposited with the Anglo-Californian Bank in London pursuant to the terms of the contract between plaintiff and Van Ee. Thereupon the deed from plaintiff to Van Ee, which had been deposited in escrow with the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, in San Francisco, was, in accordance with the provisions of the contract of February 9, 1898, delivered to Van Ee. Van Ee executed his deed conveying the properties to the British corporation, and the latter took possession of the properties. It immediately commenced to work and improve the said property and expended large sums in the operation of the mines and the placing of improvements thereon. Out of the proceeds there was paid to plaintiff, pursuant to the terms of its contract, the sum of $29,479.96. With the exception of this sum, no part of the balance of $340,000 of the purchase price has been paid. The four years allowed for payment of the consideration of Van Ee's purchase expired on the 9th of February, 1902. At that time and thereafter the plaintiff entered into several agreements with Van Ee, modifying the terms of the original agreement and extending the purchaser's time for performance. It is alleged in the complaint that all of these extensions were made without any consideration moving to the plaintiff, and that all the agreements made by it were executed and received on the part of Van Ee and of the British corporation without any intention upon the part of either of them of performing or fulfilling them. The court finds these allegations to be untrue, and, without prolonging the discussion by an examination of the evidence, we shall simply state that we think these findings, so far as they are material on this appeal, are fully sustained. The issue of the £75,000 of debenture stock and other transactions connected therewith are set out in the complaint and charged to have been part of a fraudulent scheme concocted by Van Ee and the British corporation for the purpose of complicating and clouding the title to said property, and to prevent said plaintiff from being able to collect the balance of its purchase price. The findings are contrary to these averments, too, and there is, in fact, no substantial evidence tending to show any such fraudulent intent. It is found that the plaintiff has never at any time determined the time as provided in the contract of February 9, 1898, when the balance of shares remaining in said bank should be divided between it (said plaintiff) and Van Ee, nor made demand therefor, but at all times since the expiration of the time provided for in the contract and the extensions thereof (except when the shares were, with the consent of the plaintiff, in the hands of third parties) the British corporation has been ready to make such division and deliver to plaintiff the shares belonging to it under the contract.

With reference to plaintiff's claim of a vendor's lien the court finds that it was plaintiff's intention at the time of the execution of the contract of February 9, 1898, to sell and convey to Van Ee and to the British corporation the properties in question absolutely for the purpose of conveying the same absolutely to the corporation to be organized, and plaintiff did not intend to nor did it have or retain in said property a vendor's lien or any lien for the unpaid balance of the said purchase price, and it was the intention of the said plaintiff to waive any lien as vendor or otherwise that it might have or claim on said property for said balance and it did waive said lien.

On the question whether or not there was a lien the parties, on both sides, base their respective claims mainly on the terms of the contract of February 9, 1898. We think that contract, fairly construed, manifests, on the part of the vendor, an intent plainly inconsistent with the reservation of a lien on the properties to be conveyed.

Section 3046 of the Civil Code provides that "one who sells real property has a vendor's lien thereon, independent of possession, for so much of the price as remains unpaid and unsecured otherwise than by the personal obligation of the buyer." But the lien does not find its origin in this statutory enactment. It has been generally recognized by courts of chancery. It is "not the result of any agreement or any intention of the vendor or vendee, but is a simple equity raised by courts for the benefit of vendors of real estate." Avery v. Clark, 87 Cal. 623, 25 Pac. 919, 22 Am. St. Rep. 272. Accordingly, where there is nothing to indicate an intention one way or the other, "the lien is presumed to exist, and is an incident of the transaction of sale." Finnell v. Finnell, 105 Pac. 740. In the case last cited, the lien was upheld, although the vendor was unaware, at the time of the sale, of the fact that he was, under the law, entitled to a vendor's lien. On the other hand, the "right thus afforded of enforcing payment of the consideration against the property conveyed is a personal one, and it may be waived and relinquished without consideration and without a writing (see Claiborne v. Castle, 98 Cal. 30, 33 [32 Pac. 807]), and, when once waived, is gone forever. It is thoroughly settled that, if the vendor do any act manifesting an intention on his part not to rely on the lien thus given by law for the payment of the purchase money, such as taking security therefor, without an express agreement that he may still have his vendor's lien, the lien will not exist." Finnell v. Finnell, supra, citing cases.

The respondents point to various elements of the transaction to support the contention that the plaintiff waived any lien. Without considering separately such arguments as that the plaintiff took security or that the contract did not make the vendee liable for any liquidated purchase price measurable in terms of money, we have no hesitation in declaring our conviction that the contract, viewed as a whole, evidences a scheme or plan of dealing which is inconsistent with the retention by the vendor of any lien on the properties. That scheme briefly stated, was this: The mines, owned by plaintiff, were to be conveyed, free and clear of incumbrance, to Van Ee. Van Ee was to form a corporation, and to transfer the properties, likewise unincumbered, to it. Ninety per cent. of the shares of stock of such corporation were to be deposited in a bank, to be dealt with in a given manner. These shares were to be subject to sale by the vendee or his associates, but a stated proportion of the sum realized on any sales was to go to the plaintiff in satisfaction of the consideration stated in the agreement. Similar provision was made with reference to a percentage of the proceeds arising from the operation of the mines by the vendee or his assigns. The number of shares to be deposited was 225,000, of the par value of £1 each. Sales of these shares were to be made at not less than their par value. In other words, the agreement contemplated that a title, apparently free and unincumbered, should be conveyed to a corporation which should, upon the basis of such title, issue and sell its shares to an amount exceeding a million dollars. The plan called for a nominal capitalization of about three times the price which plaintiff was willing to take for its properties, and provided that the shares should be sold to the public at a rate which would bring in an amount equal to or exceeding their face value. What may fairly be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties to this agreement? Did the plaintiff and Van Ee intend to sell to prospective shareholders, at this price, an interest in a property which was subject to a paramount, but unrecorded, lien for $340,000, or did they propose to offer at par shares in a corporation owning a clear title to the property? A reading of the agreement leaves no doubt that this question must be answered by saying that no secret lien in favor of the original vendor intended to be retained. In re Brentwood Brick & Coal Co., L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 562, was a case in which property was conveyed to a corporation for a consideration of £6,000, to be paid, by the payment to the vendor of 50 per cent. of all money received by the company on the sale of shares, and a like 50 per cent. of all money by way of capital to be at any time borrowed by the company, until the £6,000 should be paid. The transaction was held to be such as to exclude the idea of the retention of a vendor's lien. Referring to the provision for payment out of proceeds of shares sold or money borrowed, James, L. J., said: "To my mind it is clear that he intended to rely on that fund for payment, and intended that the company should have the means of borrowing. This is quite inconsistent with a lien which would probably make the company unable to pledge their property." The reasoning applies with equal force to the provision here for the sale of 225,000 shares at not less than their par value. Neither the plaintiff nor Van Ee could have considered it feasible to market at par any part of an issue of 225,000 one-pound shares of a corporation owning no assets beyond an equity of redemption (worth, perhaps, $60,000) in a property subject to a lien of $340,000. Again, the covenant that the plaintiff's conveyance to Van Ee, and his subsequent transfer to the British corporation should be free and clear of incumbrances, excludes the idea that a title subject to a lien in favor of the plaintiff was to be retained. It is true that in Slide & Spur Gold Mines v. Seymour, 153 U. S. 509, 14 Sup. Ct. 842, 38 L. Ed. 802, it was held that a somewhat similar covenant was to be construed as referring "to prior charges and incumbrances" and not to "any which arise out of the conveyance itself." But in that case there was but a single transfer directly from the vendor to a corporation organized by the vendee to take title. Here the property was to be conveyed to Van Ee, and by him to a corporation. Even if we give to the covenant for a transfer free of incumbrances the restricted meaning applied in the Slide & Spur Case, the vendor's lien claimed must have attached at the moment of the transfer to Van Ee. It would, therefore, have been prior to the conveyance by Van Ee to the British corporation, and was excluded by the provision that that transfer should be free of incumbrance.

But apart from this somewhat technical consideration, we prefer to rest our conclusion on the broader ground that the whole scope of this agreement, differing materially from that in the Slide & Spur Case, is such as to make the existence of a vendor's lien inconsistent with the proper execution of the plan agreed upon.

We have not, in the foregoing discussion, given any attention to the attack made by appellant upon the finding to the effect that the purchaser had not defaulted in the matter of dividing the shares of stock of the British corporation with the plaintiff. If the court below was right, as we are satisfied it was, in holding that the plaintiff, at the time of executing the contract of February 9, 1898, intended to and did waive any lien on the properties, the alleged default had no bearing on its right to such lien. Failure to pay the purchase price cannot, of itself, create a lien, where none had theretofore existed. Fisk v. Potter, 41* N. Y. 76. But if it be claimed that the breach by Van Ee gave plaintiff the right to some kind of a personal judgment against him, we think the point is sufficiently answered by saying that the finding that he had not committed the breach alleged has adequate support in the evidence.

In accordance with these views, it must be held that the court below rightly determined that the plaintiff did not hold a vendor's lien and was not entitled to any relief. If this be so, the plaintiff is not concerned with the correctness of the findings with respect to the claims or liens of other parties, and it will not, on this appeal, be necessary or proper to consider any points made by plaintiff with regard to such matters.

The appeal of the cross-complainants Morris, Butler, and Hodson, trustees, No. 1,744, is, as we have said, from the portions of the judgment which deny foreclosure of the deed of trust and give a money judgment for the sums advanced. The refusal of the relief sought was based upon the proposition that the indenture of trust or mortgage was void for want of compliance with the terms of the act of 1880, as amended in 1897, for "the further protection of stockholders in mining companies." St. 1880, p. 131; St. 1897, p. 96. This act (now repealed) was the one which required ratification by the holders of two-thirds of the stock in mining corporations of a sale or mortgage of any part of the mining ground owned or held by the corporation.

The findings are to the effect that on the 2d day of October, 1902, the board of directors of the British corporation determined to raise and borrow a sum of £50,000 and for that purpose to issue the debenture stock of the corporation to the amount of £75,000. In order to secure the redemption and payment of this stock, a certain indenture by way of mortgage of all the property described in the complaint was, on the 2d day of October, 1902, at London, and as authorized by the directors of said corporation, made, executed, and delivered by and between said directors and the original cross-complainants Morris, Butler, and Hodson as trustees for the creditors of the corporation and the holders of said debenture stock. The instrument was acknowledged, and, on February 5, 1903, recorded in the office of the county recorder of Calaveras county. Thereafter the British corporation issued debenture stock to the amount of £75,000 and in consideration of a loan of £50,000 made to it by the British Transvaal & General Financial Company, Ltd., delivered said stock to said British Transvaal & General Financial Company, Ltd. The sum of £50,000 was actually received by the British corporation from said lender, and was the full and agreed consideration for said debenture stock. The same has always been, and now is, retained by the British corporation, and no part of it has ever been repaid. That out of said sum of £50,000 the British corporation expended in permanent improvements on the mining property the sum of $206,791.50. That all of said improvements are now on and form a part of the property and are of the reasonable value of said last-named sum.

It is further found and these are the findings which are attacked by the appellant trustees, that at the time of the borrowing of said money and the making, delivery, certification, and recording of said trust deed, all of the capital stock of said British corporation was owned in equal shares by the defendants Van Ee and Hodson subject to the conditional ownership therein of the said plaintiff under and by virtue of the contract of February 9, 1898, and at no time during said period was said Hodson or any other person than Van Ee and plaintiff, the owner or holder of more than one-half of the capital stock of said corporation; that the indenture of October 2, 1902, was never ratified or authorized by the holders of two-thirds of the capital stock of the defendant corporation as required by the act of 1880.

The act in question provided that: "It shall not be lawful for the directors of any mining corporation to sell, lease, mortgage or otherwise dispose of the whole or any part of the mining ground owned or held by such corporation, nor to purchase or obtain in any way (except by location) any additional mining ground, unless such act be ratified by the holders of at least two-thirds of the stock of such corporation then outstanding. Such ratification may be made either in writing, signed and acknowledged by such stockholders, or by resolution duly passed at any regularly called stockholders' meeting."

That there was no ratification, either by a writing signed and acknowledged by the stockholders as such or by resolution passed at a stockholders' meeting, is conceded. The position of appellants is, however, that Hodson was in fact the holder of more than two-thirds of the stock of the corporation, that he authorized, executed, and acknowledged the instrument on behalf of the corporation as one of its directors, and that such authorization, execution, and acknowledgment was a sufficient ratification to comply with the requirements of the act. It appears that the 225,000 shares, which were the consideration for the conveyance to the British corporation, were by it issued fully paid to Hodson and were by him deposited with the Anglo-Californian Bank in London as required by the terms of the agreement of February 9th. Thereafter Van Ee executed to the corporation a deed of said properties. The 225,000 shares so issued in the name of Hodson remained in the Anglo-Californian Bank until after the signing of the deed of trust in question, with the exception of a period during which they were, with plaintiff's consent, made subject to an option which was never exercised. So far as appeared from the books and records of the corporation, Hodson was, at the date of the execution of the mortgage, the sole owner of this stock. The record does not disclose that he had ever transferred any part of it to any other person. The interest which the court found to be held by Van Ee was such interest as may have been vested in him by reason of the fact that he and Hodson were to share equally in the profits of the transaction. The interest of the plaintiff was the right which it had to receive a certain proportion of the shares remaining unsold at the expiration of the four-year period designated in its agreement of February 9, 1898, with Van Ee.

The stock being in this condition, the deed of trust was signed under the seal of the British corporation by John T. Hodson and H. Percy Hood, directors, and J. K. Gray, secretary of the corporation, and by the trustees named in the deed. Attached to the instrument is the certificate of acknowledgment of the Consul General of the United States at London certifying that the instrument was acknowledged by John Thomas Hodson and Henry Percy Hood, directors, and J. K. Gray, secretary of the corporation, "who acknowledged to him that they were the officers of the said company who for and in the name of the said company have executed the foregoing instrument, they then and there severally acknowledged the same to be their respective free act and deed and as and for the act and deed of the said company for the uses and purposes therein set forth."

The act of 1880 has been under consideration by this court several times. The earlier cases showed a disposition to give a very rigid and strict interpretation to the provisions of the law, but this strictness has been somewhat relaxed in the more recent decisions. The first case involving the act was McShane v. Carter, 80 Cal. 310, 22 Pac. 178. That was a suit to enjoin an execution sale of mining property. The plaintiff claimed title through a conveyance from a mining corporation which had owned the property. The deed had not been ratified by the stockholders. The execution was issued on a judgment obtained against the corporation after the date of the deed. It was held that in the absence of ratification by the stockholders no title passed from the corporation. The court's view of the effect of the statute was stated in these words: "We think that the provision of said act goes to the power or authority of the directors. It cannot be construed to relate merely to their personal liability, for no penalty is imposed upon them; and to so construe would be to practically nullify the act. In our opinion the directors of mining corporations have no power or authority to convey the mining ground without the consent of holders of two-thirds of the stock, given as prescribed by the act. And it follows without such consent that title does not pass. And if this be so, the question can be raised by any one who connects himself with the title of the corporation which owned the property, as well as by the stockholders thereof." Pekin, etc., Mining Co. v. Kennedy, 81 Cal. 356, 22 Pac. 679, followed soon after McShane v. Carter, and approved the holding of that case to the effect that a deed by a mining corporation of any part of its mining ground not shown to have been ratified by two-thirds of the stockholders did not pass the title. These cases declared the rule—and the declaration was necessary to the decision in each instance—that the assent of two-thirds of the stockholders was essential to the validity of the acts described in the statute. McShane v. Carter and Pekin, etc., Mining Co. v. Kennedy were cited with approval in Granite Gold Mining Co. v. Maginness, 118 Cal. 137, 50 Pac. 269, although the particular transaction there involved was not shown to be within the purview of the statute. Again, in Johnson v. California Lustral Co., 127 Cal. 283, 59 Pac. 595, the decision was that a mortgage of mining ground of a mining corporation not ratified by the stockholders could not be foreclosed; the court saying: "The statute declares unlawful a mortgage or other disposition by the directors of the whole or any part of the mining ground of a mining corporation, except upon the ratification of the holders of two-thirds of the stock, and it must be enforced according to its intent. Several instances of its application have occurred"—citing McShane v. Carter and Pekin, etc., Mining Co. v. Kennedy.

With these decisions before it, the Supreme Court of the United States, in Williams v. Gaylord, 186 U. S. 157, 22 Sup. Ct. 798, 46 L. Ed. 1102, was called upon to consider the effect of the statute. The suit was brought in the United States Circuit Court by Williams to foreclose a mortgage made to him as the trustee of bondholders by the Gold Hill Mining Company, a West Virginia corporation, upon mining ground in California. The corporation defaulted, but foreclosure was resisted by purchasers at execution sales under judgments rendered against the corporation. The defense set up was the want of ratification of the mortgage by the stockholders. The defendants prevailed in the Circuit Court (96 Fed. 454) and in the Circuit Court of Appeals (102 Fed. 372, 42 C. C. A. 401). The case came to the Supreme Court on certiorari. That court, after deciding that the construction and effect of the statute were matters in which the federal courts would follow the decision of the state courts, proceeded to examine the cases above cited, and from them deduced the conclusion that this court had held (a) that without the consent of holders of two-thirds of the stock title to property attempted to be conveyed does not pass; and (b) that that consent must be evidenced in the manner prescribed by the act, i. e., "either in writing signed and acknowledged by such stockholders or by resolution duly passed at a stockholders' meeting called for that purpose." With respect to the second proposition, the court said: "This manner of ratification was held to be necessary as we have seen in McShane v. Carter, supra, and that case has not been limited or varied by any subsequent case, and we have no doubt of the power of the state to so prescribe. * * * Nor can we contest that power, though we might, if we were permitted to exercise an independent judgment, construe the statute as only illustrative and not as exhaustive of the manner of ratification." In Williams v. Gaylord, the Supreme Court of the United States was not declaring its own view of the statute. It was merely ascertaining and applying the construction given to a state statute by the highest court of the state. There is, therefore, nothing in the decision to prevent us from inquiring whether this court has not, by its decisions subsequent to Williams v. Gaylord, modified the strict interpretation given to the act by our earlier cases.

On the first point, i. e., that title does not pass in the absence of ratification by the stockholders, we think there is nothing in any later case which modifies the rule as declared in McShane v. Carter. The appellants place great reliance upon Galbraith v. Shasta Iron Company, 143 Cal. 94, 76 Pac. 901, in which it was held that one asserting a title in hostility to the corporation and to those claiming under it was not in a position to object that the corporation's deed had not been ratified as required. But this goes no further than the declaration of the court in McShane v. Carter. In the opinion in that case, after stating that title does not pass, the court goes on to say that "the question can be raised by any one who connects himself with the title of the corporation which owned the property, as well as by the stockholders thereof." It was not there suggested that strangers to the title might raise the question, and we do not think the statement that the title did not pass was intended to convey the idea that the transaction could be treated as void by persons having no relation to the title of the corporation. Here, however, the objection is made by the corporation itself and by stockholders, and the question whether the mortgage was, in the absence of ratification, absolutely void as to all parties, has no significance in connection with the point now under discussion. The parties here objecting are certainly in a position to insist that the instrument, if unratified, passed no title and created no lien.

On the proposition that the ratification of the stockholders must be in the manner and form prescribed by the statute, the statement in the McShane Case that the directors had no power or authority to convey without the consent of holders of two-thirds of the stock "given as prescribed by the act" has been materially modified by this court. In the first place, it should be noted that this declaration was not in strictness necessary to the decision in McShane v. Carter, since in that case, as in the other decisions of this court above cited, there was no contention that there had been a ratification by stockholders in any manner. But whether or not the statement be viewed as dictum, it can no longer, in view of the decision in Lacy v. Gunn, 144 Cal. 511, 78 Pac. 30, be regarded as a correct statement of the law. This was an action to quiet title. Both parties claimed through the Amalie Mining Company, the plaintiff under an execution sale and deed of the corporate property, and the defendant under a deed from one Ferris, to whom the company had made an assignment for the benefit of its creditors. The assignment antedated the judgment under which plaintiff was claiming. The property in question was mining property, and the deed from the corporation had not been ratified by the stockholders in the manner prescribed in the act. There was, however, evidence tending to show that the directors who authorized the making of the assignment were the actual owners of more than two-thirds of the stock. The court held that: "A previous consent or direction by two-thirds of the stockholders, although purported to have been made in the capacity of directors, is, as against creditors, equivalent to a subsequent ratification." It is true that this rule was, in its application to the particular case, limited to the effect of a conveyance as against creditors, and that it was not in terms extended so as to affect stockholders. But we see no reason for any distinction in this regard. Under the rule of McShane v. Carter, and the cases following it, any person connecting himself with the title of the corporation, as, for example, an execution creditor, was entitled to rely upon the provisions of the act, and no good ground suggests itself for saying that a conveyance, good as against a judgment creditor, would not be equally good as against a stockholder. Applying the doctrine, then, to stockholders, as well as to creditors, we think the rule declared in Lacy v. Gunn to be sound and reasonable. The act was designed for the protection of stockholders and to guard them against the improvident action of directors. Where the persons holding the required two-thirds of the stock have in a formal and unequivocal way announced their assent to the proposed transaction, their rights are as fully safeguarded as if they had ratified the transfer, purchase, or mortgage by subsequent writing or at a meeting. In other words, we think the proper rule is that suggested by the Supreme Court of the United States in Williams v. Gaylord, namely, that the statute should be construed "as only illustrative and not as exhaustive of the manner of ratification." If, then, Hodson was the holder of two-thirds of the stock of the British corporation at the time of the authorization and execution of the mortgage, his act in authorizing, executing, and acknowledging the mortgage as a director of the corporation answered every requirement of the act.

There remains the question whether Hodson was the holder of two-thirds of the stock, and, as such, empowered to ratify the mortgage. The court below seems to have proceeded on the theory that it must go behind the legal title, as disclosed by the corporate books, and find the holders of stock to be the persons who had the ultimate beneficial interest in the shares, and this, notwithstanding the fact that the record holder was himself beneficially interested, and that the shares had been put in his name, for proper and legitimate purposes, with the approval of the other parties in interest. We cannot give our assent to this view. The statute of 1880 provides that the ratification may be made either in writing, "signed and acknowledged by such stockholders or by resolution duly passed at any regularly called stockholders' meeting." It will, of course, not be questioned that, whichever of these methods be followed, the individuals authorized to ratify will be the same. If given persons form two-thirds of the stockholders authorized to vote at a stockholders' meeting, they may act as stockholders in signing and acknowledging a written ratification. The general rule is that the test of the right to vote as a stockholder at corporate meetings is the ownership of shares, as disclosed by the proper record books of the corporation. 3 Clark & Marshall on Priv. Cor. § 653; Hoppin v. Buffum, 9 R. I. 513, 11 Am. Rep. 291; State v. Ferris, 42 Conn. 560; In re Argus Printing Co., 1 N. D. 435, 48 N. W. 347, 12 L. R. A. 781, 26 Am. St. Rep. 639. In some jurisdictions the books furnish prima facie evidence of such right; in others, the showing of the corporate records is conclusive. In this state, so far, at least, as domestic corporations are concerned, the question seems to be definitely settled by statute. At the time of the enactment of the statute of 1880, and of the execution of the mortgage under consideration, section 312 of the Civil Code provided that: "At all elections or votes had for any purpose there must be a majority of the subscribed capital stock, or of the members, represented, either in person or by proxy in writing. Every person acting therein, in person or by proxy or representative, must be a member thereof or a bona fide stockholder, having stock in his own name on the stockbooks of the corporation at least ten days prior to the election. * * *" Since the section covers not only elections, but all votes, we take it (although this precise point is not here involved, and is, consequently, not decided) that the words "ten days prior to the election" are to be read, in the case of a vote for a purpose other than an election, as referring to a period prior to the meeting at which the vote is had. The section is sufficiently broad to cover a vote taken at a meeting of stockholders called under the act of 1880. At such meeting, the right to vote would reside in every "bona fide stockholder, having stock in his own name on the stockbooks of the corporation at least ten days prior to the" meeting, or, at least, at the time of the meeting. That Hodson was such stockholder is not to be doubted.

In Smith v. S. F. & N. P. Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 584, 47 Pac. 582, 35 L. R. A. 309, 56 Am. St. Rep. 119, this court held that the requirement of section 312 that the person voting be a "bona fide" stockholder authorized an inquiry into the character of the holding. In that case the ruling was that where the real owners of stock had, for the sole purpose of avoiding statutory liabilities, caused the stock to be registered in the names of persons having no interest in it, the nominal holders were not entitled to vote at an election for directors. But the court observed that the right to vote is, by the Code section, conferred upon "stockholders," not upon "owners" of stock, and recognizes that one may be a "bona fide" stockholder without having the sole, or, indeed, any beneficial, interest in the shares. "One may," says the court, "be a bona fide stockholder without being the owner of the stock. He may have caused himself to be registered as a stockholder in the utmost good faith, both toward the corporation and also toward his fellow stockholders, and yet he may not be the owner of the stock. * * * It may be placed in the name of one as trustee to hold under an express trust, without any interest in the stock, but for the sole purpose of applying the income or disposing of the proceeds of its sale according to the terms of the trust. It may be the property of an estate, and transferred into the name of the executor. In all such cases the transfer would be in good faith, and the person in whose name it was registered would be a 'bona fide' stockholder." The relations between the plaintiff, Van Ee, and Hodson were such as to make it entirely natural and proper that the stock should stand in Hodson's name. The plaintiff's interest in the shares was contingent and indefinite. Under the terms of the contract of February, 1898, the plaintiff might receive full payment in money, and, in that event, would not be entitled to any stock. Van Ee's agreement with Hodson was that the two should be equally interested in any shares remaining after the payment of $400,000 to plaintiff. At the time of the execution of the mortgage, neither Van Ee nor the plaintiff corporation had anything more than an uncertain, future, and contingent interest in an unascertainable number of shares of the stock. The existence of these equities, indefinite in extent, did not so affect the bona fides of Hodson's holding of the stock, as to deprive him of the rights vested by law in a stockholder. See Market St. Ry. Co. v. Hellman, 109 Cal. 571, 589, 42 Pac. 225. The case is in no way analogous to that of a mere nominal holder, or "dummy." At the date of the mortgage it would not have been possible for the plaintiff or Van Ee to show, as against Hodson, the right to a transfer of a single share.

We need not here consider whether section 312 of the Civil Code is applicable to the proceedings of foreign corporations. Even if the section be intended to prescribe a rule for the management of California corporations merely, it may well be looked to for aid in ascertaining the legislative intent in the enactment of the statute of 1880, which, as has been held, governed foreign as well as domestic mining corporations in their dealings with mining property situate in California. Pekin M., etc., Co. v. Kennedy, supra; Williams v. Gaylord, supra. The word "stockholder" is used in both the Code section and the act of 1880, and the interpretation given to the word in the one enactment is presumably applicable to the other. If we were to hold that section 312 has no application here, the question would be, simply, whether Hodson was a stockholder. We have already stated our reasons for concluding that he was a "bona fide stockholder." A fortiori, he was, if the requirement of bona fides be omitted, a "holder" of two-thirds of the stock.

The contention that, under the act of 1880, a ratification must be made by the persons owning the ultimate beneficial ownership in two-thirds of the stock, seems to be founded on a statement in Lacy v. Gunn, supra. The opinion in that case contains this declaration: "It is the actual owners of the stock, and not those who appear to be so, who are under the protection of the statute, and whose ratification or consent is required." This expression, like all declarations made by a court in disposing of a controversy, is to be read in the light of the facts considered. The court was examining the validity of a transfer by a mining corporation of mining property, assented to by the actual owners of two-thirds of the stock. The transfer was upheld on the theory that, as the act was for the benefit of stockholders, the purpose of the law was satisfied if the transfer had the approval of the requisite proportion of those really having the beneficial interest in the stock. This was a liberal and broad construction, adopted with a view to the establishment of rights acquired and claimed in good faith. But there was no intention of declaring that the stockholders and the corporation would not be equally bound by the ratification of those whom they had invested with the actual legal title to the stock. The latter are the persons authorized, under the statute, to act in the matter, although, in favor of parties claiming under the corporate conveyance, the courts may look behind the apparent ownership and sustain a ratification made by the beneficial owners.

It follows, from these views, that the findings against the validity of the mortgage or deed of trust are not sustained by the evidence. These findings furnish support for the conclusions that the cross-complainants are not entitled to a foreclosure, and that they are entitled to a money judgment for the amount actually advanced. If the mortgage be valid, the judgment must direct a sale for the amount of the debentures and the charges secured.

The decree must, therefore, so far as it embodies these conclusions, be reversed, as must the order denying the cross-complainants' motion for a new trial. It is urged that, instead of awarding a new trial, this court should direct the court below to enter a decree of foreclosure on the findings made. This claim is put upon the ground that, regardless of the alleged want of ratification of the mortgage, and its consequent invalidity, the corporation is estopped, under the facts found, to deny the binding effect of its attempted act, under which it received and has retained large sums. If the mortgage in fact lacked the assent of the requisite number of stockholders, we think the doctrine of estoppel cannot be applied so as to give the instrument validity. The statute of 1880 makes the stockholders "a component part of the power to make a mortgage effective." Curtin v. Salmon River, etc., Co., 130 Cal. 345, 351, 62 Pac. 552, 555, 80 Am. St. Rep. 132. If the directors could, without the assent of the stockholders, so act as to bind the corporation in matters in which such assent is made necessary, the purpose of the statute, i. e., the protection of stockholders, would be nullified. We do not say that there may not be circumstances under which the stockholders could be held estopped to rely on the want of ratification, but merely that such estoppel cannot be predicated upon the acts of the corporation or the directors alone. The finding upon which appellants rely relates solely to the conduct of the corporation.

A further ground is urged by cross-complainants for directing a judgment in their favor, to wit, that the pleadings admit that Hodson was the record holder of more than two-thirds of the stock and that he did acts amounting to a ratification of the mortgage. It would consume too much space to go into an elaborate analysis of the pleadings. Suffice it to say that we think the answers to the cross-complaint were clearly intended to raise issues on these points and that an unduly strict construction would be required to justify an order of judgment based upon the theory that there were no such issues. Nor do we think the findings on this point such as to justify a judgment of foreclosure.

The respondents suggest, as a ground for upholding the judgment in as far as it denies foreclosure, the point that the mortgage should be held invalid for the reason that it was executed to Hodson as one of the trustees and that Hodson himself was a director whose vote was necessary to authorize the execution of the mortgage. A sufficient answer to the point is that this defense was not within the issues. All of the pleadings in effect admitted the authorization and making of the deed of trust and based their objections to its validity solely on the ground that it did not have the ratification of the stockholders as required by the statute of 1880.

The third appeal (No. 1,764) may be briefly disposed of. That is the appeal of the British corporation and of Van Ee from that part of the judgment whereby the cross-complainants recover from the British corporation the amount of the advances made upon the faith of the debentures. It will be unnecessary to refer specifically to the grounds upon which this appeal is based. As we have shown in discussing the appeal of the cross-complainants (No. 1,744), this part of the judgment must fall with the granting of a new trial upon the issues affecting the foreclosure of the mortgage.

Accordingly, the following orders will be entered upon the respective appeals:

In No. 1,744: The portions of the judgment appealed from and the order denying a new trial are reversed.

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 30, 1910. Rehearing Denied July 28, 1910.)

1. Eminent Domain (§ 191*)—Acquisition of Right of Way for Electric Power Line—Complaint—Sufficiency.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1238, 1241, 1244, authorizing the exercise of the right of eminent domain for electric power, heat, and light lines, and providing that the complaint must contain a statement of the right of plaintiff, a complaint in an action to condemn a right of way for an electric power line, which avers that plaintiff is a corporation organized to furnish electric power, light, and heat to municipalities and the inhabitants thereof, that it seeks to condemn a right of way for the construction and operation of an electric power line to transmit electric power for public sale, and that plaintiff is in charge of the public use and the right to construct and maintain an electric power line, shows that plaintiff seeks a right of way for an electric power line for the transmission of electricity for sale to municipalities and the inhabitants thereof, and that the right of way is sought for a public use.

2. Eminent Domain (§ 66*)—Public Uses—Judicial Question.

The question of what is a public use for which land may be taken, is a judicial question, though in doubtful cases the legislative declaration on the subject is of great persuasive force.

3. Eminent Domain (§ 169*)—Acquisition of Right of Way for Electric Power Line.

A corporation organized to furnish electric power, heat, and light to municipalities and the inhabitants thereof, and to acquire a right of way for the transmission of electric power, may institute proceedings to condemn land for a right of way, without first making contracts to furnish electric power, or obtaining a franchise from a municipality, or making a contract therewith.

4. Eminent Domain (§ 196*)—Evidence—Admissibility.

Where, in a proceeding to condemn a right of way for an electric power line, a civil engineer described the course of the line, the general nature of the towers desired to be erected, and that after the line entered a county it ran on a private line, with the exception of crossing over county roads, the question as to how many county roads the line crossed over was immaterial, on the right to condemn the right of way.

5. Appeal and Error (§ 971*)—Review—Discretion of Court—Examination of Witnesses.

The extent to which a cross-examination may be carried rests largely in the discretion of the trial court, and to predicate error on the refusal to allow a question on cross-examination, it must appear that the materiality of the evidence sought is so evident, that injury will be presumed from its exclusion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3854; Dec. Dig. § 971.*]

6. ELECTRICITY (§ 9*)—ACQUISITION OF RIGHT OF WAY FOR ELECTRIC POWER LINE.

A corporation seeking to establish and maintain an electric power line to furnish electric power, heat, and light to municipalities and inhabitants thereof, has the right to construct its line in the manner and place it deems best, provided it uses the most available route, and provided the location is made in a manner most compatible with the greatest public good and least private injury; and the fact that it has not so located its line can only be established by clear and convincing proof.

7. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 200*)—COMPENSATION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In proceedings to condemn a right of way for an electric power line, the burden is on the owner of the land to prove the damages he will sustain.

8. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 222*)—COMPENSATION—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction in proceedings to condemn a right of way for an electric power line, that the burden of proof as to the value of the lands sought to be taken is on the owner, and unless he shows that he will be damaged by the erection of the towers and transmission line as contemplated, he may recover only nominal damages, is not erroneous, as suggesting that he is entitled to nominal damages only.

F. J. Castelhun, for appellant. Chickering & Gregory, for respondent.

COOPER, P. J. This action was brought to condemn a right of way over defendant's lands for an electric power line. The case was tried with the aid of a jury, and a verdict rendered fixing the amount of defendant's damages at $450. Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of plaintiff as prayed and fixing the damages for the right of way at the sum so found by the jury. Defendant prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and order.

The first contention made by defendant is that the court erred in overruling his demurrer to the complaint. His argument is that the complaint does not show that the use for which it is sought to condemn the property is a public use. The Code of Civil Procedure provides (section 1238) as follows: "Subject to the provision of this title the right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of the following public uses. * * *

"12. Canals, reservoirs, dams, ditches, flumes, aqueducts, and pipes and outlets natural or otherwise for supplying, storing, and discharging water for the operation of machinery for the purpose of generating and transmitting electricity for the supply of mines, quarries, railroads, tramways, mills, and factories with electric power; and also for the applying of electricity to light or heat mines, quarries, mills, factories, incorporated cities and counties, villages or towns; and also for furnishing electricity for lighting, heating, or power purposes to individuals or corporations, together with lands, buildings, and all other improvements in or upon which to erect, install, place, use, or operate machinery for the purpose of generating and transmitting electricity for any of the purposes or uses above set forth.

Section 1241 of said Code provides that before the property can be taken it must appear, first, that the use to which it is to be applied is a use authorized by law; second, that the taking is necessary to such use.

In condemnation proceedings the essentials required in the complaint are set forth in Code of Civil Procedure, section 1244, and after requiring that the name of the corporation or person in charge of the public use must be stated, it is provided that the complaint must contain "a statement of the right of plaintiff." This phrase evidently means a statement of the facts sufficient to show that the plaintiff is authorized to maintain the condemnation suit.

The complaint in this case contains the name of the corporation in charge of the alleged public use, and states that the corporation was organized and its purpose among other things was "to furnish electric power, light, and heat to counties, cities, villages and towns, and the inhabitants thereof, and to acquire by right of eminent domain rights of way over lands for the transmission of electric energy and power." The complaint further avers that the plaintiff seeks to condemn the right of way for a public use, to wit, "the construction, maintenance, and operation of an electric power line for the transmission of electric energy or power for public sale, which said electric power line is to be of the character described in this complaint." This is followed by a statement that the plaintiff is in charge of said public use and the right to construct, operate, and maintain an electric power line for such purpose, and to acquire and maintain a right of way for the same. While the complaint is certainly not a model as to the statement of facts showing that the use is a public use, yet it is sufficient when attacked by a general demurrer. It is evident the pleader intended to allege that its purpose was to engage in the operation of an electric power line for the transmission of electric energy and power for sale to the public generally; and although the words "for public sale" are used, we must look to all the allegations of the complaint in order to arrive at the solution of the question as to whether or not it states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Particularly is this so in the face of the fact that the defendant demurred to the complaint upon five special grounds, but did not intimate in either of the grounds that it could not be ascertained from the complaint that the use for which the right of way was sought was a public use.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The term "public use" is a term of indefinite signification. The statute authorizes the right of eminent domain in behalf of certain public uses, among which are included "electric power lines." While what is a public use is a judicial question, yet in a doubtful case the legislative declaration is of great persuasive force. Lindsay I. Co. v. Mehrtens, 97 Cal. 676, 32 Pac. 802; Walker v. Shasta Power Co., 160 Fed. 856, 87 C. C. A. 660, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 725. It fairly appears from the complaint in this case that the plaintiff sought the right of way for an electric power line for the transmission of electricity, to be sold to the public to furnish power, light, and heat to counties, cities, villages, and towns, and the inhabitants thereof. Clearly such are public uses, and are expressly so declared to be in the statute.

The main argument as to the special demurrer is that it does not appear and cannot be ascertained from the complaint that the plaintiff is under any contractual obligation to furnish electricity to any person for any purpose, or that it has a franchise to furnish electricity to any counties, cities, or villages through which the proposed line is to run. It is not necessary that the plaintiff should have made a contract to furnish electric power before it had installed its plant and procured the right of way for its line. To prevent the plaintiff from exercising the right of eminent domain until it shall have obtained a franchise from some city or village or made a contract to furnish its product to some city or village, would be to deprive it of the means by which it would be enabled to construct its works and put in a position to make a contract. Minn. Canal Co. v. Pratt, 101 Minn. 197, 112 N. W. 395, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 105. The Legislature, representing the people, has provided that the right of eminent domain may be exercised for electric power lines for public use. At the present day the use of electric power, not only for lighting streets and private houses, but also for the purpose of moving railroad cars, street cars, machinery for manufacturing purposes, and for use in mines and smelters, has become so general that it is almost a necessity of our modern civilization. The courts would not be aiding the great enterprises of the West by adopting a narrow and restricted view of the meaning of the words "public use," as used by the Legislature and in our Constitution. The evidence is sufficient to show that the plaintiff desires to construct its line for public and not for private use. The jury were fully and fairly instructed as to the various matters to be considered in arriving at the amount of damage to defendant, and their verdict upon the evidence is conclusive.

Appellant in his brief enumerates many alleged errors in the rulings of the court upon the admission or rejection of evidence which he characterizes as "glaring errors." The first one of these alleged errors—and presumably the most important in his estimation—is as to a question asked of the witness Zoffmann. Zoffmann testified in direct examination that he was a surveyor and civil engineer; that he had been engaged in running the electric line for plaintiff. He then described the point where the line commences and its general course, and stated that in its course it crosses the counties of Calaveras, Stanislaus, San Joaquin, and the lower portion of Alameda county, and runs to the Mission San José. He then described the general nature of the towers desired to be erected for the purpose of the power line, and particularly the towers desired to be erected on the defendant's land, and the distance of the proposed cable to the ground as it would pass over defendant's land. He then testified in cross-examination, in answer to questions asked by defendant's counsel, that after the line enters Alameda county it runs entirely on a private line, with the exception of crossing over county roads. The defendant's counsel then asked the witness the question: "How many county roads does it cross over?" The question was objected to upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and the judge of the trial court sustained the objection, at the same time stating that he did not see the materiality of it. Like the trial judge, we fail to see how it was material to the defendant as to the number of county roads the plaintiff's line crossed. It could not aid in the solution of the question before the court as to the plaintiff's right to condemn the right of way over defendant's land, and at the places where its proposed line was to cross the defendant's land, by showing that it crossed many public roads at other places than on defendant's land. Counsel has not even given us a reason why the evidence sought was material. He contents himself with saying, "Defendant submits that the question was proper cross-examination." It is elementary that the cross-examination of a witness, and the extent to which such cross-examination may be carried, rest largely in the discretion of the trial court, and that in order to predicate error upon the refusal to allow a question to be asked on such cross-examination, it must appear that the evidence sought was relevant and material; and not only this, but that its materiality is so evident that injury will be presumed from its exclusion. The other objections and alleged errors, while several in number, are of similar import. It is sufficient to say that we have examined them, and find none of them of sufficient importance to justify discussion.

Complaint is made that the court instructed the jury to the effect that the plaintiff under the law has the right to construct its line in the manner and place it deems best, provided it uses the most available route, and provided that the location is made in a manner most compatible with the greatest public good and the least private injury; and that in case it is claimed that the plaintiff has not so located its line, the proof must be clear and convincing. In our opinion the rule is correctly stated in the instruction. It is in almost the identical language used by the Chief Justice in City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 255, 27 Pac. 604, where it is said: "The state, or its agents in charge of a public use, must necessarily survey and locate the land to be taken, and are by statute expressly authorized to do so. Code Civ. Proc. § 1242. Exercising as they do a public function under express statutory authority, it would seem that in this particular their acts should, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be presumed correct and lawful. The selection of a particular route is committed in the first instance to the person in charge of the use, and unless there is something to show an abuse of discretion, the propriety of his selection ought not to be questioned; for certainly it must be presumed that the state or its agent has made the best choice for the public, and if this occasions peculiar and unnecessary damage to the owners of the property affected, the proof of such damage should come from them. And we think that when an attempt is made to show that the location made is unnecessarily injurious the proof ought to be clear and convincing; for otherwise no location could ever be made. If the first selection made on behalf of the public could be set aside on slight or doubtful proof, a second selection would be set aside in the same manner, and so ad infinitum. The improvement could never be secured, because whatever location was proposed it could be defeated by showing another just as good." See, further, San Francisco & S. J. V. Ry. Co. v. Leviston, 134 Cal. 413, 66 Pac. 473; Kansas Ry. Co. v. Northwestern Coal Co., 161 Mo. 288, 61 S. W. 684, 51 L. R. A. 936, 84 Am. St. Rep. 717.

Complaint is made of the eleventh instruction given by the court to the jury at the plaintiff's request. The instruction is as follows: "I charge you that the burden of proof as to the value of the lands of defendant was upon the defendant. Unless he has shown you by sufficient proof that he will be damaged by the erection of said towers and transmission line as in said complaint contained, then that he is entitled only to a nominal damage at your hands." The rule was correctly stated to the effect that the burden of proof was upon the defendant to prove the damages he would sustain. The court did not, as suggested by counsel, tell the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to only nominal damages. The instructions elsewhere fully covered the subject, and stated to the jury the matters and things to be considered by them in determining the amount of damages to which the defendant would be entitled. And not only this, but by their verdict it is shown that they gave the defendant substantial and not nominal damages.

Other instructions are criticised, but we find no substantial error in the giving or refusing any instruction to which our attention is called. The court seems to have given to the jury a full and fair statement of the law applicable to the issues and the questions which were before the court.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Petition by the State Board of Health of the State of California for writ of mandate against the Board of Trustees of Watsonville School District of Santa Cruz County and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

J. E. Gardner, for appellant. James A. Hall, for respondents.

COOPER, P. J. This case comes here on appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Santa Cruz county, sustaining the demurrer of the defendants to plaintiff's petition for a writ of mandate, and directing the entry of judgment for the defendants, and that the plaintiff's petition herein be dismissed. The plaintiff is the state board of health, and the defendants are the trustees of Watsonville school district. The petition must be taken as true for the purposes of this decision. It appears therefrom that the petitioner has demanded, and that the defendants as such trustees have at all times refused, and now refuse, to exclude from the benefit of the common schools of said district all unvaccinated children residing therein. It is claimed to be the duty of defendants, as trustees, by virtue of their office, to exclude from said school all school children who have not been vaccinated, under an act of the Legislature entitled "An act to encourage and provide for general vaccination in the state of California," approved February 20, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 32). It is contended by the said school trustees that the said act is unconstitutional and void for the reason that it is an abuse of the police power of the state.

We have no doubt as to the constitutionality of the act. The Legislature must necessarily be the judge as to legislation under the police power for the public health and for the purpose of preventing the spread of contagious diseases, the means used to prevent such spread, and the diseases regarded as contagious. It is invested with a large discretion within the scope of its powers, which discretion cannot be controlled by the courts except in cases where such discretion has been plainly abused. Its acts are the acts of the people; and as the Legislature is selected by the people for the purpose of enacting legislation, if an act is oppressive and unjust, the remedy is with the people through the Legislature. It is not for the courts to interfere, or in any way to set up their judgment against that of the Legislature, as to the general police powers of the state. It is sufficient for the purposes of this decision that the act has been held constitutional in Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 227, 24 Pac. 383, and in French v. Davidson, 143 Cal. 659, 77 Pac. 663.

The statute is not directory, but mandatory. It provides: "The trustees of the several common school districts in this state and boards of common school government in the several cities and towns are directed to exclude from the benefits of the common schools therein any child or any person who has not been vaccinated, until such time when such child or person shall be successfully vaccinated. * * *" It is the plain duty of the trustees, and they are directed by the express terms of the statute, to exclude from the public schools any child or person who has not been vaccinated. Until the child has been vaccinated he must be excluded from the schools. If the trustees could use their discretion, and of their own will at times exclude and at other times admit to the schools children who have not been vaccinated, or if the trustees could exclude some children and admit others, the law would be uncertain and of little value. It was never the intention under the terms of the act that the board of trustees should possess such discretion. By its terms all are to be excluded, and the exclusion is to continue as to all until they have complied with the law. The duty devolves upon defendants by virtue of their office to exclude such children. They must obey and not question the law. They are not compelled to hold their respective offices as such trustees; but while in office it is their duty, and the duty of each and every one of them, to see that the law is enforced, and this whether the law is popular or unpopular, or whether they believe in the vaccination of children or otherwise. The law having been passed by the people, it is the duty of the trustees and of all persons to obey it until it is repealed.

The act was not repealed by the subsequent compulsory education act (St. 1905, p. 388). The latter act is not inconsistent with the former. Repeals by implication are not favored. The parents of children are compelled to send them to school under the latter act, but they must comply with the law as to having them vaccinated in case they desire to avail themselves of the privilege of sending them to the common school. There is nothing in the latter act to show that it was intended to supersede or do away with or in any way modify the previous act.

Ex parte MILLER. (Cr. 119.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 6, 1910.)

1. Licenses (§ 40*)—Failure to Obtain—Criminal Prosecutions—"Law."

Though an ordinance of a county requiring one engaged in the business of raising cattle to pay a license fee does not denounce failure to obtain the license as a crime, one so failing is subject to prosecution by virtue of Pen. Code, § 435, declaring guilty of a misdemeanor every person who commences or carries on any business without procuring a license required by "any law of this state" for the carrying on of the same; an ordinance being a law within such code provision.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4014–4023; vol. 8, p. 7701.]

2. Licenses (§ 7*)—Regulation of Business—Fees.

The license fee, imposed by a county ordinance on the business of raising cattle, of seven cents for each head of cattle, the entire tax in the county for any year not amounting to over $700, cannot be held unreasonable, as against the presumption to the contrary, in view of the probable expense to the county that may be caused by the business.

3. Habeas Corpus (§ 11*)—Voluntary Restraint.

Where, even if at the very moment petitioner applied for the writ, he was in the custody of the officer, it was only momentary and voluntary, and invited for the purpose of obtaining a decision as to the validity of an ordinance, habeas corpus will not lie.

Application of Dave Miller for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged and proceeding dismissed.

Edward F. Treadwell, for appellant. Pat. R. Parker, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The petitioner was charged in the justice court of Bridgeport township, county of Mono, with misdemeanor in having commenced and carried on within said county "the business of raising, grazing, herding, and pasturing cattle without having taken out or procured a license therefor, as required by an ordinance of the board of supervisors of said county."

The said ordinance requires on the part of every one engaged in such business the payment to the tax collector of the sum of seven cents for each cow, heifer, bull, or bullock, owned by, in the possession or under the control of, such person and used in such business in Mono county.

It is claimed that petitioner is entitled to his discharge for two reasons: First, the ordinance does not provide that the act complained of shall be a crime; and secondly, the ordinance is "unreasonable, unconstitutional, and void, and was not passed for the purpose of regulating the business therein referred to, but was passed solely for the purpose of raising revenue."

The ordinance does indeed omit to denounce as a crime the failure to secure said license, but petitioner was amenable to prosecution by virtue of section 435 of the Penal Code, providing that "every person who commences or carries on any business, trade, profession, or calling, for the transaction or carrying on of which a license is required by any law of this state, without taking out or procuring the license prescribed by such law, is guilty of a misdemeanor." It has been held by the Supreme Court that "any law of this state" includes ordinances of counties and municipalities. Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 208, 24 Pac. 747; Ex parte Mansfield, 106 Cal. 400, 39 Pac. 775; Ex parte Bagshaw, 152 Cal. 701, 93 Pac. 864.

The second ground of attack is equally untenable. It is well settled that the "police power, the power to make laws to secure the comfort, convenience, peace, and health of the community, is an extensive one, and in its exercise a very wide discretion as to what is needful or proper for the purpose is necessarily committed to the legislative body in which the power to make such laws is vested." Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152. "The manner and extent of such regulation are primarily legislative questions, and the courts will not interfere, unless it clearly appears that the Legislature has, under the guise of regulation, imposed an arbitrary or unreasonable burden upon the use of property or the pursuit of an occupation." County of Plumas v. Wheeler, 149 Cal. 762, 87 Pac. 911. "It is always a judicial question whether a particular regulation of the right to pursue a useful business is a valid exercise of the police power, though the authority of the courts to declare any regulation invalid will be exercised with the utmost caution. An ordinance must be clearly shown by the attacking party to be obnoxious and unreasonable to authorize the interference of the court." In re McCoy, 10 Cal. App. 116, 101 Pac. 419.

And, as stated in County of Plumas v. Wheeler, supra: "It is to be remembered that the presumption is in favor of the reasonableness of the charge, and that the county is not limited to the exact amount of the expense, as it may subsequently develop. 'The municipality is at liberty to make the charge large enough to cover any reasonable, anticipated expense.' Atlantic, etc., Tel. Co. v. Philadelphia, 190 U. S. 160 [23 Sup. Ct. 817, 47 L. Ed. 995]. What expense the county will be put to in the enforcement of the ordinance cannot be determined from an inspection of the ordinance itself. * * * To arrive at the amount of such expense it would be necessary to consider the topographical conditions of the county, the extent of the industry as practiced there, the effect of the industry on the roads, trails and other public property of the county, the probable cost of prosecutions for violations of the ordinance and any other matters having a reasonable tendency to indicate the cost to which the county would be subjected by the business sought to be regulated." It was there held that a tax of 10 cents per head upon sheep and lambs, in the absence of evidence as to cost of regulation, could not be adjudged unreasonable.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Some evidence was taken in the matter before us, but it cannot be said that it clearly appears therefrom that the tax in question is unreasonable and oppressive. The amount realized from the license is comparatively small, and the showing made by petitioner falls far short of that considered by this court in the McCoy Case, supra. The amount of the tax upon all the owners of the cattle does not exceed—so it is admitted—the sum of $700 a year, and some years it is much less. This certainly appears quite reasonable in view of the probable expense to the county that may be caused by the business, and while the evidence as to this is unsatisfactory and indefinite, it cannot be said that the presumption is overcome that said expense may approximate the amount of the tax, or that the board of supervisors was not entirely justified in concluding that the tax was proper to meet "a reasonable, anticipated expense."

But there is another reason why the application should be denied, and that is found in the return of the sheriff "that on November 1, 1909, the said Dave Miller did come to me as said sheriff, and state that he desired to surrender himself to my custody and release his bail, and whatever custody or control I now have is solely under this surrender. Upon the said Dave Miller thus surrendering himself I did not assume actual custody or control of the person of the said petitioner, and he was permitted his own recognizance, and has never by me been in restraint or jeopardy." It thus appears that, if at the very moment the petitioner applied for the writ he was in the custody of the officer, it was only momentary and voluntary, and invited for the purpose of obtaining a decision as to the validity of said ordinance. This practice is said to be not within the spirit of the habeas corpus act, and not to be countenanced by the courts. In the case of In re Gow, 139 Cal. 243, 73 Pac. 145, the practice is condemned in the following language: "Our conclusion is that such a practice ought not to be countenanced, and hereafter the court will make strict inquiry in this class of cases whether the alleged imprisonment is actual and involuntary, and if it is found to be, as in this case, a merely nominal restraint, voluntarily submitted to for the purpose of making a case, the proceeding will be dismissed."

For the foregoing reasons, the writ is discharged and the proceeding dismissed.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 17, 1910.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 322*)—BREACH—KNOWLEDGE OF OTHER PARTY.

Evidence held to support a finding that one who had contracted to have an electrical plant installed in a boat was fully informed that the plant had been improperly installed, acquiesced in all delays in the installment thereof, and with knowledge of such facts made a payment to the contractor.

2. CONTRACTS (§ 305*)—BREACH—WAIVER BY ACCEPTANCE OF WORK.

Where one, hiring work done and material furnished under contract, accepts them as in accordance with the contract and pays therefor, with full knowledge that the work and materials do not comply with the contract, he waives the right to seek damages therefor.

Action by the Sirch Electrical & Testing Laboratories against F. A. Garbutt. Judgment for defendant on the complaint, and for plaintiff on the counterclaim, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Murphey and Murphey & Poplin, for appellant. C. S. Tappan, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Action to recover balance due on contract for constructing and installing an electric lighting and heating plant, with counterclaim for damages for failure to comply with contract. Judgment was for defendant for his costs on the complaint, and for plaintiff on the counterclaim. Defendant appeals from that part of the judgment which denies him relief on his counterclaim, and the record is presented under the alternative method.

The plaintiff agreed to construct, on a boat belonging to defendant, an electrical plant, to be comprised of engine, generator, switchboard, storage batteries, electric cooking range, searchlight, and the necessary wiring and equipment to operate the same, and to perform the labor necessary to install the plant, and do the engineering required for and the superintending of the installation of said plant, for which defendant was to pay the actual cost of material and apparatus purchased and manufactured, 75 cents per hour for labor in installing the plant, transportation of workmen from Los Angeles to San Pedro, and their board and lodging at the latter place if they remained there while engaged in the work, and for engineering and superintending 15 per cent. of the actual cost of the plant, such cost in any event to be not less than $2,500 for this purpose. The complaint alleges that plaintiff expended $3,700.81; that there was additional apparatus purchased by it in the sum of $320.39 for use in the plant, which was billed to defendant, upon which it is entitled to a commission; that there have been paid on said items, respectively, $3,437.64 on account of materials, and $200 on account of commissions, leaving an unpaid balance of $666.72 due from defendant to plaintiff.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The answer denies that the materials were of any greater value than the sum paid by defendant to plaintiff, and denies any indebtedness on account of commissions, for the reason that the contract was not complied with by plaintiff and no commissions earned. The counterclaim of defendant of $5,754.03 is made up of the $3,437.64 paid to plaintiff for materials, which it is contended are lost to defendant, because the plant is valueless and useless to him, except that portion thereof which may be used as a lighting plant which is of the value of $1,000, and certain fixtures, air compressor, and searchlight, of the value of $320.39, and the further alleged items of $1,000 damages for loss of use of the boat for two months, owing to delay of plaintiff with the work done; $500 damages for loss of use of the plant for six months, and $500 for completion of installation of parts of the plant left unfinished by plaintiff.

The trial court found: The contract to have been made as alleged; that plaintiff pursuant thereto purchased material and apparatus and performed labor to the value of $3,610.98, but did not complete said plant in accordance with the contract; that "defendant had paid to plaintiff" said sum ($3,610.98) "with full knowledge that said contract had not been carried out in accordance with the agreement entered into between plaintiff and defendant"; * * * "that by reason of said failure to complete said contract" plaintiff "is not entitled to recover any further or additional remuneration for said services rendered, other than said sum of $3,610.98, paid by defendant to plaintiff under the terms of said contract"; that defendant was not damaged in any sum whatever by reason of the delays in installing the plant; and that defendant is not indebted to plaintiff in any sum under the contract. The two findings, however, as to which appellant principally urges error, are as follows: "(6) That defendant was fully informed of the fact that said plant had been improperly installed by plaintiff, and defendant acquiesced in any and all delays in the installation of said plant, and, with full knowledge of said facts, the defendant paid said sum of $3,610.98 to plaintiff." "(9) The court further finds that, in respect to the counterclaim of defendant against plaintiff, any damage suffered by reason of the nonperformance of said contract by plaintiff has been waived by reason of defendant, with full knowledge of said facts, having paid for and accepted said work."

We are of opinion that there is evidence in the record to sustain these findings. While defendant testified that he was not an electrical expert, he further testified that, after he became suspicious of the electrical ability of plaintiff's supervising manager, Mr. Sirch, he consulted experts and took their advice in the matter; that he was "on the job" generally six or seven times a week, always once a week, for two or three hours; and that, at the second visit of Sirch to the boat, he (Sirch) was guilty of such manifest absurdities in his attempts to take measurements of the boat for the purpose of installing the plant as caused the defendant and his construction foreman to look at each other and smile. This was before any work was done on the contract. The witness Sirch also testified that defendant personally directed the designing, the placing of the conduits, and their quality, and passed upon every step as the work progressed, including the wiring of the circuits, and how they would have to be, and the location of each piece of machinery. "He instructed what he wanted there, and I did what he said." The bill of particulars rendered by plaintiff shows services performed and material furnished between April and December, 1907, principally prior to September; and the 14 checks of defendant introduced as evidence of payments made by him to plaintiff for the work done under the contract bore dates running from April 29, 1907, to December 21, 1907. This would seem to support finding 6 without further examination of the record. That the later correspondence between the parties contained charges of misrepresentation and bad faith made by each to the other is not evidence that defendant did not accept the work as done by plaintiff. It was not necessary that the entire work be completed before there could be an acceptance of any of the work by the defendant. There was evidence to sustain the finding of the court to this effect.

The contention of appellant that the decision is against law is equally untenable. The defendant, with full knowledge of all the defects in the work, accepted and paid for it, and he thereby waived his claim for damages. This is not a case in which judgment has been given on a quantum valebant or quantum meruit count, but one in which the court has found that goods and labor to a certain value have been furnished under the contract and so accepted by defendant, notwithstanding they were not up to the standard fixed by the contract. In other words, there has been an extinction of the obligation of plaintiff to make good the breach of contract of which it was guilty by an acceptance of the work by defendant, which is in the nature of an accord and satisfaction. The court did not recognize the plaintiff's right to retain the amount received by it from defendant on the ground that the goods furnished and services rendered were reasonably worth that amount, but because defendant accepted them in compliance with the contract and paid that amount for them. There is no common count in the complaint.

The residue of the damage claim of defendant, which covered all but the matters which the court found were accepted, consisted of damages for delay, repairs, etc., and all these were negatived by the court's findings.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Carol Crouse-Prouty and another against Julia A. N. Rogers and another. There was judgment for defendants, and from an order granting a new trial they appeal. Affirmed.

Haas, Garrett & Dunnigan, for appellants. O. B. Carter and Schweitzer & Hutton, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Action to quiet title. Judgment went for defendants; plaintiffs moved for a new trial, which motion was granted, and defendants prosecute this appeal from the order granting the same.

The judgment was based upon certain findings of the court to the effect that the purchase price of the lot in controversy was not paid to Glassell pursuant to the contract; that the deed to plaintiff Carol Crouse-Prouty did not describe the land set out in the complaint; that at the time defendant Julia Nolan Rogers received the deed to the lot she had no notice, either actual or constructive, of the deed from the corporation to plaintiff, and that plaintiff had no claim of right, title, or interest in and to the lot in question, as to all of which findings the evidence was conflicting.

The grounds of the motion for a new trial were insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, newly discovered evidence embodied in affidavits used upon the hearing of the motion, and errors of law occurring at the trial. In such cases, where the order, as here, is general, this court will not disturb the ruling of the trial court, unless the making of the order constitutes an abuse of discretion. Brooks v. San Francisco, etc., Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 178, 42 Pac. 570; Cole v. Wilcox, 99 Cal. 552, 34 Pac. 114; Von Schroeder v. Spreckels, 147 Cal. 186, 81 Pac. 515.

On December 26, 1885, Andrew Glassell, who was the common source of title, entered into a contract with Ralph and W. E. Rogers, whereby he agreed to sell and convey to them a large tract of land, which included the lot in controversy. On March 24, 1886, Ralph and W. E. Rogers transferred this agreement for purchase to a corporation known as the Garvanza Land Company, which, under the terms of the agreement, caused a portion of the land to be subdivided into lots and blocks and designated it as "Garvanza Addition No. 1," map of which was duly recorded. On June 19, 1886, the corporation, for a valuable consideration, executed a deed, which was duly recorded, to plaintiff Carol Crouse-Prouty, whereby it conveyed to her the lot in question. After the execution of this deed by the corporation, and on December 15, 1886, the corporation transferred the Glassell contract to W. F. McClure, who, on the day following, assigned it to Ralph Rogers. On July 12, 1888, Glassell executed a grant deed to Ralph Rogers of the lands described in the said contract, excepting therefrom certain tracts, which excepted lands did not, however, include the lot involved in this action. W. E. Rogers joined Glassell in the execution of this conveyance. This deed recited payment of the consideration mentioned in the contract, and that "this deed is delivered and accepted in satisfaction of the existing obligations of the party of the first part (Glassell) by reason of said contract of December 26, 1885." On January 2, 1892, Ralph Rogers conveyed the lot in question, together with other lands, to one Conway, from whom, by mesne conveyance, defendants acquired whatever title they have to the lot. It thus appears that plaintiffs' claim of title to the lot is by virtue of the deed from the Garvanza Land Company, whose only interest in the lot was by virtue of the Glassell contract, while defendants claim under a subsequent deed made by Ralph Rogers after he had acquired title to the property by a deed executed pursuant to the Glassell contract.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The record contains evidence which tends to prove that Ralph Rogers organized the Garvanza Land Company as an agency by means whereof to more conveniently conduct the real estate business in which he was then engaged, and make sales of lands and interest owned by him; that he owned practically all of the stock and was president of the corporation; that the other directors and officers, except W. E. Rogers, who for a short period held a comparatively small amount of stock which Ralph subsequently acquired, were mere dummies; that all the persons, including the corporation, in whom the title to the property was at any time vested, held the same without consideration and as trustee for Ralph Rogers; that defendant Julia Nolan Rogers, at the time she claims to have acquired the lot by purchase for a valuable consideration, had actual notice of the conveyance of the lot to plaintiff Carol Crouse-Prouty, and of the fact that she claimed ownership under the deed from the corporation. Moreover, under the facts presented, the court might be justified in holding the record of plaintiff's deed sufficient to impart constructive notice. Rogers v. McCartney, 3 Cal. App. 34, 84 Pac. 215.

This and other evidence on the part of plaintiff, including a number of affidavits of newly discovered evidence presented at the hearing, tended to establish facts contrary to those found by the court, and, by reason of the granting of the motion, it must be presumed that the court arrived at the conclusion upon the hearing thereof that the evidence upon which it based the findings was insufficient, either with or without the newly discovered evidence shown by affidavits, to support them. The record fails to disclose any abuse of discretion on the part of the court in granting the motion.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by Marcus S. Koshland and others against F. C. Cherry and others. From a judgment of nonsuit and an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. V. Bouldin and C. P. Kaetzel, for appellants. Thomas A. Norton and W. H. Spencer, for respondents.

TAGGART, J. Action to restrain city from removing gate erected across alley by plaintiffs. Plaintiffs appeal from judgment of nonsuit and an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Rose alley is a cul de sac about 12 feet wide, extending from Monterey street into block No. 13, of the city of San Luis Obispo, and terminating at the center of a creek in the middle of the block called San Luis Obispo creek. Plaintiffs' property extends along one side of the alley its full length. The wall of a building thereon, commonly known as the Sinsheimer store, follows the line for about one hundred feet of the way and a fence and warehouse, belonging to plaintiffs, the rest of the distance. When the Sinsheimer building was erected, some 23 years before the trial of this action, a gate was built by plaintiffs' predecessors in interest across the alley at the southeast corner of the building, and ever since that time the occupants of the Sinsheimer store have controlled and occupied the rear end of the alley as a part and parcel of the back yard of that building and used the other portion of the alley as a way to and from the rear of their premises. The defendants as the trustees and superintendent of streets of the city threaten to tear down the gate and open up the alley to the use of the public its entire length; hence this action.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The complaint alleges ownership and possession, continuous inclosure, use, and occupancy of the premises by plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest "as a back yard and for storage purposes," and the ownership of the gate in question. It further alleges that there never has been a street, alley, road, public or private, across said parcel of land or any part thereof; that no proceedings were ever taken to acquire it for road purposes, no such use made of it, no money expended in its maintenance, and no acceptance of it as a street.

The title papers stipulated as introduced were a deed from one Brizzolara to Sinsheimer, a deed from Sinsheimer and wife to S. Koshland, and a decree of distribution in the estate of S. Koshland, deceased, to plaintiffs, in all of which instruments Rose alley is called for as a boundary line from the center of the creek to Monterey street. It appears by the oral testimony of the chairman of the board of trustees of the town of San Luis Obispo, at the time, that he received the patent from the United States government for the city "in trust for the occupants," about 1868. (The patent was not introduced and no plat or survey of the town or city or the field notes are in the record.) This witness further testified that at the date of the patent he knew the place that is called Rose alley, and "I can't at that time say whether I saw any particular travel over said alley." He was in San Luis Obispo off and on in 1852 and 1853 and made it his permanent residence after 1857. The city clerk, who was the only other witness, testifying to the early user of the land, said he had been familiar with Rose alley since 1862, and that from that time down there had been travel through it. "It was simply used for taking horses in there to water and also delivering goods to the Brizzolara store." That formerly the gate was in the side line of the alley running down from the building on the premises to the center of the creek, instead of across the alley.

It is not quite clear whether appellants rely upon an adverse title to or an easement or way acquired over the premises in question. It is stipulated that no taxes have ever been paid on the premises by plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest, but to this, in support of their theory of an adverse title acquired, they reply that there is no evidence that any taxes have ever been assessed against the property. If this were a public alley, as defendants contend, there would be no assessment of it, and the case may be considered upon this basis. So, also, it must be admitted that any user by plaintiffs and their predecessors of a public alley for the purposes of an alley could not be presumed to be adverse to the public's right. There is no evidence in the case to which application can be made of the authorities cited by appellants, that the title of a city to lots held for sale for building or other private purposes may be lost by adverse possession. Ames v. San Diego, 101 Cal. 390, 35 Pac. 1005; San Francisco v. Straut, 84 Cal. 124, etc., 24 Pac. 814. There is nothing in the record from which it can be determined that Rose alley is a lot or parcel of land "remaining unproved" under section 9 of the act of March 23, 1868 (St. 1867-68, p. 247). Neither can it be said that this alley was one laid out by the Harris and Ward map, or any other map or survey made after the title thereto had vested in the town authorities of San Luis Obispo in trust for the owner, as was the case with the tract considered in Cerf v. Pfleging, 94 Cal. 131, 29 Pac. 417. The meager testimony in the record shows without contradiction that Rose alley was known as such and used for the purposes of an alley as early as 1862, and so continued down to the issuance of the patent by the United States. The trust for which the town trustees took the title to it therefore was to maintain it as an alley.

In ascertaining whether or not a highway, park, or public place has been accepted by user, the purpose which the way, park, or place is fitted or intended to serve must be the standard by which to determine the extent and character of use which constitutes an acceptance. Rose alley was not a thoroughfare, and the uses to which it could be put by the public were, of course, somewhat limited. The taking of horses to water in the creek during the early days was a common use such as the public might have made of it. So also the gaining of access by the people at large to the surrounding property by delivery wagons, as well as to the stream of water. The testimony does not show that this use was limited exclusively to the delivery wagons of the occupants of the premises now owned by plaintiffs. An accepted public highway cannot, as a general rule, be destroyed or acquired by adjacent private proprietors by adverse holding, and there is no element of estoppel here which would bring the case within any exception suggested.

Judgment and order appealed from affirmed.

1. APPEARANCE (§ 8*)—WHAT CONSTITUTES—OBJECTION TO SURETIES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1014, providing that a defendant appears when he answers, demurs, or gives plaintiff written notice of his appearance, or when an attorney gives notice of appearance for him, a notice served by defendant's attorneys on plaintiff's attorney that defendant excepted to the sufficiency of plaintiff's sureties on an undertaking given by plaintiff to secure an attachment, and demanding that the sureties justify, did not constitute an appearance obviating the necessity of service in order to confer jurisdiction to render judgment by default, though an appearance by defendant's attorneys in court to move for affirmative relief would constitute such appearance.

Action by Isidor Salmonson against L. Streiffer. From an order granting defendant's motion to set aside his default and vacate a judgment against him, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Isidore B. Dockweiler, for appellant. Goldberg & Meily, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff appeals from an order of court granting defendant's motion to set aside his default and vacate the judgment rendered thereon against him. Respondent assigns several grounds upon which he insists the record herein is not entitled to be considered upon this appeal for any purpose. We deem it unnecessary to pass upon this contention for the reason that, accepting the record at appellant's valuation thereof, it discloses no error in the ruling of the court.

As appears from the transcript the complaint was filed November 9, 1908. No summons was ever served upon defendant. On November 13, 1908, defendant caused to be served upon plaintiff's attorney a notice as follows: "You and each of you will please take notice that the defendant herein hereby excepts to the sufficiency of the sureties upon the undertaking heretofore given by said plaintiff in said action to secure an attachment therein, and demands that said sureties justify as required by law. Goldberg & Meily, Attorneys for Defendant." On December 14th, in the absence of service or filing of any other documents on behalf of defendant, the clerk entered defendant's default, the ground assigned therefor being that defendant had been regularly served with process and had failed to appear and answer plaintiff's complaint. Judgment followed upon the same date. Thereafter, pursuant to notice duly given, defendant made his motion to set aside the default and vacate the judgment upon the ground that the court never obtained jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. This motion was granted.

Appellant contends that excepting to the sufficiency of the sureties upon the undertaking, notice of which was served upon plaintiff, constituted a voluntary appearance in the action on the part of defendant. We cannot assent to this proposition.

Section 1014, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "A defendant appears in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives the plaintiff written notice of his appearance, or when an attorney gives notice of appearance for him." In Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 305, 45 Pac. 471, the court, through Mr. Justice Temple, in discussing the effect to be given under this provision to stipulations extending defendant's time to answer, says: "But it is contended by respondent that by taking and filing the stipulation extending the time to answer, and by accepting and acting upon the agreement to grant successive extensions in consideration of certain payments made, defendant appeared in the action. Section 1014 of the Code of Civil Procedure defines what shall constitute an appearance. A defendant appears in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives written notice of his appearance, or when an attorney gives notice of an appearance for him, and he can appear in no other way. This statute was intended to settle all disputes upon the subject. There can be no chance for argument about equivocal acts. * * * There was no need of a statute to tell us that the acts specified would constitute appearance. The occasion for a rule was to dispose of questions upon which there might be dispute." There is no ambiguity or uncertainty in the statement made by the learned judge to the effect that the purpose of the rule was to dispose of questions upon which there might be dispute. While the statute requires the notice of appearance by defendant in pro. per. to be a written notice, such requirement is not exacted when the notice is given for him by an attorney. In such case, it need not necessarily be in writing. It may be given by the act of appearing in open court upon an application for affirmative relief which could only be granted upon the hypothesis that defendant had submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court. Security, etc., Co. v. Boston, etc., Co., 126 Cal. 418, 58 Pac. 941, 59 Pac. 296. The mere giving of a notice of a motion to be made at a certain time and place for the dissolution of an attachment issued in the cause would not constitute such an appearance. In Glidden v. Packard, 28 Cal. 649, it was expressly held that the notice of a motion to dissolve an attachment did not constitute an appearance authorizing the entry of defendant's default. If, however, pursuant to such notice, the attorney appears in court and makes the motion, such act on the part of the attorney would be sufficient to constitute notice of appearance. In excepting to the sufficiency of sureties defendant is not required to appear in court. Such notice does not even contemplate his appearance therein for any purpose; neither does it contemplate an application to the court for any relief whatsoever. The giving of it imposes upon the plaintiff the duty of having the sureties, or others in their place, justify, not before the court, but before the judge or clerk thereof, and in case of failure so to do, the judge or clerk must issue an order vacating the writ of attachment. In Steinbach v. Leese, 27 Cal. 295, the court, in discussing this section of the Code, says: "The words 'answer' and 'demurs' are obviously words of enumeration, and we cannot, on received principles, interpolate into the text notices of motion for new trials, notices of appeal, nor any other paper served incidentally in the conduct of judicial proceedings, the direct and principal purpose of which is, not to give notice of appearance, but to give notice of a step taken or about to be taken in the cause."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

In our judgment, excepting to the sufficiency of sureties upon an undertaking is in no sense an appearance in the action wherein the attachment is issued. To so hold would not only violate the express provisions of section 539, Code Civ. Proc., but impose a penalty upon the defendant, whether resident or nonresident, by requiring him to subject himself to the jurisdiction of the court as a condition of exercising the right conferred by statute.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

DUDLEY v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

(Civ. 796.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 5, 1910. On Rehearing, April 18, 1910. Second Rehearing Denied May 18, 1910.)

1. Elections (§ 275*)—Contests—Jurisdiction—Constitutional Provision.

The jurisdiction of the superior court over election contests is included within the jurisdiction conferred by Const. art. 6, § 5, providing that the superior court shall have jurisdiction of all such special cases and proceedings as are not otherwise provided for.

2. Elections (§ 276*)—Contests—Notice to Court.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1118a, requiring the county clerk to notify the superior court of the filing of statements of contests of elections, being a means for calling the pendency of the contest to the attention of the court, and there being nothing in the statute requiring the notification to be in writing, where the court had actual notice it was not necessary for the clerk to give a formal notification.

3. Elections (§ 276*)—Contests—Order for Special Session—Statutory Provisions—"Thereupon."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1118a, providing that within five days after the end of the time allowed for filing statements of contested elections the county clerk must notify the superior court of all statements filed, and the court shall thereupon order a special session to be held not less than 10 nor more than 20 days from the date of the order, the word "thereupon" does not necessarily mean immediately, and a delay of six days in making the order for the special session was not unreasonable.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 6953–6955.]

4. Elections (§ 276*)—Contests—Jurisdiction.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1115, providing for the filing with the county clerk of a written statement of the grounds of contest of an election within 30 days after the declaration of the result, section 1118a, requiring the county clerk within five days after the time allowed for filing such statements to notify the superior court of all statements, and requiring the court to order a special session not less than 10 nor more than 20 days from the date of the order, when the ballots shall be opened and a recount taken, where the court, having actual knowledge of the pendency of a contest within 30 days after the declaration of the result of the election, six days later ordered a special session of the court to hear the contest at a date more than 10 days and less than 20 days from the expiration of the 30-day period, when the court was first authorized to act, it had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the contest, so far as it was within the general law.

5. Elections (§ 281*)—Contest—General Appearance—Demurrer—Effect.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1014, making a general demurrer an appearance, where the defendant in an election contest filed a general demurrer to a statement of grounds of contest, the neglect of the county clerk to issue citation in proper form, or the service thereof, is of no materiality in determining the question of personal jurisdiction.

6. Municipal Corporations (§ 78*)—Officers — Elections — Contests — Application of General Law.

Under Const. art. 11, § 6, providing that cities and towns, and all charters thereof, except in municipal affairs, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws, even if an election contest is a municipal affair, in order that the charter shall supersede the general law in relation thereto, the charter must contain appropriate provision relating thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 182; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

7. Municipal Corporations (§ 78*)—Officers — Elections — Contests — Application of General Law.

Where a city charter contains no reference to an election contest, but merely provides after an enumeration of powers that the council shall have full power to pass ordinances upon any other subject of municipal control, or to carry into effect any other powers of the municipality, and there is no ordinance of the city establishing a mode of proceedings in election contests, the general law prevails as to the contest of election of a city officer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 182; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

8. ELECTIONS (§ 275*)—STATUTES.

Municipal Corporations Act (Gen. Laws 1910, p. 826) § 762, providing that boards of trustees shall determine all election contests in cities of the fifth class, is applicable only to cities actually of that class, and does not apply to a city of that class which has adopted a freeholder's charter.

Application by T. H. Dudley for writ of prohibition to the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County. Writ denied without opinion. On rehearing, writ denied, and second rehearing denied.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. It is made to appear from the petition filed herein that Santa Monica is a city organized and existing under a freeholders' charter; that on the 7th day of December, 1909, an election was held in said city at which petitioner and one Roy Jones were rival candidates for the office of mayor; that on the 13th day of December, 1909, the city council, pursuant to law, canvassed the returns of said election and declared petitioner elected to the office of mayor of said city for the full term of two years; that thereafter said Dudley qualified as such mayor and is now acting as such; that thereafter, on the 8th day of January, 1910, Roy Jones filed his complaint or statement against petitioner in the superior court in which he alleged, among other things, that the board of election of said city wrongfully, inadvertently, and unlawfully counted, tallied, and returned votes for said Dudley for the office of mayor which were not cast for him, and which should not have been counted for him, and that some thereof so tallied and returned for Dudley were cast for said Jones; that certain illegal votes were cast at said election and counted for said Dudley; that if all of said illegal votes so given to said Dudley were taken from him the same would reduce his vote below the number of legal votes given to said Jones; and he prayed the court for a recount and that he be declared elected mayor of said city of Santa Monica. That upon the filing of said statement or complaint the same was presented to C. D. Wilbur, one of the judges of the superior court of Los Angeles county, who upon reading the same ordered a citation to be issued by the clerk directed to said Dudley, ordering him to appear before said judge on the 19th day of January, 1910, to show cause, if any, why the relief prayed for in the said complaint should not be granted. Thereupon, on the same date, the clerk issued a citation as by said judge directed. That on the 19th day of January, 1910, being the time fixed in said citation for the appearance of Dudley, he appeared in said proceeding specially and for the sole purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court, and moved to quash and set aside the citation, upon the ground that the same was issued prematurely and not in accordance with the provisions of section 1118 of the Code of Civil Procedure, upon the hearing of which motion the same was denied. Upon the same day of the denial of said motion Dudley filed his demurrer to the complaint and statement filed by said Jones, both general and challenging the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter of the action, which demurrer was, upon the 19th day of January, overruled. Dudley by counsel thereupon objected to the court making any order for a special session for the trial of said cause, for the reasons that the clerk had not given the notice as required by section 1118a of the Code of Civil Procedure to the court, or at all, that the time for giving such notice had expired, and because the time within which the court could make an order had expired, which objections the court overruled, and on said 19th day of January made its order calling a special session of the court to be held on February 1, 1910, for a recounting of the ballots cast at the election held in Santa Monica for the office of mayor, and defendant was ordered to appear on that date, and which said last-mentioned order was ordered to be entered as one superseding the prior minute order made directing citation. It is alleged that the clerk did not, within five days after the end of the time allowed for filing statements of contest, notify the superior court of the filing of any statement, and that by reason thereof the court lost jurisdiction over the subject-matter; that the trial of said cause will entail great expense upon said Dudley, and he therefore prays for a writ prohibiting the court from further proceeding in the matter in connection with a recount of said ballots.

The jurisdiction of the superior court to hear and determine election contests is included within the jurisdiction conferred upon such superior court by section 5, article 6, of the Constitution; said proceeding being special and the jurisdiction in relation to which is not otherwise provided for by statute. The clerk of the county is ex officio clerk of the superior court, and a paper filed with such clerk having reference to a special court proceeding is filed with him as ex officio clerk of such court.

The general law of the state regarding the contests of elections provides, by section 1115 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that when an elector contests the right of any person declared elected to such office he must file with the county clerk a written statement setting forth specifically the facts constituting the grounds of contest which are enumerated in the section, which statement must be verified and filed within 30 days after the declaration of the result of the election by the body canvassing the returns thereof. By section 1118a of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided: "Within five days after the end of the time allowed for filing such statements the county clerk must notify the superior court of the county or city and county of all statements filed. The court shall thereupon order a special session to be held, on some day to be named by it, not less than ten nor more than twenty days from the date of such order, at which session the ballots shall be opened and a recount taken, in the presence of all the parties," etc. By section 1119 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided: "The clerk shall thereupon issue a citation for the person, whose right to the office is contested, to appear at the time and place specified in the order, which citation must be delivered to the sheriff, and served either upon the party in person, or, if he cannot be found, by leaving a copy thereof at the house where he last resided, at least five days before the time so specified."

It is petitioner's contention that, by reason of the failure of the clerk to notify the court as provided by section 1118a of the filing of the statement, and by reason of the court making its order for a citation before the lapse of time for filing statements, the order of January 19th entered by the court calling a special session was without jurisdiction; the time having elapsed within which, it is claimed, under the statute such order could be made. It may be conceded that the order of the court entered on January 8th directing the citation in the manner and form set forth in such order, except in so far as it is record evidence of a knowledge of the pendency of the proceeding, may be disregarded, as no such order is contemplated by the statute, and the citation issued by the clerk did not purport to convey to the contestee either the substance or effect of any order which by law the court was authorized to make and enter. The provision of the statute requiring the clerk to notify the court of the filing of the contest is a means provided by the statute for calling the pendency of the contest to the attention of the court, in order that the court may make a timely order calling a special session for the hearing of such action. There is nothing in the statute indicating that the notification to the court of the filing of such proceeding must of necessity be in writing. It affirmatively appearing that the court had actual notice on January 8th of the filing of the contest, it was not necessary for the clerk to give a formal notification in order that the court might be apprised of the pendency of the proceeding. The court having knowledge of the pendency of the proceeding before the date at which it could act, and the record disclosing that such knowledge was still within the breast of the court on the 19th of January, it is fair to assume that such knowledge remained with the court during the interim, which includes the 31st day after the filing of the statement of contest. Upon this date the court, having knowledge of the filing of the contest, is required by the statute to make its order calling a special session for the hearing of the same. This order, calling the special session for February 1st, the court made on the 19th day of January, six days after the expiration of the 30 days from the filing of the statement. It will be observed that the date named for the commencement of the special session was within 20 days from the date when, as we have said, the court, having notice of the contest was authorized to act, and the time so fixed was more than 10 days thereafter. The statute directs the court upon receipt of the notification to thereupon make its order. This word "thereupon" does not of necessity mean immediately. Cal. Academy of Sciences v. Fletcher, 99 Cal. 210, 33 Pac. 855. As said by the Supreme Court of this state in Porphyry Pav. Co. v. Ancker, 104 Cal. 342, 37 Pac. 1052, where the court was considering a section of the street law in which it is provided that the superintendent of streets shall thereupon cause certain posting to be done, the word refers to the order of time in which the act shall be done and is not a mandatory regulation requiring immediate performance; "that it should follow within a reasonable time is the most that should be claimed." It cannot be said that a delay of six days in making the order was an unreasonable time, when we consider that in so far as the public is concerned the time fixed for the special session was within the limit of 20 days from the time when the court was first authorized to act and exceeded the 10 days, the minimum of time designated. We are of opinion, then, that the superior court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter pertaining to the election contest, if the same is subject to general law.

It further appears by the petition that upon the same date when the order was made calling the special session the petitioner, defendant in said contest, filed a general demurrer to the statement of Jones, the contestant. Under section 1014 of the Code of Civil Procedure the effect of such demurrer was the entering of an appearance to the proceeding. The parties then being in court, and petitioner herein having entered an appearance to the proceeding, the neglect of the clerk to issue the citation in proper form, or the service thereof, is of no materiality in determining the question of personal jurisdiction.

It is further insisted by petitioner that the matter of the contest of an election held in a municipality acting under a freeholders' charter is a municipal affair, and that under the Constitution (art. 11, § 6), which provides that "cities and towns heretofore or hereafter organized, and all charters thereof framed or adopted by authority of this Constitution, except in municipal affairs, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws," the general law is subordinate to the regulations of the city in respect of such matters. The only provision of the charter of the city of Santa Monica claimed by petitioner to have reference to an election contest is found in section 30: "The council shall also have full power to pass ordinances upon any other subject of municipal control, or to carry into effect any other powers of the municipality." It may be conceded that the election and classification of the officers of a charter city, as well as contests arising from such election, are municipal affairs, but that the charter shall supersede the general law in relation thereto it is necessary that the charter itself should contain appropriate provision relative to such affairs. Mr. Justice Harrison, in Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 395, 58 Pac. 928, says: "If, however, the charter of a city, whether given to it by the Legislature prior to the Constitution of 1879, or framed by a board of freeholders, contains no provision in reference to subjects which might have been included therein, that city or its inhabitants is not thereby freed from legislative control. * * * A city cannot claim to be exempt from general laws relating to municipal affairs, if there is no provision relating to such affairs in the charter under which it is acting, whether such charter is one framed by itself or was given to it by the Legislature." This last proposition is cited and followed in Dinan v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 223, 91 Pac. 808.

We find nothing in the charter of Santa Monica which undertakes to deal with the subject of the contest of municipal elections, nor any ordinance of the city based upon the authority of the charter under which any mode or proceeding relative to such contest is sought to be established. There is therefore nothing in such charter in conflict with general law. The averment in the petition that the election was held according to law cannot be construed into a statement involving the matter of a subsequent contest growing out of such election. The right of a legislative body to determine the election and qualification of its own members is not here presented, but the election and qualification of the chief executive officer alone is involved. It follows that the contest of such an election is therefore to be conducted under the provisions of the general law of the state.

It is further claimed by petitioner that Santa Monica having been a city of the fifth class before it adopted its charter, therefore the provisions of section 762 of the Municipal Corporations Act (Gen. Laws 1910, p. 826), which provides that boards of trustees shall determine all election contests in cities of such class, is applicable to the contest under consideration. This law with relation to cities of the fifth class applies only to cities actually of that class, and when Santa Monica adopted its freeholders' charter and the same was approved by the Legislature, the effect thereof was to remove that city from the classification of cities, at least to the extent of legislation applying especially to such class, and it became amenable to the general law of the state relative to election contests of the character here instituted. In addition to this, it may be observed that the corporations act referred to makes no provision for a mayor in cities of the fifth class, and, of course, no contest involving such office could possibly exist in a city under such a classification.

In what we have heretofore said we have disregarded the point made by respondent as to the adequacy of appeal, on account whereof prohibition will not lie. This we have done because upon this rehearing we are not agreed upon the question as to an appeal in such a contest affording a speedy and adequate remedy, and rest the decision upon the merits of the petition as presented.

The writ is denied.

SHAW v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 693.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 220*)—SERVICES RENDERED—LIABILITY.

A municipal corporation is not liable for the reasonable value of services rendered by employés in a department appointed in violation of the civil service provisions of the charter of the municipality.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by H. M. Shaw against the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, with instructions.

Percy V. Long, John T. Nourse, and John F. English, for appellant. Costello & Costello, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff, in his own right, and as the assignee of 46 other persons, brought an action to recover the total sum of $5,600, as the reasonable value for services rendered by plaintiff and his several assignors, as deputy registrars of voters of the city and county of San Francisco, under appointments made by resolution adopted by the board of election commissioners of said city and county in regular session assembled. (In this opinion plaintiff and his assignors will hereafter be referred to as the plaintiffs.) Plaintiffs recovered judgment as prayed for, and this is an appeal from such judgment, taken upon the judgment roll.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It appears from the findings that the positions to which plaintiffs were appointed had been duly included by the civil service commissioners of the city and county within the civil service commission system, and that in accordance therewith appointments to such positions should and could only be made from the list of civil service eligibles for the class or grade to which the positions belonged. It further appears that the plaintiffs were appointed in entire disregard of the civil service provisions of the charter. None of them even took the competitive examination required by the charter, and the name of no one of said plaintiffs was upon the register or list of civil service eligibles. In fact no attempt was made by plaintiffs or the board of election commissioners to comply with the requirements of the civil service provisions of the charter. The civil service provisions of the charter are contained in article 13 thereof, and section 11 of said article provides that "all officers, courts, boards and heads of departments, vested in this charter with the power to appoint deputies, clerks, stenographers or employés in any of the offices or departments of the city and county mentioned in this section, shall make such appointments in conformity with the rules and provisions prescribed by this article, and any appointment not so made shall be void." The section further expressly provides that the provisions of article 13 shall apply to the board of election commissioners.

In the face of these provisions of the charter, it is not claimed by respondent that the appointments of plaintiffs were valid. On the contrary, it seems to be conceded that such appointments were void. Plaintiffs sought to recover, and did recover, upon the theory that, though their appointments were void as having been made in violation of the clear and express provisions of the law, yet as they performed the services, and appellant received the benefit thereof, plaintiffs are entitled to recover the reasonable value of such services from the municipality.

To this doctrine we cannot subscribe. It is contrary to the rule laid down in this state in well-considered cases, the leading one of which is Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 97, 81 Am. Dec. 96. To the same effect are Santa Cruz Rock Pavement Co. v. Broderick, 113 Cal. 628, 45 Pac. 863; City Improvement Co. v. Broderick, 125 Cal. 139, 57 Pac. 776; Times Publishing Co. v. Weatherby, 139 Cal. 618, 73 Pac. 465; Fountain v. City of Sacramento, 1 Cal. App. 462, 82 Pac. 637.

To permit a liability to be imposed upon the municipality to pay for services rendered under appointments made, as in this case, contrary to the explicit provisions of the law, and by the law declared to be void, would be to fritter away the entire scheme for civil service appointments contained in the charter. This we may not do. In Zottman v. San Francisco, the plaintiff sought to recover for work done on the public streets of the municipality under a contract let to plaintiff in disregard of the requirements of the law regarding such contracts. The claim that plaintiff could recover upon a quantum meruit, because the work had been performed and accepted, was pressed upon the court. It was held that the contractor could neither recover upon his express contract nor upon quantum meruit. The court said: "It may sometimes seem a hardship upon a contractor that all compensation for work done, etc., should be denied him, but it should be remembered that he, no less than the officers of the corporation, when he deals in a matter expressly provided for in the charter, is bound to see to it that the charter is complied with. If he neglect this, or choose to take the hazard, he is a mere volunteer, and suffers only what he ought to have anticipated. If the statute forbids the contract which he has made, he knows it, or ought to know it, before he places his money or services at hazard." So, too, in the case at bar, the plaintiffs as well as the board of election commissioners, when the appointments were made, knew or ought to have known that they were made in contravention of the provisions of the charter, and were under the law void. Plaintiffs were bound to see that their appointments were made according to the requirements of the charter. If they neglected this, or chose to take the hazard of accepting a void appointment, they were mere volunteers, and suffer only what they should have anticipated.

Respondent contends that the doctrine laid down in Zottman v. San Francisco, supra, has been repudiated in the later case of Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed, 139 Cal. 432, 73 Pac. 189. This latter case is peculiar in its facts, and it may be conceded that in the opinion of Justice McFarland the soundness of the rule enunciated in the Zottman Case is questioned. But this opinion was concurred in by but one other justice, while Justice Angellotti and two other justices concurred in the judgment upon grounds not affecting the rule of the Zottman Case. On the other hand, Chief Justice Beatty also concurred in the judgment, but took pains to affirm his adherence to the rule of the Zottman Case, and to further show that the doctrine of estoppel against a municipality, enunciated in the opinion of Justice Cope in Argenti v. City of San Francisco, 16 Cal. 256, cited by respondent herein, never was concurred in by his associates, and was subsequently expressly repudiated by him in the Zottman Case. It thus cannot be said that the court in Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed overruled the Zottman Case.

Respondent suggests in a supplemental brief that, "should this court determine this case favorably to respondent, the civil service scheme cannot be in any wise injuriously affected, for the reason that it cannot be presumed that city officials will in future perform their duties in an irregular or illegal manner."

This suggestion does not appeal to this court with much force. It occurs to us that such action would encourage disregard of the civil service provisions of the charter. The most certain way to enforce compliance with such provisions is to deny compensation out of the public funds to persons receiving such void and illegal appointments.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment in favor of appellant for its costs.

PEOPLE v. EMMONS. (Cr. 228.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 30, 1910. Rehearing Denied July 28, 1910.)

1. Indictment and Information (§ 109*)—Construction—Determination of Sufficiency.

The only correct way to determine the sufficiency of an indictment is to take its language in its ordinary and accepted meaning, and its statements as to defendant's acts, and compare them with the statute which it is claimed has been violated, in order to determine whether or not defendant is charged in plain language with having done a particular act or thing which is made a crime by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 286–288; Dec. Dig. § 109.*]

2. False Pretenses (§ 26*)—Indictment—Requisites and Sufficiency.

Pen. Code, § 532, provides that every person who, knowingly, by any false or fraudulent representation or pretenses, defrauds another person of money, is punishable as for larceny. An indictment stated that defendant on a day named therein did knowingly, falsely, and fraudulently pretend and represent to H. that he was then the sole owner of a certain-named mine, located in a county and state named, and that there was then being erected at said mine a ten-stamp mill, that the property had been in litigation for over 30 years, but that it was now settled; and that in fact defendant was not the sole owner of said mine, and there was not then or at any time any mill being erected at said mine; that it had not at any time been in litigation for over 30 years, but that in truth and in fact the mine was then in litigation; that H., believing the said false representations to be true, and solely by reason of them was induced to and did deliver to defendant the sum of $500, and that defendant falsely and fraudulently received, took, and carried away the sum. Held, that the indictment was sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

3. Indictment and Information (§ 109*)—Sufficiency of "Indictment."

An indictment is sufficient when it fully and fairly informs defendant of the acts of which he is accused, so that he may defend as to such acts, and so that it may be determined as a matter of law whether such facts as are alleged constitute a crime under the statute, and show a violation of a statute.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3551–3555.]

4. Criminal Law (§ 787*)—Instructions—Failure of Defendant to Testify.

After defendant in a prosecution had rested, the district attorney claimed to be surprised by the fact that defendant had not called and examined certain witnesses, and that for this reason he had not put in a material declaration by defendant on a former trial of the same charge, as he had expected to elicit such evidence on cross-examination. The court, under objection of defendant, reopened the case, and the district attorney was permitted to read a portion of defendant's evidence given on a former trial. Defendant, who had not testified, then asked the court, after the evidence was concluded, to instruct the jury that defendant had a legal right to take the stand as a witness, or not to do so, and that the mere fact that he does not testify raises no presumption against him, and the jury cannot draw any unfavorable inference from that fact. The court refused the instruction, but in lieu thereof read to the jury Pen. Code, § 1323, which provides that a defendant in a criminal action cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself, "but if he offer himself as a witness he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the people as to all matters about which he was examined in chief," and that his neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot prejudice him on the trial. Held, that the action of the court was error, and injurious to defendant, as the instruction requested contained a correct statement of the law pertinent to the issue, and there was no question before the jury as to what could be done if defendant had taken the stand, nor as to whether he could be compelled to testify against himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1902, 1903; Dec. Dig. § 787.*]

5. Criminal Law (§ 317*)—Presumptions—Failure of Accused to Testify.

Since one accused of crime has the right to stand mute, no presumption is raised against him if he chooses to remain silent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 732; Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

6. Criminal Law (§ 834*)—Instructions—Requests by Defendant.

Where an instruction is asked by accused which contains a correct statement of the law and is pertinent to the issue and to the evidence, the court should not weaken it by coupling with it a sentence or statement not pertinent, although in the abstract containing a correct statement of the law.

7. False Pretenses (§ 9*)—Issues, Proof, and Variance.

In a prosecution for false pretenses, the state must prove that the representations and pretenses alleged induced the prosecutor to part with his money, or that such representations and pretenses were the main inducement.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2662-2668; vol. 8, p. 7661.]

8. Criminal Law (§ 1130*)—Appeal and Error—Briefs.

Where counsel rely upon error in the giving or refusing of an instruction, the brief should call attention to the facts and the law in a manner sufficient to show in what way the giving or refusing of the instruction injured defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2965; Dec. Dig. § 1130.*]

9. Criminal Law (§ 371*)—Admissibility of Evidence—Similar Offenses.

In a prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses, evidence of similar offenses involving the making of other false representations by defendant is admissible to show that he is aware of the falsity of the statements made by him in the particular case on trial, but the evidence must tend to show a guilty intent in connection with the crime for which he is being prosecuted, and must not be received to show other and distinct crimes which have no bearing upon the question of guilty intent as to the crime for which he is being tried.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Wm. P. Lawlor, Judge.

E. W. Emmons was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Jos. A. Browne, Thos. V. Cator, Robert Ferral, and George Appel, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

COOPER, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of obtaining money by false pretenses, and sentenced to a term of six years in the state prison at San Quentin. He prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is contended that the court erred in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the indictment and also in denying his motion in arrest of judgment. As each of said contentions depends upon the question as to whether or not the indictment states facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, we will consider them together.

The way, and the only correct way, to determine the sufficiency of an indictment is to take its language in its ordinary accepted meaning, and its statements as to the matters and things that defendant did, and then compare them with the statute which it is claimed has been violated, for the purpose of determining the question as to whether or not the defendant is charged in plain language with having done a particular act or thing which is made a crime by the statute. People v. Schmitz, 7 Cal. App. 330, 94 Pac. 407, 419. The Penal Code, § 532, provides that every person who knowingly, by any false or fraudulent representation or pretense, defrauds another person of money, is punishable in the same manner and to the same extent as for larceny of the money so obtained. The indictment states that the defendant did, on the day named therein, knowingly, feloniously, and fraudulently pretend and represent to Mrs. M. E. Hurst that "he, the said defendant, was then, at said time, the sole owner of a certain mine or mining claim and real property called 'Drummer Boy Mine,' located at Siskiyou county in the state of California, and that there was then at said time being erected and constructed at said mine upon said property a ten-stamp mill, and that the said mine and property had been in litigation for over 30 years, but that the said litigation had then been and was then all settled; whereas, in truth and in fact, said defendant was not then or at any time the sole owner of said mine, mining claim, and real property, and there was not then or at any time a ten-stamp mill or any mill being erected or constructed at said mine or upon said property; and the said mine and property had not then or at any time been in litigation for over 30 years, but in truth and in fact the said mine and property was then at said time in litigation, and said litigation had not then at said time been all settled or settled at all." It further states that Mrs. Hurst, believing the said false representations to be true, and solely by reason of them, was induced to and did deliver to defendant the said sum of $500, and that defendant fraudulently and feloniously received, took, and carried away the same. This is sufficient under the statute. It is not necessary, and indeed would have been bad pleading, for the indictment to state what the defendant did or intended to do with the money, or that the money was never returned to Mrs. Hurst, or any other evidentiary fact. If the defendant did not obtain the money in the manner charged in the indictment, or if it was paid to him with the full understanding of all the facts and circumstances, or if it was a loan, or given to him for the purpose of depositing in a bank, such fact or facts could have been shown by him in defense. The indictment has answered its purpose when it fully and fairly informs the defendant of the acts he is accused of, so that he may prepare for his defense and defend himself as to such acts, and so that it may be determined as a matter of law whether or not such facts as are alleged in the indictment constitute a crime under the statute. If the acts as stated show a violation of the statute, the indictment is sufficient. We therefore conclude that the demurrer was properly overruled, and the motion in arrest of judgment properly denied.

We have examined the evidence, and we find it sufficient to support the verdict, and it is not necessary to further discuss it.

After the case was closed on behalf of both prosecution and defense, and the defendant had rested, the district attorney claimed that he had been surprised by the defendant not calling and examining certain witnesses (evidently referring to the fact that the defendant had not taken the stand as a witness in his own behalf), and that for this reason he had not put in a material declaration or admission made by defendant on a former trial of the same charge, as he expected to elicit such evidence on cross-examination. The court, under the objection of defendant, reopened the case, and the district attorney was permitted to and did read a portion of defendant's evidence given on a former trial. Defendant then asked the court, after the evidence was concluded, to instruct the jury as follows: "The defendant has a legal right to take the stand as a witness, or not to do so, just as he pleases or as his counsel may advise. The mere fact that he does not testify raises no presumption or prejudice against him, and the jury cannot draw any unfavorable inference against a defendant who does not offer himself as a witness." The court refused the instruction, but in lieu thereof read section 1323 of the Penal Code as an instruction to the jury, which section and instruction is as follows: "A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself, but if he offer himself as a witness he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the people as to all matters about which he was examined in chief. His neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him or be used against him on the trial or proceeding."

This was error, and clearly injurious to the defendant. The instruction as requested contained a correct statement of the law pertinent to the issue, and under the circumstances it was very material to the defendant that it should have been given. The court, in effect, instead of telling the jury that a failure of the defendant to testify should not create a prejudice or unfavorable inference in the minds of the jury, told them that a defendant could not be compelled to be a witness against himself, "but if he offer himself as a witness he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the people as to all matters about which he was examined in chief." It was not a question before the jury as to what could be done if the defendant had taken the stand as a witness for himself, nor as to whether he could be compelled to testify against himself. It seems therefore plainly apparent that the effect of reading section 1323 of the Penal Code was to inform the jury that the fact that defendant, if he had taken the stand, could have been cross-examined was probably the reason why he did not take the stand as a witness. If this were not so, why did the court read the law to the jury as to the effect of something that had not occurred, instead of giving the instruction as requested?

The defendant was entitled to a fair trial. He was entitled to a simple statement of the law pertinent to the issue, without having it coupled with another statement, not pertinent to the issue, which robbed it of all its force as to defendant's rights. He had the right to stand mute. No presumption is raised against him by the law if he choose to remain silent. People v. Streuber, 121 Cal. 432, 53 Pac. 918. In People v. Cuff, 122 Cal. 589, 55 Pac. 407, the defendant did not take the stand as a witness, and the court instructed the jury: "The court instructs you that the evidence is to be estimated not only by its own intrinsic weight, but also according to the evidence which it is in the power of one side to produce and of the other to contradict, and that therefore if weaker or less satisfactory evidence is offered, and it appears that stronger or more satisfactory evidence was within the power of the party, the evidence offered should be viewed with distrust."

The instruction given in that case was correct as an abstract proposition of law, and evidently was founded on section 2061, subdivisions 6 and 7, of the Code of Civil Procedure; but the court held its effect was to emphasize the fact that the defendant had not taken the stand in his own behalf, and that the giving of it was prejudicial error. The court in discussing the matter said: "Let us consider one objection to it. Here there is no suggestion whatever in the record that any important witness could have been produced by the defendant before the jury and was not produced. Under such circumstances certainly the occasion was not a proper one upon which to give the instruction. But, upon the other hand, the defendant did not take the stand, and the practical application of the instruction necessarily points to that fact as a strong circumstance to be taken against him. To the ordinary mind there seems to have been no other reason or purpose in the giving of the instruction. Yet a defendant has the constitutional right to stand mute and demand that the prosecution prove the case against him beyond a reasonable doubt."

The reasoning there applies with much force to this case. The defendant had not offered himself as a witness, so why should the court, of its own volition, have stated to the jury that if he had taken the stand he could have been cross-examined? It was most prejudicial and damaging to the defendant. It ordinarily tends to the due and proper administration of justice for the trial court to leave the jury entirely free to pass upon each and every fact and phase of the case without any prejudicial instructions, or any intimation by the court as to matters of fact, or as to the weight of evidence. When any instruction is asked by a defendant which contains a correct statement of the law and is pertinent to the issue and to the evidence, it should be given. The court should not weaken or emasculate an instruction by coupling with it a sentence or statement not pertinent to the issue or the evidence, although in the abstract containing a correct statement of the law. We cannot conceive of any occasion arising during the trial of a criminal case for giving the jury an instruction as to the fact that the defendant could be cross-examined, if he should be a witness. If he was not a witness and had not offered himself as such certainly the instruction should not have been given. If he had offered himself as a witness the court, and not the jury, would determine the question of his cross-examination and the extent thereof. It was wholly unnecessary for the court to voluntarily state to the jury a proposition of substantive law which is for the court, and not for the jury under any circumstances.

The court also erred in refusing defendant's requested instruction numbered 16, which is as follows: "If you should have a reasonable doubt in your minds as to whether the prosecuting witness parted with her money because of the representations set forth in the indictment, or any of them, or whether on the other hand she so acted by reason of and induced by other or different representations, then you should give the defendant the benefit of that doubt, and your verdict should be not guilty."

If the jury entertained a reasonable doubt as to whether Mrs. Hurst parted with the money by reason of the representations set forth in the indictment, they should have acquitted defendant. The indictment charges that Mrs. Hurst was induced by said false representations and pretenses. That is the gist of the charge; and certainly if that is not true, and the money was obtained by other or different means or representations, the defendant should not have been convicted. It is true that the false representations and pretenses charged may not have been the sole inducement, or, in other words, other causes or pretenses or promises may have in such cases acted in connection with and in aid of the alleged false representations; but at the same time the false pretenses and representations charged in the indictment must have been the main cause that operated on the mind of the complaining witness when she parted with the money. The jury should have been satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the representations and pretenses charged in the indictment caused Mrs. Hurst to part with her money. If this were not so the jury might have convicted, although not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the prosecution had proven the material allegations of the indictment.

The refusal of the court to give other instructions requested by defendant is pointed out as error by calling attention to the number of such instructions separately, and stating that the court erred in refusing them. As we have said many times before, when counsel rely upon error in the giving or refusing of an instruction, it is due to this court that the brief should at least call attention to the facts and the law sufficient to show in what way the giving or refusing of the instruction injured the defendant. However, we have examined the requested instructions, and the court no doubt properly refused the greater number of them, or gave instructions which substantially covered the subject-matter thereof. Others might properly have been given, but we are not prepared to say, in view of the whole record, that the refusal of the court to give any one of them was error sufficient to justify a reversal of the case.

The claim is made that the court erred in receiving the evidence of the witness Cook as to representations made by defendant to Mrs. Hurst about a gold nugget chain which he said was made from nuggets picked up at the mine; the stock of which he was trying to sell to Mrs. Hurst. The record shows that the witness testified without objection to the fact that defendant showed Mrs. Hurst the chain, and told her that the nuggets of which it was made came out of the mine. Some of the nuggets were small and some of them large and rough shaped. The objection to the testimony was made later, when the witness was asked to describe the size and shape of the nuggets. If any error was committed it had been committed before the defendant objected to the testimony; but without regard to the form or time of the objection, we are not prepared to say that the evidence was inadmissible. In this class of cases evidence of similar offenses, involving the making of other false representations, is admissible against the defendant to show that he is aware of the falsity of the statements made by him in the particular case on trial. The law is liberal in allowing other false statements to be proven for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of showing such guilty intent or purpose, or guilty knowledge of the falsity of the statements that the party is making. Underhill on Criminal Evidence, vol. 2, star pp. 672, 673; People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 Pac. 194. Of course the evidence must tend to show a guilty intent in connection with the crime under investigation, and must not be received to show other and distinct crimes which have no bearing upon the question of guilty intent or knowledge as to the crime for which the defendant is being tried. What has been said applies to several other alleged errors as to testimony of similar transactions.

It is urged with much earnestness that the court erred in reopening the case at the request of the district attorney for the purpose of allowing him to prove certain statements made by the defendant on a former trial. The district attorney should have put in all his evidence in chief, and not have relied upon the uncertain event of the defendant taking the witness stand in his own behalf, so that he could make out a part of his case by cross-examination. Such practice is not to be tolerated. Of course, in cases where the district attorney has inadvertently or through ignorance omitted to put in certain material evidence, but has acted in good faith, and the court is satisfied that he has so acted, it should be liberal in allowing the case to be reopened so that it may be fully tried upon all the facts; but in case the district attorney deliberately keeps back a part of his testimony so as to surprise the defendant by bringing it out in cross-examination, at the same time speculating upon the contingency as to whether or not the defendant will take the stand, a more serious question arises. It may certainly be said that in such case the district attorney does not stand in a very favorable position to ask or invoke the discretion of the court to reopen his case. However, it is not necessary for us to pass upon the question as to whether or not the court abused its discretion, for the reason that upon a retrial of the case the district attorney will certainly not again speculate on the chances of the defendant taking the stand as a witness in his own behalf. We do not deem it necessary to discuss any other point.

For the error in refusing the instructions asked by defendant as herein pointed out the judgment and order are reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

1. Criminal Law (§ 1178*)—Appeal—Review—Waiver.

Where defendant's counsel in his brief on appeal stated that defendant was convicted on the uncorroborated testimony of his wife, which was contradicted in every material particular, and that it then became a question of veracity for the jury to determine, and then averred that "the evidence presented by the people was insufficient to justify the verdict," without any other argument showing wherein the evidence was insufficient or as to what the evidence was, the assignment will not be reviewed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Alphonse Bordet was convicted of placing and leaving his wife in a house of prostitution, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William Tomsky, for appellant. Attorney General Webb and James F. Brennan, for the People.

COOPER, P. J. The defendant was charged in the information with the crime of felony in willfully and feloniously placing and leaving his wife in a certain house of prostitution known and designated as No. 50 Bartlett alley, situated in the city and county of San Francisco, and with permitting his wife to remain in said house. To the information he entered a plea of not guilty, and after the evidence was in the jury returned a verdict finding him guilty as charged in the information. Judgment was accordingly entered upon said verdict, and this appeal is prosecuted from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The case comes here upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The defendant's counsel in his brief states that the defendant was convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of his wife, and that the said testimony was contradicted in every material particular, and "it then became a question of veracity for the jury to determine." The brief then states: "The evidence presented by the people was insufficient to justify the verdict." No other or different argument is made in regard to the insufficiency of the evidence, nor is it pointed out in any way nor at all as to what the evidence was, or the respects wherein it was insufficient. In such case we do not deem it our duty to consider the sufficiency of the evidence, but will regard it as sufficient.

The wife of the defendant testified that her husband went with her after telling her the place where she could find employment, and that she first went with her husband to 46 Bartlett alley, and that she found that it was not the right house, and the woman at 46 Bartlett alley accompanied her to No. 50, where she talked to the woman at No. 50. She was then asked by defendant the following question: "Now what conversation, if anything, did you have with the lady living at No. 46?" This question was objected to by the district attorney, and the objection was sustained. It is claimed that the court erred in sustaining the objection to this question. It appears by an examination of the record that in answer to the question immediately following the witness answered that she had no conversation with any person at No. 46 prior to the time she went to No. 50. Therefore if the question was material it was afterwards answered by the witness that she had no such conversation.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is also urged that the court erred in sustaining an objection made to the following question asked of the defendant by his counsel when he was upon the stand: "Did you make a statement to them there regarding your wife?" The question had reference to the fact that defendant had taken his children to or permitted them to be placed in care of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and that he went there and had some conversation with regard to his children and his wife. Nothing was said in reference to the character of the statement that was made by defendant, or what was the object of it, and we are not told in the brief. By an examination of the record we cannot determine that the question related to a material matter. Any self-serving declaration made by defendant at that time to third parties would not be admissible.

There is no other error complained of, and hence it follows that the judgment and order must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CAMPBELL v. GRENNAN et al. (Civ. 686.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 26, 1910.)

1. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 232*)—Rights of Third Persons—Notice—Possession.

Where the vendor is in apparent possession, the purchaser finding the title of record in the vendor is put on no further inquiry, and if at the same time another person is also in possession, there is no presumption of title in him inconsistent with that of the purchaser, unless there is some fact or circumstance apparent to his observation calculated to excite suspicion of a prudent man dealing with the property that a prior conveyance has been made.

2. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 232*)—Possession—Notice to Vendee.

Decedent being the owner of an entire city lot sold the easterly half to defendants, they orally agreeing on a division line 18 inches west of a north and south line dividing the lot into equal parts, whereupon defendants erected a residence occupying such 18-inch strip. To enable them to do so, decedent moved her residence located on the west part of the lot to the rear and so located it that it rested partly on defendants' property. Defendants occupied their residence for five years and after decedent's death her administrator conveyed the "west half" of the lot to plaintiff, who had been familiar with the premises for nearly 40 years, but who had no knowledge of the agreement between defendants and decedent with reference to the division line. Held, that the peculiar location of decedent's building in the rear of the west half of the lot in connection with defendants' occupation of their dwelling over the line equally dividing the lot was such as to challenge investigation of a prudent person contemplating purchase of the property and charged plaintiff with notice of the division line agreement so as to preclude him from recovering such 18-inch strip, the effect of which would greatly injure defendants' house.

3. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 242*)—Bona Fide Purchasers—Boundaries—Buildings—Presumptions.

Where land is occupied by buildings up to an agreed line, the grantee is presumed to have purchased the property with a view to the boundaries so visibly marked and to have relied thereon and fixed the price according to the value of the property so defined and used.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; L. G. Harrier, Judge.

Action by Edward J. Campbell against Charles Grennan and another. Judgment for defendants and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Theo. A. Bell, for appellant. F. R. Devlin, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The evidence shows, as stated by appellant, that defendants' house projects a little more than 18 inches over and upon the west half of lot No. 33, in block 245, in the city of Vallejo. The defendants obtained title to the east half of this lot from one Mrs. Barr, who was the owner of the entire lot. In March, 1906, the plaintiff purchased the west half of said lot from the administrator of Mrs. Barr's estate. The lot has a frontage on York street of 50 feet between two board fences which have stood in their present location for 30 years. The defendants do not claim title to the small strip in dispute through the deed from Mrs. Barr, but predicate their claim upon an oral agreement with her by which she and the defendant, Charles Grennan, agreed upon the division line. This agreement was never reduced to writing, but it is admitted by appellant that "if this were an action between Mrs. Barr and the defendants, there is no doubt that she would be estopped from disturbing the defendants in their possession of the disputed ground, simply because she knowingly permitted defendants to hold over the line." But it is contended that the vital question in the case is: Was the plaintiff an innocent purchaser without notice? And in this connection it is urged "that from the time defendants built upon the disputed premises until the plaintiff purchased from Mrs. Barr's administrator, Mrs. Barr in her lifetime and her administrator thereafter occupied and was in possession of the full 25 feet constituting the western half of lot 33." It is conceded that defendants were also in possession of the disputed strip, but the rule is invoked that requires open, notorious, and exclusive possession to impute to the purchaser of the record title notice of undisclosed equities in favor of another person. The authorities seem to be uniform as to this legal proposition. It is stated in Smith v. Yule, 31 Cal. 185, 89 Am. Dec. 167, as follows: "Where the vendor is in the apparent possession, the subsequent purchaser finding the title of record in the vendor, is put upon no further inquiry, because the possession appears to be according to the title; and if at the same time another person is also in possession, there is no presumption of title in him inconsistent with that found in the vendor. * * * The subsequent purchaser is not justly chargeable with fraud in failing to make inquiry for a prior unrecorded conveyance, unless there is some fact or circumstance apparent to his observation, calculated to excite the suspicion of a prudent man dealing with the property, that a prior conveyance has been made. The existence of such a conveyance would not be suggested by the possession of a third person, while the vendor held the title appearing of record and was in the apparent possession." Other cases are cited to the same effect. It is urged by respondents, however, that the rule finds no application to the facts of this case. Attention is called to the evidence showing that "appellant was familiar with the premises for a period of nearly 40 years. He knew that Grennan had purchased one-half of the lot. He knew that Grennan, during the time of construction, was erecting a building upon the half of the lot claimed by him, and he knew that Grennan was living alone with his own family in the house he had erected, and that there was no division of possession between himself and Mrs. Barr."

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Upon the assumption that the foregoing quotation from respondents' brief is a full statement of the facts, it could not be gainsaid that respondents' position is entirely sound. The problem, though, is somewhat affected by the circumstance that a short time before respondents' house was erected, Mrs. Barr moved her residence from the center of the lot to the rear of the same and located it so that it projected over the agreed division line and easterly of the center of said lot.

The case, then, in brief, is this: B. owns the entire lot and sells the easterly half to G. They agree upon the division line and G. erects a residence abutting thereon. To enable him to do this B. moves her residence to the rear and leaves it partly upon G.'s property. This she occupies until the time of her death. G. and his family are the sole occupants of his residence for five years when C. with a knowledge of all the facts, except the said agreement between B. and G., purchases the legal title to the westerly half of said lot, which includes, as we have seen, a strip about 18 inches in width east of the said agreed line. If appellant is awarded possession of said strip respondents will be greatly damaged, or, as testified by one of the latter: "If I am compelled to move that part of my building which the plaintiff claims is on his part of the lot, I will have to cut off about 18 inches of my house—it would practically ruin the house. It would take off the roof and part of the room that projects eighteen inches over the line claimed by plaintiff; it would certainly injure the building if that part of it were removed."

Under such circumstances what does equity require? We think there can be reasonably but one answer to the question. The moral and legal duty was cast upon appellant to make inquiry concerning these patent and obtrusive circumstances. The knowledge that respondents were building and occupying exclusively a dwelling upon the disputed tract, and thus exercising acts of ownership, would arrest the attention and challenge the investigation of any prudent person contemplating the purchase of the property. The peculiar location of the other building in the rear of the lot also would naturally excite comment and lead to inquiry. These two facts and circumstances were apparent to appellant's observation and were both calculated to excite the suspicion of any prudent man that some agreement not disclosed by the record was made by the parties owning the lot. At any rate, it is undisputably true that respondents were in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession of the portion of the lot covered by their dwelling, and the presumption follows that their ownership was coextensive with the claim thereby asserted, and of this appellant was clearly put upon notice. It would be manifestly unjust, therefore, to eject respondents from the portion of the lot actually occupied by them. But the question in relation to the whole strip has been treated as one and indivisible and involving the same situation, and therefore the judgment in favor of respondents should not be disturbed. With the knowledge possessed by plaintiff it must be presumed that he purchased the west half of the lot in view of respondents' possession.

Where land is occupied by buildings up to the agreed line the grantee is presumed to have bought the property with a view to the boundaries thus visibly marked, and to have relied thereon and fixed the price according to the value of the property as thus defined and used. Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 483, 95 Pac. 888.

The cases cited by appellant clearly involve a different situation from what we have here. In the Smith Case, supra, the vital fact is disclosed in the statement given in the syllabus: "If the owner of a lot in a city occupies part of a house on the same, and another person occupies the remainder of the house, and while this occupation of both continues the owner conveys to this other person whose deed is not recorded, and then conveys to a third person whose deed is first recorded, the possession of the one having the unrecorded deed is not sufficient to give notice to the subsequent purchaser"—and this, for the reason that the possession appears to be according to the title.

In Taylor v. C. P. R. R. Co., 67 Cal. 615, 8 Pac. 436, it was held upon conflicting evidence that the claimant had not settled upon nor improved the land in controversy, and it appeared that the subsequent applicant had no knowledge that any portion of the land had been inclosed by plaintiffs or that they had made any application for the purchase thereof, the contest involving the question as to whether plaintiffs or the defendant Davis should be preferred as the purchaser of certain land belonging to said company.

In Schumacher v. Truman, 134 Cal. 431, 66 Pac. 591, it was held that "the possession of a tenant of the divorced husband after the decree of divorce must be presumed to be the possession of the divorced wife, as a tenant in common with him, and is consistent with and not adverse to the record title of the divorced wife, and did not put the purchaser from her upon inquiry as to any equitable rights of the divorced husband under the unrecorded agreement." This, of course, must follow from the principle that either of the co-tenants was entitled to the possession of the whole of the land as against every one except his co-tenant, and that the possession of one co-tenant is presumed to be for his benefit and also for that of his co-tenant. His possession or that of his tenant would therefore be no notice of any hostility to the title of his co-tenant.

In Harris v. McIntyre et al., 118 Ill. 275, 8 N. E. 182, it appears that the owner of the legal title was permitted "to exercise, so far as the public could see, exclusive control and management of the farm and its products," without objection by the claimant of the equitable title, or the assertion of any right on her behalf, "while she to all appearances was simply the housekeeper for her brother, and as far as shown by the proof, apparently, to the world, occupied the premises in no other capacity."

In the case of Lindley v. Martindale, 78 Iowa, 379, 43 N. W. 233, the title to the lands was in a son of the plaintiff, who resided on a portion of them, while plaintiff and her husband resided on another portion, but the lands had for a long time been cared for by both the husband and the son. It was justly held that one who, upon being told that the title was all right in the son, took a mortgage from the son to secure a loan which was used for the most part to pay off prior incumbrances placed on the land by the son, was not charged with the alleged equities of plaintiff by reason of her claimed possession of the land. Since the son exercised acts of ownership jointly with his father, it negatived any inference that might arise from the existence of separate residences. Besides, it was decided that the plaintiff was estopped by her conduct from setting up the claim of any equitable interest in the premises.

In Atwood v. Bearss, 47 Mich. 72, 10 N. W. 112, it was held that the fact that the husband lived on the premises with his wife did not constitute notice of an unrecorded deed from her to him.

Wells v. Am. Mort. Co., 109 Ala. 430, 20 South. 136, is to the same effect, where it is declared that "The possession of land by the grantee, holding under an unrecorded deed together with her grantor, is not constructive notice of the unrecorded deed to a subsequent purchaser."

In Pope v. Allen, 90 N. Y. 298, it also appeared that both defendant and P. lived upon the land at the time of the conveyance to plaintiff and apparently occupied it jointly. Plaintiff had no actual notice of defendant's rights. "Held that, as P. had the record title, the proper inference was that defendant's possession was under him and in subordination to his title."

McCarthy v. Nicrosi, 72 Ala. 332, 47 Am. Rep. 418, and Townsend v. Little, 109 U. S. 504, 3 Sup. Ct. 357, 27 L. Ed. 1012, likewise present the situation of a joint occupancy.

Here, under the circumstances shown by the evidence, it would be opposed to the principles of equity and fair dealing recognized by the authorities, to give effect to the bare legal title to the extent of depriving respondents of a right honestly acquired and continuously exercised within the observation of appellant.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

BROADDUS et al. v. MONROE et al.

(Civ. 698.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1910.)

1. DEEDS (§§ 15, 72*)—RIGHT TO CONVEY.

Since, in the absence of fraud, one may dispose of property as he sees fit, if decedent understood the nature of her deed to her daughter and it was voluntary, consideration and whether she acted on independent advice are unessential to validity of the deed, though subject to consideration on an issue of undue influence.

2. DEEDS (§ 211*)—VALIDITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Evidence held to show that decedent understood the nature of her deed to her daughter, and that it was voluntary.

3. DEEDS (§ 68*)—VALIDITY—GRANTOR'S MENTAL CAPACITY.

That grantor was nearly a centenarian does not conclusively show her mental incapacity.

4. DEEDS (§ 72*)—VALIDITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

The mere relation of parent and child does not invalidate a deed from the former to the latter, though a circumstance to be considered in determining whether undue influence was used; fraud, importunity, or imposition, etc., being a necessary additional element.

5. DEEDS (§ 210*)—CONSIDERATION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

6. DEEDS (§ 195*)—CONSIDERATION—SERVICES.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by Oscar J. Broaddus, administrator, and others against Melvin Monroe and others. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 110 Pac. 164.

McNab & Hirsch and D. W. Burchard, for appellants. Mannon & Mannon, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The facts may be stated substantially in the language of appellants as follows: Mary F. Broaddus died intestate in October, 1906. At the time of her death she had been a widow for more than 30 years. Two children, both daughters, were born to her during coverture. One of these, Jane, died in 1885 and the other, Mary Ann, in 1906. The sons and only heirs of the daughter Mary Ann are defendants and respondents, and the descendants and heirs of the other daughter are plaintiffs and appellants herein. Prior to the death of the daughter, Jane, the mother had broken up housekeeping, divided her household effects between the two families, spent part of her time with one and part of the time with the other daughter until Jane's death when she went to live with Mary Ann and remained there until the latter's death, as aforesaid, in 1906. On October 27, 1904, and for a long time prior thereto, the said Mary F. Broaddus was the owner and seized in fee of a certain tract of land in Mendocino county of the value of about $7,000, and it is claimed that at the time of her death she was the equitable owner and entitled to the possession of the same, and that plaintiffs, by right of inheritance, succeeded to an undivided one-half thereof. On said 27th of October, the said Mary F. Broaddus made a deed of this property to her said daughter, Mary Ann James, thereby divesting herself of all her possessions except a pension which expired at her death. As stated by appellants, "The purpose of this action is to set aside the deed so made, on the grounds that Mary F. Broaddus, at the date thereof and for a long time prior thereto, was of unsound mind, incapable of transacting business, of understanding or appreciating any business or of managing her property, and was insane, and on the further ground that said transfer was improvident, without sufficient or any consideration and was a mere gift, and was made, without independent or any counsel or advice of any character whatever, to one occupying a position of trust and extreme confidence." The judgment was in favor of defendants, and from this and the order denying a motion for a new trial, the appeal was taken.

The court found "that the deed was, on the 27th day of October, 1904, signed, executed, acknowledged and delivered by the said Mary F. Broaddus to the said Mary A. James freely and voluntarily, and with full knowledge and understanding on the part of the said Mary F. Broaddus of the contents of said instrument, of what she was doing, and of its results to herself and all her relatives, and of its nature, operation, and legal effect; that said Mary F. Broaddus received a good and valuable consideration from the said Mary A. James for the execution of said deed, and for the lands and premises conveyed thereby." There is also a finding that no undue influence was exerted, that no advantage was taken of the grantor, Mary F. Broaddus, and that she "had full, free and independent advice and information concerning the execution of said deed and of its effects upon herself, her property and all her relatives."

Appellants rely for a reversal of the judgment principally upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient as a matter of law to support these various findings of the trial court. It must be apparent, however, that if the evidence is sufficient to support the conclusion that the grantor fully understood the nature of the transaction, and that the conveyance was the effect of her untrammeled and voluntary act, the questions as to consideration and independent advice become unimportant. This follows from the incontrovertible right of every one, in the absence of fraud, to dispose of his own property according to his volition. The first inquiry suggested, then, is, Can a rational conclusion be drawn from the evidence that the grantor had sufficient understanding to appreciate the nature of the transaction and to realize the significance of the conveyance?

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Appellants dwell with persuasive skill upon the mental and physical infirmities of the grantor detailed by various witnesses, and it is confidently asserted that she was afflicted with senile dementia to that extent that she could not comprehend the nature or consequences of the deed in question. Among other circumstances related, attention is called to the following: For 20 years prior to the execution of the deed she had been stone blind. She went to bed one night able to see and awoke in the morning with her eyesight gone forever. Thereafter she rapidly declined, both mentally and physically, and she manifested less and less interest in things about her. She was a cripple and had walked with crutches and cane for nearly 20 years or more prior to that date. She was addicted to the use of tobacco from early years, she was tremulous with extreme age and so emaciated that she resembled a mummy. Her hearing had become bad progressively, and when the notary attempted to read portions of the deed to her he had to sit down alongside her and talk in a loud voice directly in her ear. Physically she was so weak and decrepit that for 10 years or more she could not move without assistance and had to be clothed and fed by her daughter. Conversation in her later years had to be carried on through Mary Ann and at last she took no notice of what went on around her. In later years her relatives seemed lost to her memory although they had been before the objects of her affectionate regard. Whenever she attempted to speak during these later years she could not carry on a connected conversation, her sentences would halt midway, and it was impossible to secure rational or intelligent answers. In later years, she suffered a sunstroke after which she more rapidly declined. It seemed as if she was merely being kept alive to celebrate her one hundredth birthday. Witnesses also testified that, in their opinion, at the time of the execution of the deed, she was irrational and of unsound mind.

But when we turn to the witnesses for respondents we find an entirely different story. It is not claimed, indeed, that she had survived unscathed the ravages of time, but, viewing the testimony as the law requires of us, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the court below was justified in finding that she thoroughly understood the nature and consequences of her act. Mrs. Parker Hall testified: "I had known Grandma Broaddus at that time about 25 years, I guess. I can't exactly tell how often I had seen her during that 25 years, but as often as convenient would visit. When she would be sick I would always go and see her—visit her. I was a friend of Grandma Broaddus, and visited at her house as I visited at the houses of other friends in Willits. In my opinion Grandma Broaddus on the 27th day of October, 1904, was sane. At all times when I talked with Grandma Broaddus I had no difficulty in talking to her. Her answers to my questions were always intelligent." Nine other disinterested and four interested witnesses testified to the same effect. They related conversations with her and gave reasons for their opinion that she was entirely of sound mind. One of these disinterested witnesses who had known Mrs. Broaddus since 1864 and had visited her frequently declared that she "never met the old lady when she could detect anything wrong with her mind." As to the circumstances immediately surrounding the execution of the deed, the three subscribing witnesses testified that it was fully explained to her at the time it was executed. The conclusion from their testimony is irresistible that she understood the nature and effect of the deed. Furthermore, as indicative of her knowledge of the significance of said transaction, there is the testimony of three witnesses to her subsequent declaration that the grantee owned the property.

It may be admitted that the case is a peculiar one. The great age of the grantor renders it somewhat unprecedented. No case has been cited and probably none can be found where, as here, the action was to set aside a deed executed by a person lacking only a few days of being 100 years of age. Still, it cannot be said that the testimony of the witnesses as to her mental condition is inherently improbable. This court cannot say, in the face of the evidence to the contrary, that her extreme age had so impaired her mental faculties as to render her incapable of conveying her property. If allusion were to be made to common knowledge or to historical examples, we would find many illustrations in extreme old age of the truth of Cicero's statement that "occasionally the mind seems to stand out of reach of the body's decay." The instances are, of course, rare, but at least one case in an adjoining county is familiar to many where an individual still lives, having passed the century milestone, whose acquaintances would not hesitate to pronounce of sufficient mentality to execute a valid conveyance. Mitchnikoff, in his work on "The Prolongation of Life," declares that women live to much greater ages than men, but yet, among the former, it is the rarest chance to find a centenarian. He mentions, however, the case of one Mme. Robineau, with whom he became acquainted, who lived in a suburb of Paris and had reached the age of 106. The physical condition of this woman, he declares, showed extreme decay, but notwithstanding her physical weakness, Mme. Robineau "retained her intelligence fully, her mind remained delicate and refined and the goodness of her heart was touching. Her conversation was intelligent, connected and logical." He proceeds to state that "at the age of 106 her intelligence suddenly became weak. She lost her memory almost completely and sometimes wandered." He concludes with the assertion that "The facts that I have brought together justify the conclusion that human beings who reach extreme old age may preserve their mental qualities notwithstanding serious physical decay." In this connection he calls attention to the fact that "philosophers such as Plato, poets such as Goethe and Victor Hugo, artists such as Michael Angelo, Titian and Franz Hals produced some of their most important works when they had passed the age of 75."

The position of respondents in relation to the voluntary character of the transfer is equally impregnable. The testimony of the defendants and of the three witnesses, who were present at the execution of the deed, justifies the conclusion of the court that the grantor was free from undue or any improper influence of the grantee or any other person. The evident affection that existed between mother and daughter, the kindly and continued ministration of the latter to the comfort and happiness of the former, and the declaration of the grantor as to her reason for making the deed are all significant circumstances tending to rebut any unfavorable inference against the grantee. As clearly indicative that she was following her unaided inclination and volition, we find, according to the testimony, the old lady declaring: "Mary Ann was good and kind to her, and she didn't know how she could have got along without her, and she said she wanted her to have what property she had. She had deserved it all." Upon the theory of the uniform kindness of said Mary Ann to her mother which finds abundant support, and in view of the fact that her attentions had continued for so many years, and that she was the only living child, the conveyance is easily explicable and seems entirely reasonable. While her considerate and tender care of her mother was no more than required by filial duty, yet the great infirmities of the aged woman while rendering the duty no less imperious, imposed an onerous burden and responsibility, and the acceptance and acquittance of this duty with cheerful and persistent zeal deserve unstinted commendation and generous reward. This seems to have been recognized and appreciated by Mrs. Broaddus.

It is, moreover, the contention of appellants that the evidence disclosed a confidential relation between the parties to the deed of such a nature that the presumption would follow that the deed was the result of the undue influence of the grantee, which could not be overcome except by her testimony. As the grantee was not living at the time of the trial, this view would manifestly require a reversal of the lower court's finding. But conceding, for the sake of the argument, the existence of said relation and presumption, they cannot have the operation and effect claimed by appellants.

In Hemenway v. Abbott, 8 Cal. App. 450, 97 Pac. 190, a somewhat similar contention was made, but it is therein held that it was not necessary for the grantee to take the stand, the court saying: "It would doubtless have been more satisfactory had she made a full explanation of her relations with Proctor, but it cannot be said, as matter of law, that her failure to testify destroyed the probative force of the evidence submitted in the case in her behalf."

A fairer statement, however, of plaintiffs' position probably is that in view of the said relation and presumption the evidence, in the absence of any testimony from the grantee, is insufficient to show that no undue influence was exerted. However, we feel satisfied that the showing was sufficient to overcome any adverse presumption that may have existed in the premises. Again, the court was justified in the view that no such presumption should be indulged. As pointed out by respondents: "Mrs. James did not transact any business for her mother. She held no power of attorney and did not manage the property. According to the testimony of Albert James, the old ladies gave him joint direction concerning the leasing of the ranch," it being conceded that Mrs. James owned a part of it in her own right. The mere relation of parent and child is not sufficient to invalidate a deed from the former to the latter. It is a circumstance, of course, inviting careful consideration to the transaction, but before it can justify the inference of undue influence there must be added imposition, fraud, importunity, or something of that kind. It is so expressed in Pomeroy's Equity Juris. 962, and Mackall v. Mackall, 135 U. S. 167, 10 Sup. Ct. 705, 34 L. Ed. 84, cited by respondents. In the former it is said: "Where the positions of the two parties are reversed where the parent is aged, infirm, or otherwise in a condition of dependence upon his own child, and the child occupies a corresponding relation of authority, conveyances conveying benefits upon the child may be set aside. Cases of this kind plainly turn upon the exercise of actual undue influence, and not upon any presumption of invalidity. A gift from parent to child is certainly not presumed to be invalid."

In the Mackall Case, supra, it is said by the court, through Mr. Justice Brewer, that: "Right or wrong, it is to be expected that a parent will favor the child who stands by him, and give to him, rather than the others, his property. To defeat a conveyance under these circumstances, something more than the natural influence springing from such relationship must be shown; imposition, fraud, importunity, duress or something of that nature must appear; otherwise, that disposition of property which accords with the natural inclinations of the human heart must be sustained." The cases cited by appellants in which the presumption is said to exist involve a different state of facts from what we are now considering.

The character of Brown v. Burbank, 64 Cal. 99, 27 Pac. 940, is clearly shown by this statement in the opinion: "The plaintiff, while still an inexperienced girl, still under the care and control of her grandparents, still subject to the influence acquired by them in the double relation of parent and guardian of her person and estate, accustomed to consult their wishes and obey their commands, ignorant of her rights, purposely misled and kept in ignorance by those to whom she naturally looked for the protection of her interests, without the aid of legal advice or time for reflection, made a conveyance of her whole estate without any valuable consideration to one standing in loco parentis." It is well said "that a deed obtained under such circumstances cannot be permitted to stand is one of the clearest of propositions."

While, in Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189, it is declared that the relation between husband and wife is confidential, it was held that the plaintiff was induced to make the deed by the confidence which he had in his wife and that the betrayal of such confidence was constructively fraudulent. For this reason and also upon the ground that there was actual fraud, the transaction was construed as creating a trust. This case is reviewed in Tillaux v. Tillaux, 115 Cal. 673,[1] wherein it is said: "By the foregoing authorities and others not here collated, the principle is clearly declared that the marriage relation does not ipso facto raise the presumption that a deed of conveyance from the husband to the wife has been the result of undue influence; but such deed prima facie conveys to the wife whatever, according to rules of conveyancing, its terms embrace. We have discussed the subject at some length, because an expression or two in one or two former opinions give some faint color, scarcely visible, to a different doctrine. Appellant contends that there are facts at bar which, viewed in the light of the marriage relation, are sufficient to make the deed in question invalid; and the case of Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323 [27 Pac. 186] and also 75 Cal. 525 [17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189], is cited in support of the contention. The facts in that case were very peculiar and presented an instance of a wife violating an express promise made by her to a husband, upon which he had the right to implicitly rely, not only on account of the legal confidential relation between them, but also on account of the actual confidence which he had in her, as the relation between them had always been most affectionate and confiding." It is apparent, of course, that the same result would follow in any case where actual confidence existed and there was a wrongful violation of that confidence.

The decision in Ross v. Conway, 92 Cal. 632, 28 Pac. 785, rested upon evidence that there was actual undue influence exercised by the spiritual adviser of one who was of weak mind and in a dying condition. It is undoubtedly true, as therein declared, "that the influence which the spiritual adviser of one who is about to die has over such person is one of the most powerful that can be exercised upon the human mind, especially if such mind is impaired by physical weakness, is so consonant with human experience as to need no more than its statement; and in any transaction between them wherein the adviser receives any advantage, a court of equity will not enter into an investigation of the extent to which such influence has been exercised."

In Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 Pac. 555, it is held that the relationship of brother and sister is not of itself fiduciary, "but it is a material circumstance in determining whether, as a matter of fact, a fiduciary relation existed between them, which is more easily superinduced by reason of the blood relationship; and where it appears that special trust and confidence is reposed by one of them in the other, the one who occupies the superior position has the duties and responsibilities of a trustee, with the attendant consequences of the trust relation."

The case of De Arellanes v. Arellanes, 151 Cal. 443, 90 Pac. 1059, was an action to set aside a deed from a mother to her son and it was held that the transfer was valid where it was made "freely and voluntarily in the execution of a purpose conceived by her to so dispose of the property, without the exercise of any fraud on the part of the son, and with full understanding on her part of all the facts and the effect of such a transfer." Therein the rule announced in Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 140, 31 Pac. 910, is quoted with approval, wherein it is said: "When the parent is of great age, or is enfeebled by disease, and conveys his entire estate to one child, to the exclusion of other children dependent upon his bounty, the burden is unquestionably upon the donee to show that the gift was made freely and voluntarily and with full knowledge of all the facts and with perfect understanding of the effect of the transfer." Granting that this is a correct exposition of the rule, the burden, as we have already seen, was sufficiently met by respondents.

In Nobles v. Hutton, 7 Cal. App. 14, 93 Pac. 289, the judgment of the lower court was affirmed, which was based upon findings and sufficient evidence to the effect that "when the deed was executed, the plaintiff was old, infirm, of failing memory and of unsound mind, and by reason thereof incapacitated from attending to business and defendant took advantage of such incapacity and procured her to sign and acknowledge the deed without consideration; that the plaintiff was without independent advice and that defendant by taking advantage of plaintiff's mental weakness, and by the use of undue influence arising out of the relationship between them of mother and son and of principal and agent induced plaintiff to execute the deed."

Aside from the foregoing, appellants are mistaken, we think, in the view they take of the elements of independent advice and of the consideration for the transfer. They are not essential, as we have seen, to the validity of the transaction, but they are important elements to be regarded by the trial court. Under some circumstances, they might be decisive of the controversy, but here they were simply an important part of the evidence the weight and effect of which were committed to the judgment and conscience of the trial judge in the determination of the status of the property.

While there is no direct evidence that the notary who prepared the deed "advised" the grantor, as that term is generally understood, yet it does appear that she told the witness Mrs. Cook that she wanted to make a deed of her property to her daughter and asked the witness to see Mr. Baechtel and have him come to the house. It is true that Mrs. James saw the notary first and informed him of her mother's desire. Mr. Baechtel, in pursuance of the request, visited Mrs. Broaddus to ascertain what she wanted, and she then told him that she wanted to deed the property to her daughter. He then went to his office, prepared the deed as requested, and the same evening returned with it to Mrs. Broaddus. He informed Mrs. James that two witnesses would be required as her mother was blind. They were summoned and Mr. Baechtel read the deed over to Mrs. Broaddus, explained it and satisfied himself that she thoroughly understood it. Among other questions, he asked her if she understood that she was deeding her property to her daughter and she said she did. Not very much was said, but, according to the witnesses, the notary was careful in the performance of his duty, and it seems difficult to understand how anything more could have been expected of him. The declarations of the grantor show that she needed no particular advice or information in the premises, and for the notary to have undertaken to tell her what she already understood about the effect of the deed would have been entirely gratuitous and rather impertinent. The circumstance as to independent advice is to be regarded as bearing upon the question whether the deed is the voluntary act of the grantor, and it is not so significant, as contended by appellants, that a deed made "without the benefit of full, free and independent advice and counsel from a competent lawyer of her own selection will not be allowed to stand." It is deemed unnecessary to review the cases cited as to this point, but the rule in this state does not require, as declared in the case of Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 146, 31 Pac. 912, that "the donor acted upon independent advice in transactions between parent and child, when it appears that the gift was made freely, voluntarily, and with full understanding of all the facts and the effect of the transfer."

As to the consideration, while the evidence is somewhat meager, we cannot say it is insufficient to support the finding. It is conceded by respondents that if the services were rendered by Mrs. James without expectation of reward or agreement therefor, they must be considered as gratuitous and, in the absence of evidence, such would be the presumption, but it is insisted—and to this we assent—that the presumption is not conclusive but may be and has been rebutted "by showing circumstances which will support the implication that the services were to be paid for." The rule is so stated in Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 18, p. 1085, with citation of authorities. It is added that "The burden is, of course, on the person rendering the services to overcome the presumption which the law raises that such services were rendered gratuitously." Among the cases so holding is Finch v. Green, 225 Ill. 304, 80 N. E. 318, where a son and his wife cared for his aged father for over 20 years, and, in discussing the question of consideration, the Supreme Court of Illinois, after stating the general rule that "there can be a recovery only by proving the making of an express contract or circumstances from which a reasonable inference would arise that such a contract was in fact made," the court further says: "The evidence shows that David Finch recognized to the fullest extent a moral obligation on his part to pay for the valuable and unusual personal services rendered to him; but there is no evidence that prior to the making of the will there was an express contract to pay for them. * * * The evidence, however, justifies an inference of an express contract between the parties when the will was made, or certainly at the time of the execution of the deed. The deed was executed in the presence of appellant and his wife, and it is clear that it was made in consideration of the services rendered and to be rendered and the care and trouble which the grantor had caused to his son and wife. The services were of such a nature that they could scarcely be measured in money, and it was entirely competent for David Finch to place such a value upon them as he saw fit."

The declarations of the grantor as to her reasons for executing the deed would undoubtedly be admissible against her if she were alive and contesting the deed and they are equally admissible against her representatives. Code Civ. Proc. § 1853; Donnelly v. Rees, 141 Cal. 56, 74 Pac. 433; Stoddard v. Newhall, 1 Cal. App. 111, 81 Pac. 666. Such testimony may not be altogether satisfactory but it was the best that could be obtained, since the grantor and grantee were dead, and its weight was for the trial court.

We have considered all the points made in the full and able briefs of appellants, but we can see no reason to interfere with the conclusion of the court below, and the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by Oscar J. Broaddus, administrator, and others against Melvin Monroe James and others. From an order made after judgment refusing to dismiss proceedings for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 110 Pac. 158.

McNab & Hirsch and D. W. Burchard, for appellants. Mannon & Mannon, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from an order made after judgment denying a motion to dismiss the proceedings for a new trial. The only ground for the motion was that the bill of exceptions, after having been certified by the trial judge, was not served upon respondents in the action, who are appellants herein. After plaintiffs served their proposed bill, the defendants in due time proposed their amendments to the same. These were all accepted by said plaintiffs, whose counsel so informed one of the attorneys for defendants on the 29th day of July, 1908. On the same day plaintiffs presented to the trial judge the proposed bill and the amendments, and the judge thereupon, in the absence of and without notice to the defendants or their counsel, certified the bill so presented. The certified bill was filed, but not served upon the defendants or their counsel.

We think the motion was properly denied. Section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which the proceeding was taken, as it read at the time of the said settlement of the bill, did not require, where all the amendments proposed are allowed, that the certified bill should be served upon the adverse party. As pointed out by plaintiffs: "Two proceedings are evidently contemplated by said section 650—one in which the adverse party proposes amendments which are contested, and subsequently settled on notice to the parties designating the time for settlement, and another in which there is no controversy in regard to amendments, but either no amendments are proposed, or if any such are proposed, they are adopted by the person seeking the settlement of the bill, and the bill is filed with the clerk." In regard to the first contingency, the section provides how the matter may be brought to a hearing, and then directs that "At the time designated the judge must settle the bill. The bill must thereupon be engrossed and presented to the judge to be certified by the party presenting it, within ten days, and upon being certified must, within five days thereafter, be served upon the adverse party." The statute then provides for the case where there is no contest in reference to the bill, as follows: "If no amendments are served, or if served are allowed, the proposed bill may be presented, with the amendments, if any, to the judge or referee for settlement, without notice to the adverse party. * * * When settled, the bill must be signed by the judge or referee, with his certificate to the effect that the same is allowed, and must then be filed with the clerk." It is thus to be seen that in a case like the one before us no service of the bill as settled is required.

While it is true, as contended by defendants, that an appellant must follow closely the provisions of the statute in order to have his appeal perfected, it is equally true that he is not required to do more than the statute demands.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 16, 1910.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 16*)—"NOTICE OF APPROPRIATION OF WATER"—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY.

A notice of appropriation of water within a United States forest reservation, which states all the matters required by Civ. Code, § 1415, relating to the notice of appropriation of water, and which states the points of diversion as located on a designated section and township which the court judicially knows is within a reservation, is sufficient within section 1422, providing that where the place of intended diversion is within a reservation, and is so shown in the notice of appropriation, the claimant shall have a specified time after the grant of authority to occupy and use the reservation for such intended purpose within which to commence the construction of the works, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 16*)—APPROPRIATION OF WATER—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY.

The form of notice of appropriation of water of a stream is fixed by Civ. Code, § 1415, requiring a person desiring to appropriate water to post a notice stating enumerated facts, and section 1422, relating to diversion of water within any reservation, does not affect the form of notice.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 16*)—APPROPRIATION OF WATER—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY.

The purpose of Civ. Code, § 1422, fixing the time within which to commence excavations on public reservations for the purpose of making a diversion of the water of a stream, is to protect claimants unable to proceed with the work necessary to perfect their claims by reason of the fact that the place of intended diversion or a part of the route of intended conveyance is within a national reservation, pending the procurement, with due diligence, of the authority from the federal government, and the provision that the fact that the place of intended diversion is within a reservation shall be shown in the notice is inserted simply for the purpose of requiring the notice itself to furnish evidence of the fact and of holding the claimant to a specific point of diversion within a reservation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 16*)—APPROPRIATION OF WATER—NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY.

Civ. Code, § 1422, fixing the time within which to commence excavations on public reservations for the purpose of diverting water where the place of intended diversion or any part of the route of intended conveyance is within any reservation, is complied with where the notice gives such a description as will, with those matters of which courts take judicial notice, definitely locate the proposed point of diversion or the whole or some part of the proposed route of conveyance as within a reservation, and, when the facts stated in a notice enable a court to declare thereon that it is so located, the fact is sufficiently shown.

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 31*)—APPROPRIATION—RIGHT OF PRIOR APPROPRIATOR—TRANSFER OF RIGHTS.

A party claiming the right as a prior appropriator of the water of a stream by virtue of a right initiated by notice given by a third person as required by Civ. Code, § 1415, is entitled to show the agreements whereby the third person's rights are vested in him.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1058*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

The error, if any, in excluding questions asked a witness on cross-examination, is harmless where the witness testified fully in reply to subsequent questions asked on cross-examination.

7. WITNESSES (§ 372*)—IMPEACHMENT—INTEREST OF WITNESS—EXTENT OF CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Where, in a suit involving the priority of right to appropriate waters of a stream, one of the parties relied on the right acquired by a third person giving the notice prescribed by Civ. Code, § 1415, and such person on cross-examination testified that he had no interest in the action, and that he had received all that he was to receive, the sustaining of an objection to a question asked such person on cross-examination as to what he received at the time he disposed of his interest was not erroneous.

8. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 33*)—APPROPRIATION OF WATER—NOTICE.

Where a party relying on the right to divert waters of a stream at a point within a reservation, the records of the local land office, the land department, and the interior and agricultural departments in the matter of an application for a permit to do the proposed work, and the opposition thereto, are admissible to show the fact of such application and its determination, and as bearing on the question of diligence in making and prosecuting the same and the carrying on of work within the requisite time after the determination thereof and the issuance of a permit.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by A. G. Wishon against the Globe Light & Power Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hannah & Miller, Frank H. Short, and F. E. Cook, for appellant. E. C. Farnsworth, N. O. Bradley, and E. O. Larkins, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Plaintiff and defendant Globe Light & Power Company are conflicting claimants of the right to divert waters from points on the Tule river in Tulare county, said points of diversion not being far apart and both being within the United States forest reservation known as the "Sierra Forest Reserve." Each claim is based upon proceedings for the appropriation of such water had in accord with the provisions of title 8, pt. 4, division second of the Civil Code (sections 1410, 1422). The trial court found the claim of said defendant to be paramount to the extent of its right to take and divert from points described 50 cubic feet per second of the water, and that plaintiff's claim of the right to take and divert water of said river at a lower point which is otherwise sustained is subject and subordinate to the exercise of this right in said defendant.

The claim of defendant corporation is based upon a notice of appropriation posted by its predecessor in title, James W. Bursell, on September 26, 1902. It is admitted that this notice was in due form, stating all the matters required by section 1415, Civ. Code, and that it was duly and properly recorded in the proper county recorder's office. The notice did not in terms state that the proposed points of diversion were "within, and a part of, any national park, forest reservation," etc., but did state that they were located on section 15, township 20 S., range 30 E., M. D. B. & M. It is admitted that it is a matter for judicial notice that all of this section was within and a part of the Sierra Forest Reserve. Plaintiff's notice of appropriation was not posted until April 18, 1903. This notice also was in proper form and duly recorded. Like defendant's notice, it did not state in terms that either the place of intended diversion or any part of the route of intended conveyance of water was "a part of" any forest reservation, though it may be conceded that it sufficiently described the location to show that it was a part of the Sierra Forest Reserve. A careful examination of the record has satisfied us that the conclusion of the trial court to the effect that work was commenced under the Bursell notice within 60 days after the posting thereof and prosecuted diligently and uninterruptedly to April 17, 1903, must be held to be sufficiently supported by the evidence. On the last named day, April 17, 1903, United States Forest Supervisor White notified those engaged in the work that they must cease work; no permit having been obtained from the United States government for the doing of the same. The statute then provided that permission for such purposes must be obtained from the government, and only upon a finding by the proper officer that the same is not incompatible with the public interest. 31 U. S. Stat. 790.[1] On March 5, 1903, said defendant had filed its application for such a permit. This application was diligently prosecuted, being resisted by plaintiff, and was finally granted July 28, 1906. From April 17, 1903, to July 28, 1906, practically no work was done under the notice. Within 60 days after the granting of such permit, viz., on September 9, 1906, said defendant resumed work and diligently prosecuted the same to the time of the commencement of this action, September 21, 1906, and thereafter to completion. Plaintiff also seasonably applied for a similar permit, and the same was granted August 30, 1906. No work has as yet been done by him thereunder, but this is a matter of no importance on this appeal.

The law being that "as between appropriators the one first in time is the first in right" (section 1414, Civ. Code), said defendant's right is superior to that of plaintiff, unless it has failed to comply with the rules relating to an appropriation of water. The material rule here is that declared in section 1416, Civ. Code, that "within sixty days after the notice is posted, the claimant must commence the excavation or construction of the works in which he intends to divert the water, or the survey, road or trail building, necessarily incident thereto, and must prosecute the work diligently and uninterruptedly to completion, unless temporarily interrupted by snow or rain." Section 1417, Civ. Code, provides that "by 'completion' is meant conducting the waters to the place of intended use," section 1418, Civ. Code, that "by a compliance with the above rules the claimant's right to the use of the water relates back to the time the notice was posted," and section 1419, Civ. Code, that "a failure to comply with such rules deprives the claimants of the right to the use of the water as against a subsequent claimant who complies therewith."

The evidence being sufficient to support the conclusion that the work was prosecuted diligently and uninterruptedly to April 17, 1903, the main question presented is as to the effect of the cessation of work from April 17, 1903, to September 9, 1906, under direction from the United States Forest Supervisor. By act approved March 24, 1903 (St. 1903, c. 272), taking effect immediately upon its approval, section 1422 was added to our Civil Code. It provides: "If the place of intended diversion or any part of the route of intended conveyance of water so claimed, be within, and a part of, any national park, forest reservation or other public reservation, and be so shown in the notice of appropriation of said water, then the claimant shall have sixty days, after the grant of authority to occupy and use such park or reservation for such intended purpose, within which to commence the excavation or construction of said works," provided that the claimant shall diligently proceed with such surveys and other work as may be required as preliminary to, or for use with, an application for such authority, and provided, also, that the claimant shall in good faith on completion of such survey and preliminary work apply to the officer having charge of such park or reservation for such authority, and thereafter prosecute his application with reasonable diligence.

If this section may be successfully invoked by defendant corporation in support of its claim based on the notice of appropriation posted on September 26, 1902, it must be held that the suspension of work from April 17, 1903, to September 9, 1906, in no way affected its claim, for concededly the application for authority to do the work was promptly made and diligently prosecuted, and the work was resumed within 60 days after the granting of authority and diligently pursued to completion. The claim of learned counsel for plaintiff in this behalf is that the Bursell notice was not in such form or of such nature as to take the benefit of the new section, the particular point being that it was not "shown" therein that the place of intended diversion or any part of the route of intended conveyance of water claimed thereby was "within, and a part of" the Sierra Forest Reserve. As was substantially said by the learned trial judge, if the words "shown in the notice" be construed as meaning expressly stated in so many words in the notice, it must be conceded that both the Bursell notice and plaintiff's notice are insufficient to bring the claimants thereunder within the provisions of section 1422, Civ. Code, for neither notice so states in express terms. But we are satisfied that no such construction should be given to the language in question. It was no part of the design of section 1422, Civ. Code, to change the rule as to the form of notice of appropriation. That was a matter wholly covered by section 1415, Civ. Code, which, so far as the form of notice is concerned, has not been changed since its adoption in 1872. The sole object of section 1422 was to protect claimants who were unable to proceed with the work necessary to perfect their claims by reason of the fact that the place of intended diversion or a part of the route of intended conveyance was within and a part of some national forest reservation, etc., pending the procurement with due diligence of the essential authority from the United States government, and the provision that this fact should be "shown" in the notice was evidently inserted simply for the purpose of requiring the notice itself to furnish evidence of the fact, and of holding the claimant to a specific point of diversion within and a part of, or a specified route of intended conveyance wholly or partly within and a part of, a forest reservation, etc. Clearly it would appear to answer any possible object of the provision that the notice should give such a description as will, with those matters of which courts take judicial notice, definitely locate the proposed point of diversion or the whole or some part of the proposed route of conveyance as being within and a part of a forest or other public reservation. And this, we think, is all the language of the section calls for. It will be observed that the requirement is not that the notice must "state" that any such point is within or a part of a reservation, but simply that such fact must be "shown in the notice," and we are satisfied that it should be held to be so "shown" when the facts stated therein are sufficient to enable a court to declare thereon that it is so located and is a part of the reservation.

What we have said practically disposes of all the claims of plaintiff except certain alleged errors in the matter of the admission and exclusion of testimony.

On the objection of defendant, the court excluded a letter forwarded by the register of the United States Land Office at Visalia, transmitting the application of plaintiff for a permit to do his contemplated work to the proper officer at Washington, D. C. The letter is not in the record, and we certainly cannot say that it was in any way material, or constituted competent evidence in this cause. The application itself and the subsequent order granting the permit to plaintiff were introduced in evidence.

The evidence of Bursell as to his interview with Forest Supervisor White in charge of the Sierra Forest Reserve, just after White ordered the work stopped because no permit had been obtained from the government, in which White told him substantially that he could not proceed therewith without such a permit, was probably immaterial, in view of our conclusion that the claimant was fully protected by section 1422, Civ. Code, but its effect certainly was not prejudicial to plaintiff. The agreement between Bursell and Henley on the one hand and defendant corporation on the other was relevant and material to show the acquisition by said defendant of the right initiated by the Bursell notice.

We cannot see that certain questions asked Bursell on cross-examination as to the posting of other notices of appropriation prior to September 26, 1902, constituted proper cross-examination, and are of the opinion that the objections that the same were not proper cross-examination were properly sustained. It appears, however, that subsequent to the ruling complained of plaintiff cross-examined Bursell quite fully upon the matter of prior postings. What we have said is equally applicable to certain rulings on the cross-examination of Mr. Henley, Bursell's associate. Bursell, having testified upon cross-examination that he had no interest whatever in the defendant or in this action, was asked what he received at the time he disposed of his interest under the agreement with defendant corporation. An objection was sustained. The witness then testified that he had already received all that he was to receive, had been paid in full, and was not to receive any power or use of power from defendant corporation or any of the other defendants. We think the evidence thus given covered the question of pecuniary interest of the witness in the result of the action as fully as plaintiff could reasonably ask.

Two letters, one from Forest Supervisor White to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated April 23, 1903, and one from the acting commissioner to Forest Supervisor White, dated May 8, 1903, were introduced in evidence for the purpose of showing that the stopping of the work by the forest supervisor until a permit was obtained had the sanction and approval of the land department of the government. Assuming this evidence to be immaterial in view of our conclusion as to the effect of section 1422, Civ. Code, we are satisfied that it must be held to have been harmless. This appears to be practically conceded by learned counsel for plaintiff.

An objection that the proposed testimony is "irrelevant, immaterial, not competent or legal evidence" was made to various records of the local land office, the land department, and the interior and agricultural departments, in the matter of the application for a permit to do the proposed work by defendant corporation and the opposition of plaintiff thereto, and was overruled. These records included opinions and decisions of the various officers upon questions presented in the proceeding. We are satisfied that the whole record in the matter of the application of defendant corporation for a permit from the government was admissible, not only to show the fact of such application and its determination, but also upon the question of the diligence of such defendant in making and prosecuting the same, and the resumption of its work within the requisite time after the determination thereof and the issuance of a permit.

We do not see how the evidence of the president of defendant corporation to the effect that it is the intention of such defendant to expend some $250,000 in the installation of a power plant was material or relevant, but we cannot conceive that it may have operated to the prejudice of plaintiff.

There is no other matter requiring notice.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

A grant to the state by the swamp land act (Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, c. 84, 9 Stat. 519) of swamp lands unfit for cultivation, and requiring the Secretary of the Interior to make a list of the lands described and cause a patent to be issued to the state, is conditional and is limited to the lands listed by the Secretary of the Interior as lands described, and the subsequent act of 1866 (Act Cong. July 23, 1866, c. 219, 14 Stat. 218), committing the selection of the lands to other officers, does not alter the binding effect of the decision as to the lands described, and, where a decision is sought to be revised on the ground of fraud or mistake, the revision must be by direct proceeding for that purpose.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Rebecca A. Foss against John Johnstone, Jr., and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant John Johnstone, Jr., appeals. Affirmed.

E. Swift Torrance, J. B. Mannix, and Stearns & Sweet (E. S. Torrance, of counsel), for appellant. E. E. Keech, for respondent.

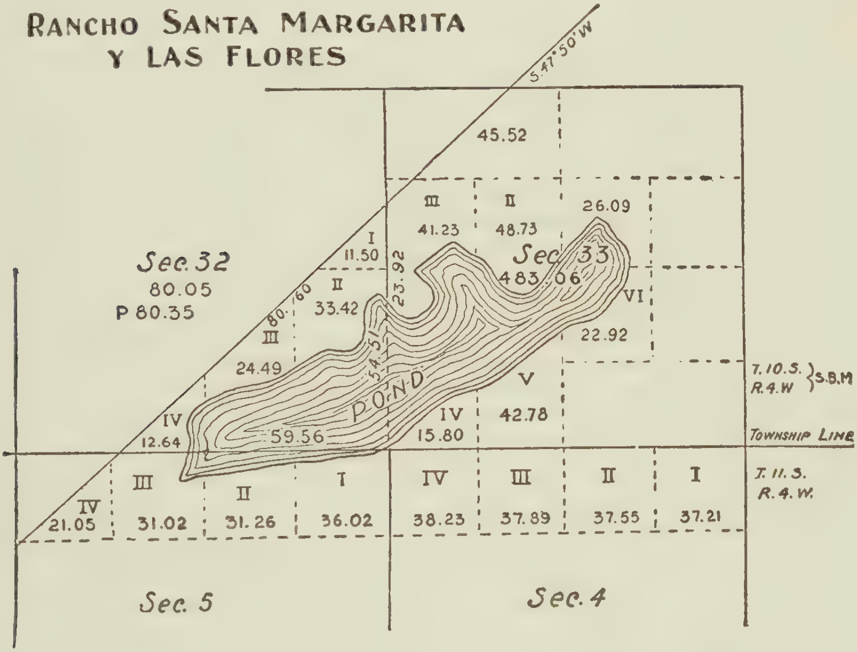
SHAW, J. This is an appeal by Johnstone from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff makes a preliminary objection to the jurisdiction of the appeal, on the ground that the notice of appeal was filed after the time limited for such appeals had expired. The notice of appeal was filed on September 29, 1909. It purports to appeal both from the judgment and from the order. The judgment was rendered on April 2, 1909. The record does not show the exact date of its entry, but the presumption is that it was entered before the judgment roll was made up, which was on April 8, 1909. The order denying the new trial was made and entered on July 30, 1909. The appeal from the judgment was taken within six months after the entry thereof. Hence it was in time, under section 939, Code Civ. Proc. If no notice of the entry of the judgment was served on the attorney for the appellant, as provided in section 941b, within 60 days before the taking of the appeal, then under sections 941b and 941c the sufficiency of the evidence may be considered on that appeal. But, as we have concluded that this may be done on the appeal from the order, it is not material in this case whether it can be done on the other appeal or not. With respect to the order, the notice of appeal states that Johnstone appeals "from the order made and entered in the minutes of said court on the 7th day of April, 1909, denying the motion of the said defendant, John Johnstone Jr., for a new trial of said action." The order was not made on that date, but was made on July 30, 1909. It is settled that a mistake in the notice of appeal, as to the date of the order or judgment appealed from, does not invalidate the appeal, where there is a description of the order or judgment referred to, in other parts of the notice, reasonably sufficient to identify it. Weyl v. Sonoma, etc., Co., 69 Cal. 202, 10 Pac. 510; Anderson v. Goff, 72 Cal. 65, 13 Pac. 73, 1 Am. St. Rep. 34; Swasey v. Adair, 83 Cal. 136, 23 Pac. 284.

The filing of the notice of appeal on September 29, 1909, 61 days after the 30th of July, the true date of the rendition and entry of the order, would make it too late if the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 939, were the only statute applicable to the case. But section 941b allows an appeal to be taken from a judgment, order, or decree at any time after the rendition thereof, provided it is within 60 days after notice of the entry thereof has been served on the attorney of record of the adverse party, or, if no such notice is given, then not later than six months after such entry. The appeal from the order would therefore be valid, unless notice of the entry of the order was served on July 30th. The record does not show that any notice of such entry was ever given or served. The plaintiff has not moved to dismiss the appeal, nor filed any affidavits or other evidence that such notice of entry was served. He raises the point solely by the objection that the record, upon its face, does not show that this court has jurisdiction of the appeal. The statute (941b) does not direct that the notice of the entry of the judgment or order shall be filed or put on record. In the orderly course of procedure it should be filed, even if the statute does not direct it. The sole purpose of the notice is to mark the beginning of the period limited for taking an appeal. When such notice is given, the appellant could make the transcript show jurisdiction by inserting a copy of it with the admission of service, and of the certificate of filing, if it is on file. But, if none is given and the appeal is taken more than 60 days after the entry, the appellant can make no showing of record on the subject, and can prove that his appeal is timely only by filing with the transcript an affidavit that no notice of entry has been served. In the absence of notice, the statute fixes the arbitrary limit of six months from the time of the entry. Jurisdiction of such appeals, taken prior to that time and after 60 days from the entry, must therefore depend upon matters not required to be of record. In these circumstances it seems that the better rule is to require the respondent, if he desires to raise the question, to support his claim by affidavit or other evidence, showing service of the required notice of entry of the order appealed from, and the date of such service.

We think the case may be distinguished from the Estate of More, 143 Cal. 495, 77 Pac. 407. That was an appeal taken before the enactment of section 941b. The transcript on appeal failed to show that the judgment had been entered, and as, under the construction uniformly given to section 939, Code Civ. Proc., an appeal before such entry was premature, and there was no other evidence before the court on the subject, it was held that there was a failure to show jurisdiction and a motion to dismiss the appeal on that ground was granted. The entry of a judgment is a matter of record. It is, indeed, the act which makes the judgment a record. If the transcript purports to be complete and does not show the entry of the judgment upon record in the judgment book as the law directs, there would be some sort of presumption that it had not been entered. It would be incumbent on the appellant in such a case to explain the omission or supply it if, in point of fact, the judgment had been entered. The present case is almost the opposite of that, so far as the legal presumptions and intendments are concerned, and we think the burden should be upon the respondent to show the service and establish the bar of the limitation, or the lack of jurisdiction. He can always protect himself from an unauthorized or invalid appeal by putting the proof of such service on file in the court below and bringing it to the attention of the appellate court.

The complaint states an ordinary cause of action to quiet title. The land in question, according to the contention of the plaintiff, is that part of sections 32 and 5, which underlies the pond as shown on the subjoined plat. Her claim thereto is based on certain patents from the United States for the land abutting upon the alleged pond, and its validity depends on the effect of these patents. They include lots numbered 2, 3, and 4 of section 32, of township 10 S., range 4 W., and lots numbered 1, 2 and 3, of section 5, township 11, S., range 4 W., all in San Diego county. These sections adjoin each other. The patents state that these lots are so numbered "according to the official plat of the survey of the said lands, returned to the General Land Office by the Surveyor General." The following is a copy of the part of the official plat which embraces the lots described and the pond in controversy:



The township line shown on this map was surveyed in 1854 by James E. Freeman. His field notes referring to natural objects near the post set at the common corners of sections 4 and 5, 32 and 33, say: "A lagoon containing a few acres bears north about six chains." The section lines of these townships were surveyed in 1869 by James Pascoe. His field notes relating to the survey of the section line between sections 4 and 5, starting from the south end, contain the following: "At seventy-nine chains twenty links, to an old corner on township line on the south bank of large pond of alkaline water. Then back on a true line. A large pond lying North of the corner to sections thirty-two and thirty-three, the corner being immediately at the edge of the pond. I set my instrument up at the corner of sections thirty-two and thirty-three on the South line of the township, with a variation of thirteen degrees East. Set a flag due North from the corner and on the north side of the pond. I then meandered around the pond." Then follow notes of courses and distances around the edge of the water designated on the map as a pond. These courses and distances correspond with and include the land claimed by the defendant Johnstone. The plat of township 10 was approved April 5, 1881. That of township 11 was approved December 24, 1870. One patent was executed on July 25, 1882; the other, that for lots 1 and 2 of section 5, on May 13, 1890.

The defendant Johnstone claims under a patent from the state of California issued March 10, 1906, purporting to convey to him all the land included in the meander lines of the pond as set forth in the field notes of the Pascoe survey aforesaid, as "swamp and overflowed lands," obviously referring to the lands granted to the state of California by the act of Congress of September 28, 1850. Act Sept. 28, 1850, c. 84, 9 Stat. 519. This patent does not refer to the field notes or any plat of the United States survey, but it sets forth the courses and distances thereof at length, and it includes all the land marked as "pond" on the aforesaid plat. The defendant Hale has no interest except as a mortgagee under a mortgage executed by Johnstone to her.

The theory of the plaintiff is that the patents from the United States are to be construed as grants of land bordering upon a body of water, and that in consequence thereof the titles of the owner of the land, under the laws of California, extends to and includes the bed thereof up to the center. The defendant Johnstone, on the other hand, claims that the line of the land is the meander line described, that the pond in controversy is not such a body of water as would give riparian rights to the owner of land along its border, and that it was of the character known as swamp and overflowed land, which vested in the state of California upon the passage of the act of 1850 aforesaid, and by the patent from the state became vested in him. The rule controlling the construction of a patent and its effect upon the title to the land granted is stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Packer v. Bird, 137 U. S. 669, 11 Sup. Ct. 210, 34 L. Ed. 819, a case arising in California, in the following words: "The courts of the United States will construe the grants of the general government without reference to the rules of construction adopted by the state for their grants; but whatever incidents or rights attach to the ownership of property conveyed by the government will be determined by the states. * * * As an incident of such ownership, the right of the riparian owner, where the waters are above the influence of the tide, will be limited according to the law of the state, either to high or low water mark, or will extend to the middle of the stream." This rule is approved and followed in Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 384, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 838, 35 L. Ed. 428; Mitchell v. Smale, 140 U. S. 412, 11 Sup. Ct. 819, 840, 35 L. Ed. 442; Kean v. Calumet, etc., Co., 190 U. S. 459, 23 Sup. Ct. 651, 47 L. Ed. 1134, and Hardin v. Shedd, 190 U. S. 519, 23 Sup. Ct. 685, 47 L. Ed. 1156. The law of California, with respect to the incidents attaching to land bordering upon waters, is settled by section 830 of the Civil Code as follows: "Except where the grant under which the land is held indicates a different intent, the owner of the upland, when it borders on tidewater, takes to ordinary high-water mark; when it borders upon a navigable lake or stream, where there is no tide, the owner takes to the edge of the lake or stream, at low-water mark; when it borders upon any other water, the owner takes to the middle of the lake or stream."

It is conceded that the pond in controversy is not navigable. The question whether it was navigable or not was not directly put in issue by the pleadings, and there is no express finding on the subject, but the findings give a description of the pond, showing it to be of such a character that it could not be navigable, and the evidence shows without doubt that it is not navigable. Consequently, if it is a pond at all, it comes within the class described as "any other water" in the last clause of the section, and, unless a different intent appears from the patents and documents referred to therein, the patentee of the land bordering upon it takes to the center of the pond. The reference in the patents to the official plat and survey make the plat and the field notes of the survey a part of the description of the land granted, as fully as if they were incorporated at length in the patents. This rule is followed both by the courts of this state and by those of the United States. Chapman v. Polack, 70 Cal. 493, 494, 11 Pac. 764; Seaward v. Malotte, 15 Cal. 306; Vance v. Fore, 24 Cal. 444; Powers v. Jackson, 50 Cal. 429; Heath v. Wallace, 138 U. S. 583, 11 Sup. Ct. 380, 34 L. Ed. 1053; Cragin v. Powell, 128 U. S. 691, 9 Sup. Ct. 203, 32 L. Ed. 566.

The patents expressly declare that they grant the lots mentioned, and that they contain a stated number of acres, being the same number of acres mentioned in the plat of the corresponding lots. It is claimed that this shows an intent to grant no more than the stated number of acres, and to make the meander line the boundary, and not the shore line of the pond. This claim is disposed of by the following passage from Hardin v. Jordan, supra: "It has been the practice of the government from its origin, in disposing of the public lands, to measure the price to be paid for them by the quantity of upland granted, no charge being made for the lands under the bed of the stream, or other body of water. The meander lines run along or near the margin of such waters are run for the purpose of ascertaining the exact quantity of the upland to be charged for, and not for the purpose of limiting the title of the grantee to such meander lines. It has frequently been held, both by the federal and state courts, that such meander lines are intended for the purpose of bounding and abutting the lands granted upon the waters whose margins are thus meandered; and that the waters themselves constitute the real boundary." See, also, Railroad Co. v. Schurmeir, 74 U. S. 287, 19 L. Ed. 74. And in that case, upon this rule, it was held that the title of the owner of a lot bounded by the meander lines of a lake extended over the line to the water's edge, and by construction, according to the law of the state in which it lay, to the center of the lake. In that case, as in this, the patent stated the number of acres granted to be the same as those marked upon the plat as the area of the particular lot mentioned, and that acreage included only the acreage inclosed by the survey lines, and did not include any part of the area beyond them, or between them and the water's edge. This rule of construction was followed in all of the other cases in the United States above cited.

In opposition to these views the appellant cites Grant v. Hemphill, 92 Iowa, 218, 59 N. W. 263, 60 N. W. 618; Carr v. Moore, 119 Iowa, 152, 93 N. W. 52, 97 Am. St. Rep. 292; Schlosser v. Hemphill, 118 Iowa, 452, 90 N. W. 842; Wright v. Council Bluffs, 130 Iowa, 274, 104 N. W. 492, 114 Am. St. Rep. 412;

Horne v. Smith, 159 U. S. 40, 15 Sup. Ct. 988, 40 L. Ed. 68; Niles v. Cedar Point Club, 175 U. S. 305, 20 Sup. Ct. 124, 44 L. Ed. 171; French-Glenn Co. v. Springer, 185 U. S. 47, 22 Sup. Ct. 563, 46 L. Ed. 800. In some of these cases it is held that a marsh is not a body of water within the meaning of the aforesaid rule as to meander lines. Others merely follow the Iowa rule regarding riparian rights, to the effect that the owner of land along any body of water, whether navigable or not, has no right or title beyond the edge of the water. None of these has any application to this case. Horne v. Smith is not favorable to the appellant. In French-Glenn Co. v. Springer the court says: "While the plats are conclusive as to the meander line, and while, if there is a lake abutting on or to the north of the lots, the plaintiff in error would take all land between the meander line and the water, it was competent for the defendant to show that there was not, at the time of the survey nor since, any such lake, and to contend that in such a state of facts there could be no intervening land and no accretion by reliction." The trial court had found that at the time of the survey and since there was not any lake abutting the lots. The evidence in the case at bar would not justify such a finding, and the court below found the contrary. Taken most favorably to the defendant, the evidence tended to show that the area of the pond varied according to the seasons, that there was always some water in it, and that, when it was full, the meander line practically coincided with its margin. It was full at the time of the sectional survey. At all times when the water did not come to the line, the character of the exposed land plainly indicated that it was the bed of a pond or lake. The case is not at all parallel to French-Glenn Co. v. Springer. The language of the court in Mitchell v. Smale, supra, is exactly applicable here: "The patents when issued refer to this plat for identification of the lots conveyed, and are equivalent to and have the legal effect of a declaration that they extend to and are bounded by the lake or stream. Such lake or stream itself, as a natural object or monument, is virtually and truly one of the calls of the description or boundary of the premises conveyed; and all the legal consequences of such a boundary in the matter of riparian rights and title to land under water regularly follow." Page 413, 140 U. S., page 821, 11 Sup. Ct. (35 L. Ed. 428). By section 830 aforesaid the title to the land patented to the predecessors of the plaintiff extends to the center of the pond. There is no distinction in this respect between lakes and ponds. Whether or not such title should be extended beyond the lines of the subdivisions bordering on the pond if they were extended into the pond, so as to include other subdivisions lying wholly within the pond, is a question which, as we understand the plat, does not arise in the case. But see 3 Farnham on Waters, § 843, and Grand Rapids, etc., Co. v. South Grand R., etc., Co., 102 Mich. 227, 60 N. W. 681, 25 L. R. A. 815, 47 Am. St. Rep. 516.

It remains to consider whether or not the title to the land within the meander lines and constituting the pond passed to the state of California by virtue of the swamp land act of 1850. As this is a federal question, the decisions of the United States Supreme Court regarding it are controlling. It has been repeatedly decided that the swamp land act of September 28, 1850 was, in effect, a present grant of all the "swamp and overflowed lands" then belonging to the United States situated within the limits of the state, and that the title of the state thereto did not depend on the actual issuance to the state of the patent therefor, as directed in the act itself. Owens v. Jackson, 9 Cal. 322; Summers v. Dickinson, 9 Cal. 554; Kernan v. Griffith, 27 Cal. 89; Tubbs v. Wilhoit, 73 Cal. 63, 14 Pac. 361; French v. Fyan, 93 U. S. 170, 23 L. Ed. 812; Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 488, 509, 7 Sup. Ct. 985, 30 L. Ed. 1039; Tubbs v. Wilhoit, 138 U. S. 137, 11 Sup. Ct. 279, 34 L. Ed. 887. It "is a present legislative grant of all the public lands within the state of the quality mentioned. The patent is matter of evidence and description by metes and bounds. The office of the patent is to make the description of the lands definite and conclusive, as between the United States and the state." Owens v. Jackson, supra. The act of 1850, however, did not identify the particular lands granted. It granted them only by the general description "swamp and overflowed lands." Identification was necessary in order to determine whether or not any particular tract came within the general description and passed by the grant. To facilitate this identification of such lands in California, Congress passed the act of July 23, 1866. Act July 23, 1866, c. 219, 14 Stat. 218. That act provided four methods of identification by the executive departments of the state of California and the United States: First. When the government survey and plat is approved, it directed the Commissioner of the General Land Office to certify to the state, as swamp and overflowed land, all lands represented as such on the approved plat. This was to be done within one year after the approval of the plat. Second. The Surveyor General of the United States was to examine the "segregation maps and surveys of the swamp and overflowed lands made by said state," and, if they conformed to the United States system of surveys, he was directed to make township plats conforming to said state surveys, and such amended plats, showing as swamp and overflowed lands those represented as such by the state surveys, were to be approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Third. Where such state surveys did not conform to the system of the United States, and in all townships not then surveyed, upon application to the Surveyor General by the governor of the state, the Surveyor General within one year after such application was to make segregation surveys and maps showing what land was swamp and overflowed, under the grant, according to the best evidence he could obtain. Fourth. If the authorities of the state should claim as swamp and overflowed land any land not represented as such in the maps and surveys made and approved by the United States authorities, the character of such land at the date of the grant, September 28, 1850, was to be decided by the Surveyor General, upon testimony taken before him, subject to the approval of the General Land Office.

On May 13, 1861, the Legislature of California passed an act establishing a board of swamp land commissioners, and providing that immediately after its organization the several county surveyors should make surveys and plats of the lands within their respective counties, showing thereon all the swamp and overflowed lands, and file the same with the state Surveyor General, who should compile a general state map therefrom which should be forwarded by the Governor to the United States as an exhibit of the lands claimed by the state under the said act of 1850. Stat. 1861, p. 355, §§ 19, 20, 21, 22. In Heath v. Wallace, supra, it was held that the "segregation maps" to be examined by the United States Surveyor General according to the second plan of identification provided in the act of July 23, 1866, as above stated, were the state maps forwarded under the act of 1861 aforesaid to the United States authorities, and that surveys made after the passage of the act of 1866 by county surveyors under the direction of the state Surveyor General, at the instance of one applying to purchase the land from the state, were mere private surveys, of no official force, and were not those referred to by the act of 1866. In this, that court, deeming it a matter of state cognizance, avowedly followed the decision of this court in Sutton v. Fassett, 51 Cal. 12, to the same effect.

The defendant Johnstone in the year 1905 made application to the state Surveyor General to purchase the land in dispute from the state, as land covered by the recession of inland lakes under the California statute of 1893. Stat. 1893, p. 341. Apparently the state by that statute intended to treat such land as swamp and overflowed land coming within the grant of 1850. McCord v. Slavin, 143 Cal. 329, 76 Pac. 1104. It had no other title thereto. The United States has not granted to the state the lands uncovered by the recession or drainage of inland lakes or ponds. Whether or not the lands of navigable lakes or ponds so uncovered is or is not the property of the state is a question not involved here, since this pond has never been navigable. Under the provisions of section 830 of the Civil Code, aforesaid, the lands within the limits of a nonnavigable lake or pond, which may be uncovered by the recession thereof, belongs to the owners of the abutting upland. Hence the title, if any, which Johnstone obtained by the patent issued to him upon this application is good only upon the condition that the land passed to the state as swamp and overflowed land under the said act of 1850. The survey made in pursuance of his application in 1905 was not a "segregation map" within the meaning of the second method of identification provided by the act of July 23, 1866. It did not determine that the land had passed to the state.

In Tubbs v. Wilhoit, 138 U. S. 139, 11 Sup. Ct. 279, 34 L. Ed. 887, the Supreme Court of the United States declared that the scheme provided by the act of July 23, 1866, for the identification of swamp and overflowed lands in California, superseded all previous rules and methods for that purpose. This land does not appear to have been identified as such by either of these methods. On the contrary, it has been identified as land of the United States by the method first above stated. It was represented on the official township plats, approved in 1870 and 1881, respectively, by the United States Surveyor General and acquiesced in by the state authorities, not as swamp and overflowed land, but as land covered by the waters of a permanent pond; that is, as lands belonging to the United States. This was a determination as to the fact of the matter intrusted to that officer to decide. McCabe v. Goodwin, 106 Cal. 486, 489, 39 Pac. 941. It was not certified to the state as swamp and overflowed land, or represented as such on those official plats. Nothing was done which would class it as swamp land within the first method of identification above mentioned. It was not included within any segregation map prepared by the state under the statute of 1861, as provided by the second method. The United States surveys of these townships were made after the passage of the act of 1866 and they were unsurveyed at that time. If the governor has applied to the United States Surveyor General to have the swamp lands in those townships segregated and certified to the state, the result has been that these lands have been excluded from the segregation, and certification thereof has been refused. Consequently they have not been identified as provided by the third method. It does not appear that the Governor or any other state officer has claimed these lands as lands belonging to the state and in reality swamp and overflowed, although not represented as such on the official plats of the United States survey, and therefore the state could not have obtained them under the fourth method. If any such proceedings had been taken, we would be required to take judicial notice of them as public official acts of the executive officers of this state and the United States. Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 3.

Under these circumstances, parol evidence is not admissible to prove that, although the land has thus been identified by the authorities of the United States, intrusted with that office, as lands which did not pass to the state under the act of 1850, it was nevertheless in fact swamp and overflowed land at that date and by virtue of that grant became the property of the state. The only decision that lends color to the proposition that such evidence is admissible for that purpose is Railroad Co. v. Smith, 76 U. S. 95, 19 L. Ed. 599. In that case there had been a failure on the part of the Secretary of the Interior, extending through many years after the passage of the swamp land act, to examine the lands within the state of Missouri, in which the land in dispute lay, and to segregate the swamp and overflowed land and certify it to the state as directed by the act of 1850. In the meantime the state had disposed of this and other lands to private persons, claiming the right to do so on the ground that it was swamp land, and that the grant of 1850 had vested title in the state. The title coming in question between the purchaser and persons claiming under a subsequent disposition thereof by the United States, evidence was admitted to show the actual character of the land at the date of the act of 1850. This was held to have been properly admitted; the court saying: "The matter to be shown is one of observation and examination, and whether arising before the Secretary, whose duty it was primarily to decide it, or before the court, whose duty it became because the Secretary had failed to do it, this was clearly the best evidence to be had, and was sufficient for that purpose." But in the case at bar there has been no failure on the part of the officers of the United States to perform the duty of identifying this land. It has been identified as land of the United States. It is not contended that the official plat did not purport to show its character and thereby identify it in the manner provided by the act of 1866. Appellant's claim is that the showing made on the map was false, that the "pond" shown thereon as covering this land was not a permanent pond as shown, but a mere temporary and intermittent collection of surface water from the adjacent land.

The subsequent decisions of the United States Supreme Court expressly limit the rule of Railroad Co. v. Smith to cases where the officer of the United States, whose duty it was to identify and certify swamp and overflowed lands to the states, has neglected and failed to do that duty. In Wright v. Roseberry, 121 U. S. 509, 7 Sup. Ct. 985, 30 L. Ed. 1039, after an elaborate review of the authorities relating to the steps necessary to complete the transfer of the legal title to such lands to the states, the court says: "The result of these decisions is that the grant of 1850 is one in præsenti, passing the title to the lands as of its date, but requiring identification of the lands to render the title perfect; that the action of the Secretary in identifying them is conclusive against collateral attack, as the judgment of a special tribunal to which the determination of the matter is intrusted; but, when that officer has neglected or failed to make the identification, it is competent for the grantees of the state, to prevent their rights from being defeated, to identify the lands in any other appropriate mode which will effect that object." Speaking of California lands, which were under consideration, it was further stated that the act of July 23, 1866, changed the law so far as lands in that state are concerned, and "no longer left their identification to the Secretary of the Interior, but provided for such identification by the joint action of the state and federal authorities." Under the joint action thus provided, the land has been identified, and under the principle just stated that identification is conclusive against collateral attack, such as that here proposed. In French v. Fyan, supra, parol evidence was held to be inadmissible, and, referring to Railroad v. Smith as holding the contrary, it is said: "The admission was placed expressly on the ground that the Secretary of the Interior had neglected or refused to do his duty; that he had made no selection or list of the land and would issue no patents, although many years had elapsed since the passage of the act. * * * There is in this no conflict with what we decide in the present case, but, on the contrary, the strongest implication that, if in that case the Secretary had made any decision, the evidence would have been excluded." The early California decisions, inconsistent with this, were expressly disapproved. Justice Miller wrote the decisions in both cases. Similar explanations of Railroad v. Smith were made in Ehrhardt v. Hogaboom, 115 U. S. 67, 5 Sup. Ct. 1157, 29 L. Ed. 346, Chandler v. Calumet, etc., Co., 149 U. S. 79, 13 Sup. Ct. 798, 37 L. Ed. 657, and McCormick v. Hayes, 159 U. S. 338, 16 Sup. Ct. 37, 40 L. Ed. 171; and parol evidence to controvert the decision actually made by the proper officers in identication of such lands was declared to be inadmissible.

On principle this would seem to be the effect of the terms of the act of 1850, without reference to authority. The description of the lands thereby granted in præsenti as "swamp and overflowed lands, made unfit thereby for cultivation," was general and indefinite. Identication was necessary. The act provided therefor by making it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to make a list of "the lands described as aforesaid, and transmit the same to the Governor of the state," and cause a patent to be issued, on which the fee simple was to vest in the state. Obviously the grant was in a certain sense conditional and was limited to the lands listed by the Secretary as "the lands described." He was appointed by the grantor as the person to make the selection according to the facts and his determination was binding on the states, in the absence of fraud or mistake. The act of 1866 committed the selection to other officers, but did not alter the binding effect of the decision. And, if it is to be revised on the ground of fraud or mistake, such revision must be by a direct proceeding for that purpose. It is not to be allowed at any time and in any collateral matter in which the fact may appear to be material.

The court below correctly held that the plaintiff was the owner of the part of the pond lying within sections 32 and 5 and in giving judgment to that effect. The defendant obtained no title thereto by his patent from the state.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BENJAMIN. (Cr. 1,586.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 20, 1910.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 406*)—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where the preponderance of the evidence on the issue whether extrajudicial statements by accused were freely and voluntarily made without improper persuasion was in favor of the view that they were so made, the court did not err in admitting them as evidence.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Wilbur Benjamin was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

T. A. Ragain, for appellant. W. A. Anderson for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was informed against in the superior court of Yolo county on October 16, 1909, for the crime of murder in the killing of one Violette Gilmer. His trial resulted in a verdict of murder in the first degree on November 19, 1909, and on November 22, 1909, he was adjudged to suffer death. He appeals to this court from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The record on appeal was filed herein on December 11, 1909. No brief has been filed on appellant's behalf, nor did any one appear for him when the case was regularly called for argument. This being a capital case, we nevertheless have examined the record and find nothing warranting interference with the action of the lower court.

The evidence shows that the killing of Violette Gilmer was a most atrocious and brutal one, amounting beyond the possibility of a doubt to murder in the first degree. No one could claim that the person guilty of this crime should not suffer the extreme penalty of the law. The question of fact on the trial was whether this defendant was the person who committed the homicide. His own extrajudicial statements, made in the presence and hearing of his father, the district attorney, an official stenographer, and certain other officers, shortly after his arrest, considered in connection with the evidence of other witnesses as to his whereabouts at and about the time of the commission of the crime, were certainly sufficient to warrant the conclusion that he was the perpetrator. Indeed, in view of the evidence, it is difficult to see how one could have a reasonable doubt on that question.

Perhaps the most debatable question presented by the record is whether the statements of the defendant above referred to were made under such circumstances that they could properly be received in evidence. There was, it is true, some conflict in the evidence as to whether they were freely and voluntarily made, without improper persuasion or inducement. But the preponderance of the evidence on this question was in favor of the view that the statements were freely and voluntarily made, without improper persuasion or inducement, and it cannot be held that the court erred in admitting them in evidence.

We have read the whole record in this case and find no reason to doubt that the defendant has had a fair trial on the merits, and that he has been deprived of no substantial right.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

1. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 10*)—RIGHT OF PARENT—APPOINTMENT—DISCRETION.

The determination from the evidence as to the character of the father and other facts bearing on the condition and welfare of his child, whether he should have the guardianship of her person, is largely one of discretion in the trial court.

2. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 10*)—GUARDIAN OF PERSON—CONFLICTING PROPERTY INTERESTS.

It is no sufficient objection to the appointment of one as guardian of the person only of an infant that they are adversely interested in property, there being nothing to indicate this will prevent the guardian giving the child proper care, or to show she has not kind and friendly feelings for the child.

In the matter of the estate and guardianship of Lucile Richmond Bedford, a minor. From orders relative to the appointment of a guardian, Charles A. Bedford appeals; Lucie M. Lambourn being the respondent. Affirmed.

Geo. P. Adams, McNutt & Hannon, and J. G. McNutt, for appellant. Horace S. Wilson and Constan Jensen, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order appointing Lucie M. Lambourn guardian of the person of Lucile Richmond Bedford. There is also an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial of the issues. The minor is the daughter of Bedford and his wife, Eileen Mitchell Bedford, now deceased. Lucie M. Lambourn is the aunt of the minor. She was a sister of the mother. Bedford filed a petition asking that he be appointed guardian of the person and estate of the child. Mrs. Lambourn filed a counter petition, asking that she be appointed such guardian, alleging that Bedford, the father, was not fit, proper, or competent to receive such appointment. She also filed an opposition or answer to the petition of Bedford, again setting up his unfitness for the trust. Bedford filed an answer or opposition to her petition, alleging that she should not be appointed guardian for the reason that she had property interests adverse to those of the minor, and that because of this interest she was not a proper person to be appointed such guardian. The court denied both petitions, so far as the guardianship of the estate of the minor is concerned, and appointed the Los Angeles Trust Company as such guardian. There is no appeal from this part of the order. The only matter in controversy here is the guardianship of the person. The order denies the petition of Bedford and appoints Lucie M. Lambourn guardian of the person of the minor. These parts of the order are presented for review.

Upon the main question no question of law arises. The determination from the evidence concerning the character of a father and other facts bearing on the condition and welfare of the child, whether or not he should have the guardianship of the person of his child, is a question largely in the discretion of the court below. The minor is a little girl of tender years, born on April 6, 1904. The father is unmarried at the present time. It is not necessary to repeat here the evidence concerning his character and fitness. Suffice it to say that it is sufficient to support the conclusion of the court below that he was not a suitable or fit person to have the guardianship of the person of a female child of that age. The court made findings covering the issues and therein states the facts with perhaps unnecessary detail. We need not discuss the sufficiency of the evidence to prove all of these details. There are clearly enough circumstances sustained by the evidence to justify the general conclusion as to the ultimate fact.

Inasmuch as the guardianship of the estate was awarded to the Los Angeles Trust Company and both parties acquiesce in that appointment, the contention that Lucie M. Lambourn is interested in certain property adversely to the interest of the ward is not material or at all events not decisive. Doubtless the court below intended to remove any objection of this character by the appointment of a disinterested person, the trust company, as the guardian of the estate. Whatever property interest the child may have that is opposed by the respondent will, it is to be presumed, be properly and effectively protected and preserved by the guardian of the estate whose duty it is and will be to defend and protect her property rights. The hostility in interest is not of a character that would require this court to reverse the decision of the court below with respect to the control of the person of the child. There is nothing to indicate that the interest of the aunt would prevent her from giving the child proper care, nurture, and attention, or to show that she has not kind and friendly feelings for the child.

A large number of rulings upon the admission and rejection of evidence are assigned as error. With regard to nearly all of them, it is sufficient to say that they are either correct or entirely unimportant and harmless and too trivial for discussion. Appellant sought to impeach a witness against him by proof of declarations and conduct tending to show an unfriendly feeling on the part of the witness toward appellant. The witness was not asked concerning these acts or declarations. There was therefore no foundation laid for the introduction of the impeaching testimony of third persons and the ruling excluding it was correct. It is necessary to lay the foundation for such evidence by calling the attention of the main witness to the alleged acts and declarations and giving him an opportunity to explain them, as in the case of inconsistent statements. Baker v. Joseph, 16 Cal. 177; Silvey v. Hodgdon, 48 Cal. 188; People v. Blackwell, 27 Cal. 68; Fagan v. Lentz, 156 Cal. 689, 105 Pac. 951. The court allowed in evidence the record of a judgment of divorce between Bedford and the child's mother, on the ground of desertion of her by him, in which the custody of the child was awarded to the mother; also a statement signed by him and his wife afterward consenting to the adoption of the child by its grandmother under an order to be made by the judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county. These two rulings the appellant declares to be the most important of the alleged errors against him. The rulings were not erroneous. The documents were admissible as evidence of circumstances bearing on the issue of fitness, the weight of which was for the consideration of the trial court.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing is denied. We concede that there is not sufficient evidence to support the finding of the trial court that the father abandoned his minor child. That finding, however, is not essential to support the order appointing a guardian, and insufficiency of evidence to support it is therefore not a sufficient reason for reversal. The finding of abandonment is disapproved.

Street Railway Bonds." A demurrer to the complaint was sustained and judgment was thereupon entered for defendants. These are appeals by plaintiff from said judgment and from an order denying plaintiff's application for a preliminary injunction.

We shall assume for the purposes of these appeals that all questions raised by the plaintiff as to the validity of the proposed bonds may be raised by a taxpayer in a proceeding of this character. The proposed bonded indebtedness is one purporting to be authorized by a vote of the electors of the city and county at a special election held on December 30, 1909, for the purpose of the construction and completion of certain proposed municipally owned street railways.

Assuming for the moment the validity of the provisions of the freeholders' charter of the city and county of San Francisco, which was framed, adopted, and approved under the provisions of section 8 of article 11 of our Constitution, relative to the acquisition, construction, and completion of public utilities by said city and county, there can be no doubt that they are comprehensive enough to authorize the acquisition, construction, and completion of municipally owned street railways. In so saying we may freely concede, as claimed by the plaintiff, that such a power in a municipality can exist only when expressly conferred by the state. It is true that the charter of the city and county nowhere specifically designates a "street railroad" as a thing which may be so acquired, constructed, or completed, but the grant of power to acquire "any public utility" clearly includes street railroads. Section 14 of article 12 of the charter, adopted by the electors of the city and county in the year 1907 and approved by the Legislature of the state November 23, 1907 (St. Ex. Sess. 1907, p. 37), is as follows: "The city and county shall have power to acquire, construct or complete any public utility from funds derived from taxes levied for that purpose, or from funds derived from the sale of bonds issued for that purpose, as is provided in this charter, and may operate, maintain, sell or lease the same subject to the other provisions and limitations of this charter."

This is the last section of the article in such charter, entitled "Acquisition of Public Utilities," an article contained in the charter when originally adopted in 1899 (St. 1899, p. 346). Unless the effect of the section just quoted is limited by other provisions of the article, it constitutes a clear authorization, in express terms, to the city and county to acquire, construct, or complete whatever is embraced by the term "public utility" used therein. We do not desire to be understood as intimating that the article as it existed prior to the addition of this section was not sufficient to show such an authorization, but the section certainly conferred the power as clearly and definitely as any language that could be used. The only question, then, is as to the meaning of the term "public utility" as used in this section and in the other sections of the same article. The term is certainly broad enough to include a street railroad; is one that would ordinarily be understood as including any such utility as is employed in the rendition of quasi public service, such as waterworks, gasworks, a telephone system, street railroads, etc., and was manifestly used throughout this article of the charter as embracing all such utilities. As originally adopted, article 12 of the charter expressly declared the purpose and intention of the people of the city and county to gradually acquire and ultimately own its "public utilities." Section 1 provided that at least every two years until this object had been attained, the supervisors must procure through the city engineer plans and estimates of the actual cost of the original construction and completion by the city and county "of waterworks, gasworks, electric light works, steam, water, or electric power works, telephone lines, street railroads, and such other public utilities as the supervisors or the people by petition to the board may designate," and contained an additional special provision as to waterworks, which is of no importance here. The following sections provided that the supervisors should, at as early a date as they may deem for the best interests of the city and county, enter into negotiations for the permanent acquisition of such, or any, "of said public utilities" as they may regard most important to be first acquired, and submit to the electors propositions for such acquisition, that they must submit such a proposition as to "any public utility" whenever petitioned so to do by a certain proportion of the electors, and that whenever the cost of any public utility sought to be acquired could not be paid out of the annual revenues of the city, a proposition for a bonded indebtedness must also be submitted to the electors. It is not and could not be questioned that the terms "public utility" and "public utilities," as used in the article as originally adopted, included street railroads. Learned counsel for plaintiff rely entirely on certain amendments to the charter, approved by the Legislature February 5, 1903, and particularly on the amendment of section 1 of said article (St. 1903, p. 591). The express declaration of the purpose to gradually acquire and ultimately own its "public utilities" was not changed. By the amendment of section 1, the requirement that the supervisors must at least every two years procure plans and estimates of the cost of public utilities was eliminated. This provision, it will be borne in mind, was the one designating certain public utilities by name. For this was substituted a provision to the effect that whenever the supervisors shall by ordinance determine that the public interest or necessity "demands the acquisition, construction or completion of any public utility or utilities by the city and county," or whenever a sufficient petition therefor is presented by the electors, the supervisors must procure such plans and estimates of cost thereof. The special provision as to waterworks was left practically untouched, thus leaving "waterworks" the only utility anywhere designated by name in the article. The other amendments were of no importance so far as the question before us is concerned. It is obvious that the meaning of the term "public utilities" as used in the original article was in no way changed or intended to be changed by the amendment of 1903, and that it was used in that amendment and likewise in section 14, art. 12, adopted in 1907, with the same meaning.

The principal object of the amendment of 1903 cannot be more clearly stated than it was by the learned judge of the trial court, who said: "The only object and purpose in amending section 1 was to relieve the city engineer and the board from the duty of having plans, specifications, and estimates of the cost and construction and completion of all these named public utilities drawn up every two years. It was evidently found to impose a useless and onerous burden on the board of public works and the city engineer. So the section was changed to provide that the city engineer need not draw plans and estimates every two years, but whenever the board decided to acquire any public utility then, and only then, it should be his duty to draw plans and estimates. This was the sole purpose of the amendment, and it cannot be held to be an expression of intent that thereafter the city and county could not acquire any of the utilities specifically named in the original, but omitted from these sections as amended." To this may be added the statement that the omission in section 1 as amended, of any designation of specific utilities, was, as stated in a quotation contained in defendant's brief, "for the purpose of making it broader rather than narrower and to meet the possible application of the principle of ejusdem generis." There is no possible foundation for the claim that the intention was to make waterworks the only public utility that could be acquired by the city and county. There is nothing in Hyatt v. Williams, 148 Cal. 585, 84 Pac. 41, in any way inconsistent with our conclusion on this branch of the case.

This brings us to the question of the validity of the charter provisions relative to public utilities. We do not understand that it is seriously claimed that the state may not invest its municipalities with the power to acquire and operate any such necessary public utility as is generally owned and operated in a city by what is ordinarily known as a public service corporation, such as waterworks, gas or electric light works, street railways, etc. The existence and proper conduct of such utilities in cities clearly constitute public affairs, one relating very closely to the well-being, safety, health, advantage, and convenience of all the inhabitants thereof, and are well within the legitimate functions of government. If the state deems it conducive to the welfare of the inhabitants of a city that the municipality shall have the power to itself acquire and operate for their benefit any such utility, in order that they may not be dependent solely on the establishment or operation thereof by some private corporation, or person, there can be no doubt of its right to confer such power on the municipality. As to such utilities as waterworks and artificial light works this power has long been exercised by municipalities in various sections of the United States under authorization from their respective states, and this is particularly true in California. We do not understand that the right of a state to invest its municipalities with such power has ever been doubted. There is no difference material here between an artificial lighting plant to supply the inhabitants with light and a street railway. Both are matters pertaining to the internal affairs of the state, as to which the state has absolute power. It is purely a question of local policy with each state what shall be the extent and character of the powers which its various political organizations shall possess (see Claiborne v. Brooks, 111 U. S. 400, 410, 4 Sup. Ct. 489, 28 L. Ed. 470; In re Pfahler, 150 Cal. 71, 79, 88 Pac. 270, 11 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1092). There is no provision of our state Constitution which either expressly or by implication forbids the acquisition, ownership, or operation of any of such public utilities by a municipality or prohibits the granting to a municipality of the power to acquire, own, and operate them. To the contrary, the Constitution expressly recognizes that a municipality may be invested with the power to acquire and control public utilities by declaring in section 19, article 11, that any individual or company incorporated for that purpose shall have the privilege of using the public streets of a city for pipes and conduits so far as necessary to supply the city and its inhabitants either with gaslight or other illuminating light, or with fresh water for domestic and all other purposes, "in any city where there are no public works owned and controlled by the municipality for supplying the same with water or artificial light."

Of course, a grant by the state of such power is essential to its exercise by a municipality, municipalities being confined to the exercise of such powers as are expressly or by necessary implication conferred by the state. The question presented here is whether, under the provisions of our Constitution, such power in regard to public utilities can be granted or conferred by the state by provisions contained in a freeholders' charter framed by the municipality itself under section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution and approved by the Legislature of the state by concurrent resolution. If this question be answered in the negative, the provisions of the San Francisco charter relative to the acquirement of public utilities would be ineffectual for any purpose, and there being no other law purporting to confer such power on San Francisco, that city and county would be without the power.

But it seems very clear to us, that, under our system, the power can be so conferred or granted, and that action by the state Legislature, other than its action in approving the charter by concurrent resolution, is in no wise essential. Section 8, article 11, of the Constitution, provides that any city of the requisite population named therein, through a board of freeholders elected by the electors "may frame a charter for its own government, consistent with and subject to the Constitution." A charter so framed must be submitted to the qualified electors for approval. If approved by the electors it must be submitted to the Legislature of the state for approval or rejection as a whole. "Such approval may be made by concurrent resolution, and if approved by a majority vote of the members elected to each house, it shall become the charter of such city, or, if such city be consolidated with a county, then of such city and county, and shall become the organic law thereof, and supersede any existing charter, * * * and all amendments thereof, and all laws inconsistent with such charter." The section provides a method for amendments to such charter, under which approval by the electors and state Legislature must be had as in the case of the original charter.

It cannot be questioned, in view of our decisions, that, as to all matters properly embraced therein, the provisions of a freeholders' charter so framed and approved have the same force and effect as they would have if contained in a special charter enacted as an ordinary law by a Legislature not restrained in any manner by constitutional limitations. The section of the Constitution thus referred to provides a special mode for the enactment of the "organic law" of such of the cities having the requisite population as desire to take advantage of its provisions. It was said by this court in Sheehan v. Scott, 145 Cal. 684, 688, 79 Pac. 350, 351, speaking of such a charter: "The act of the city in formulating the charter and determining the provisions to be included therein has the same force and authority as would a charter with the same provisions enacted by a Legislature that was not restrained by any constitutional limitations. Its adoption by the city and approval by the Legislature in the manner prescribed by said section is the mode prescribed by the Constitution for its enactment, and has the same effect as that of a law which is passed by bill, under the provisions of section 15 of article 4." Again it was said, speaking of the validity of provisions in a freeholders' charter providing for the direct exercise of legislative power by the electors: "If the Legislature, in providing by general statute for the organization and government of municipalities, can grant such power to the people thereof, there can, of course, be no question that such power may be vested in the people of a city by the provisions of a freeholders' charter framed by the city, ratified by the electors thereof, and approved by the Legislature under section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution." In re Pfahler, 150 Cal. 71, 92, 88 Pac. 270, 279 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092.

The only question then appears to be whether such provisions as are here involved may be properly included in a freeholders' charter, or to state it in another way, is it within the scope of such a charter to define the powers that shall be exercised by a municipality? It is only by finding some limitation in our Constitution as to freeholders' charters that distinguishes them in this regard from ordinary municipal charters that any but an affirmative answer can be given to this question. The "charter" of a municipality is, as Mr. Dillon says, "its constitution," giving to it "all the powers it possesses (unless other statutes are applicable to it)," and invariably defines its powers, including its special and peculiar powers, and includes "a minute and detailed enumeration of the powers" of its legislative body. 1 Dillon's Mun. Corp. § 39. Prior to our present Constitution the charter of each municipality was the special act of the state Legislature creating it, defining its powers, and providing for all the details of its government. Some of such charters still remain in force; the municipalities possessing the same not having elected to organize under the general laws for the organization of municipal corporations or to obtain a freeholders' charter under section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution. As to these, such special legislative act constitutes the "charter" of the municipality. See Ex parte Helm, 143 Cal. 553, 77 Pac. 453; Ex parte Lemon, 143 Cal. 558, 77 Pac. 455, 65 L. R. A. 946. The Constitution of 1879 forbade the creation of municipal corporations by special law, and required the Legislature in lieu thereof to provide by general laws for the incorporation, organization, and classification of municipal corporations according to population. Section 6, art. 11, Const. This is the scheme referred to by Mr. Dillon in section 41 of his work on municipal corporations, being, as he says, to grade corporations into classes according to their size as into cities of the first class, second class, etc., "and to bestow upon each class such powers as the Legislature deems expedient." Under this section we have our general municipal corporation act, providing for each of the six classes of municipal corporations established thereby "such a municipal charter as was considered by it [the Legislature] to be necessary for cities of the population embraced within that class." Ex parte Jackson, 143 Cal. 564, 568, 77 Pac. 457. The portion of such act applicable to any city organized thereunder is in fact the "charter" of such city "in the same sense that a special act incorporating a city, adopted prior to our present Constitution * * * is a charter" (Ex parte Jackson, 143 Cal. 569, 77 Pac. 459), and there can be no doubt that provisions therein prescribing and conferring the powers of such a city, including the power to acquire, own, and operate such a public utility as is here involved are within the proper scope of such an act. Certainly such has been the construction uniformly given to this section of the Constitution by the Legislature ever since the adoption of the Constitution (see R. R. Commission v. Market St. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 680, 64 Pac. 1065), and the construction uniformly adopted by the courts. There is no distinction material to the question we are now considering between the charters we have referred to and the freeholders' charter provided for by section 8, article 11, of the Constitution. The whole purpose of the scheme of such freeholders' charter originally was to enable any city having more than a certain number of inhabitants, originally 100,000, to adopt, subject to the approval of the Legislature and in lieu of the charter provided by the general municipal corporation act or the old special legislative charter, such a charter, to use the language of the learned trial judge, as the people thereof "deemed appropriate and adequate to its situation and condition and the full and proper administration of all its affairs." The charter so adopted was to be "the charter of such city" and "the organic law thereof." There never could have been any suspicion in the minds of the framers of this section or in the minds of the people adopting it that the charter thus provided for should not be as comprehensive in its scope as the ordinary legislative charter. That such charter should define the powers which the city should have, and that the adoption and approval of the charter in the manner provided should confer the powers (provided, of course, no law of the state prohibited the conferring of such powers) just as in the case of the ordinary legislative charter, was so obviously intended that it should not be necessary to discuss the matter at all.

Learned counsel for plaintiff seek to find a limitation on the scope of such freeholders' charter in the use of the words "for its own government," in the permissive provision of section 8, article 11, "any city * * * may frame a charter for its own government, consistent with and subject to the Constitution," etc. The theory appears to be that the word "government" was used with reference to the recognized distinction between governmental and proprietary powers of a municipality, with the design to strictly limit the powers that could be conferred by such a charter to the exercise of purely public and governmental functions as distinguished, to use the language of Mr. Dillon, from "powers * * * not * * * conferred, primarily or chiefly, from considerations connected with the government of the state at large, but for the private advantage of the particular corporation as a distinct legal personality." 1 Dillon on Mun. Corp. § 66. The operation by a municipality of an electric lighting plant for the purpose of furnishing light to its inhabitants for domestic purposes has been held by this court to fall within the latter class (Davoust v. City of Alameda, 149 Cal. 69, 84 Pac. 760, 5 L. R. A. [N. S.] 536). On this distinction, says Mr. Dillon, in the section last referred to, rests the doctrine of implied liability of municipal corporations for the negligence of their servants, agents, or officers in the execution of corporate duties or powers. This division of "municipal functions" exists for certain purposes, among which is the purpose just stated of making municipalities liable to private action in certain cases (see 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 67; concurring opinion of Justice Shaw in Davoust v. City of Alameda, supra), but it affords no warrant whatever for the narrow and unusual meaning sought by learned counsel to be attributed to the word "government" as used in section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution. "Government" is defined as being the "exercise of authority in the administration of the affairs of a state, community, or society" (Century Dictionary), "the act of governing, or the state of being governed, especially authoritative administration of the affairs of a state or other community" (Standard Distionary). These definitions include every function which may lawfully be allotted to a municipality to perform. No other meaning can reasonably be attributed to the word "government" as used in the section under consideration. To hold otherwise would be to defeat in a most material part the manifest purpose of the whole scheme of freeholders' charters which we have hereinbefore described.

As we have seen, under section 14 of article 12, the charter purports to authorize the city and county of San Francisco not only to acquire, construct, and complete any public utility and operate and maintain the same, but also to sell or lease the same subject to the other provisions and limitations of the charter. It is urged that a sale or lease might be made upon such terms and under such circumstances as to constitute a lending of public credit, or a conferring of special privileges and immunities upon a private individual or corporation in a manner violative of certain provisions of the state Constitution, and the theory of counsel, as we understand it, is that the whole section must be held void because it purports to authorize such a sale or lease. That there may be either a sale or lease upon such terms and under such circumstances as not to be violative of any constitutional provision we do not understand to be disputed. Of course, the charter cannot be construed as purporting to authorize any other kind of sale or lease.

The only other matters requiring discussion are some of the claims made by plaintiff as to the validity of the proceedings taken by the various officials, "tested in the terms of the charter."

Section 1 of article 12 of the charter, as amended in 1903 (St. 1903, p. 591), provides that "whenever the board of supervisors by ordinance, as hereinafter provided, shall determine that the public interest or necessity demands the acquisition, construction, or completion of any public utility or utilities by the city and county," or whenever a proper petition "for the acquisition" thereof by electors is filed, the supervisors must procure from the board of public works, through the city engineer, plans and estimates of the cost of original construction and completion by the city and county of the same. Section 5 of the same article, as amended in 1903 (St. 1903, p. 593), provides that whenever the board of supervisors shall determine that the "public interest or necessity demands the acquisition, construction, or completion of any public utility or utilities, it shall specifically declare such determination by an ordinance, which shall also direct the board of public works to procure and file plans and estimates," etc. When the cost of the same can be paid out of the annual revenues the supervisors shall, as soon after the filing of such plans and estimates as it may deem for the best interests of the city and county, enter into such negotiations and contract "as may be necessary for the acquisition of the same." If such cost shall so far exceed the annual revenues as to make a bonded indebtedness essential, a proposition or propositions for the acquisition of such utility or utilities must be submitted to the electors at a special election. Section 2 of article 12, as amended in 1903 (St. 1903, p. 591), provides that "before submitting propositions to the electors for the acquisition by original construction or condemnation of public utilities, the board of supervisors must solicit and consider offers for the sale to the city and county of the existing utility, in order that the electors may have the benefit of acquiring the same at the lowest possible cost thereof."

On October 18, 1909, the board of supervisors adopted and on October 20, 1909, the mayor approved a resolution soliciting offers for the sale to said city and county of any existing street railway system on any of the streets over which the proposed railroads were to be constructed, such offers to be submitted at any time prior to November 15, 1909, notice of which ordinance it must be assumed was given in the manner prescribed therein.

On October 25, 1909, the board of supervisors adopted, and on October 26, 1909, the mayor approved, an ordinance whereby it was "determined and specifically declared that the public interest and necessity demand the construction of street railways over and along" said streets, and directing the board of public works to procure and file with the supervisors plans and estimates of the cost of original construction and completion of said railways, the same to be based upon the use of electricity as motive power. On November 15, 1909, the board of public works filed said plans and estimates with the board of supervisors, showing the cost to be $1,900,000 for the Geary street road and $120,000 for the Market street road.

On November 22, 1909, the board of supervisors adopted and the mayor approved ordinances declaring the necessity of a bonded indebtedness and calling a special election for December 30, 1909.

It is urged that the resolution soliciting offers for the sale to the city and county of existing utilities was void, because adopted seven days prior to the passage of the ordinance declaring that the public interest and necessity demand the construction of said utilities, and passed in the absence of the adoption of any ordinance declaring the necessity for the acquisition by purchase of said utilities, and that all subsequent proceedings looking to the original construction thereof are in consequence void. We have no doubt that the soliciting of offers for the sale of any existing utility may precede the ordinance declaring the demands of public interest and necessity for the acquisition by construction or purchase of a similar utility. Indeed it would seem advisable that it should so precede, in order that the board may know whether and upon what terms an existing utility can be acquired and consequently be enabled to more satisfactorily determine exactly what the public interest and necessity demand, the acquisition by purchase of an existing utility or the original construction of such a utility. It is true, as said by counsel, that no purchase can be consummated, except after ordinance declaring the determination of the board as to the demands of public interest and necessity; but we do not see that this in any way affects the validity of the resolution soliciting offers for consideration. If any offer is made in response to the solicitation such procedings may then be taken, looking to its acceptance, as are required by law, including the preliminary and essential ordinance determining the necessity of acquiring by purchase the existing utility which is offered. The mandate of the charter is simply that "before submitting propositions to the electors for the acquisition by original construction," etc., the board must solicit such offers of sale. The ordinance submitting the propositions to the electors was adopted and approved November 22, 1909, after the soliciting of offers and after the expiration of the time named in the resolution during which offers would be received and considered. It is not alleged in the complaint that any offer of sale was made by the owner of any existing utility. It is further suggested that the board in soliciting offers should have acted by ordinance, rather than by resolution. We find nothing in the charter requiring such action to be by ordinance rather than by resolution. It is further suggested that under the provision of section 13 of chapter 1 of article 2 of the charter, this resolution should have been published for five successive days before final action thereon. It does not appear by the complaint that such publication was not had, but a complete answer to plaintiff's claim in this regard is that this resolution was not one coming within the purview of that section. It did not provide for any specific improvement, or the granting of a franchise or privilege, or the expenditure of public money, and did not levy any tax or assessment. We conclude, therefore, that there was a full compliance with the requirements of section 2 of article 12 of the charter.

We concede the necessity for the determination by ordinance of the demands of public interest or necessity for "the acquisition, construction, or completion by the city and county" of the utility proposed to be acquired. The ordinance in this case ordained that "it is hereby determined and specifically declared that the public interest and necessity demand the construction of street railways over and along the following streets," etc., and directed the board of public works to procure and file plans and estimates of cost. This determination, it will be observed, was in the precise form specified in section 5, article 12, of the charter, but it is not declared in terms that such construction so demanded is a construction "by the city and county." Upon the omission of these words learned counsel base a claim that the ordinance is void, it being contended that there was no adjudication by the board of the necessity of such construction "by the city and county." This ordinance was one of a series of essential steps in a proceeding provided for by the charter, leading up to the acquisition by the city and county of public utilities. The determination of the board expressed therein was in the form prescribed by the particular section relating to such ordinance, which sufficiently answers what is said by counsel as to the mode prescribed being the measure of power. Throughout the article of the charter relating to the acquisition of public utilities, the words "acquisition," "construction," and "completion" necessarily refer to an acquisition or construction or completion "by the city and county." The word "construction" could mean nothing else in the ordinance declaring the determination as to the demand of public interest and necessity therefor, especially where this declaration is followed therein by an order for plans and estimates of cost. We are satisfied that the ordinance sufficiently expressed the determination of the board that the public interest and necessity demand the construction of these street railways by the city and county.

It is further urged that the ordinance was defective in that it confined the determination to one of necessity for the "construction" of street railways, and did not include a determination of the necessity of the "acquisition" of an existing street railway. It is said, "jurisdiction was never obtained, therefore, to acquire an existing utility." We fail to perceive the point of this, inasmuch as the bonded indebtedness authorized by the electors and proposed to be incurred is not, in whole or in part, for the acquisition by purchase of any existing utility. What is said by counsel in this connection is doubtless said upon the theory that such a determination was essential to the validity of the resolution soliciting offers for sale of existing utilities, a matter to which we have already referred. Of course, the word "construction" as used in this ordinance means the original construction of the street railroads proposed to completion.

We are unable to perceive any irregularity in the matter of the calling for plans and estimates of cost of the proposed street railway, or in the plans and estimates themselves. There was a description of the utility proposed to be constructed sufficient for the purpose in the resolution calling for plans and estimates. The plans submitted by the board of public works are not shown and there is no allegation of the complaint indicating them to be "meager" or "inadequate." The ordinance of the board of supervisors determining that a bonded indebtedness is essential to the construction of such utilities sufficiently adopts the estimates of cost by the board of public works as its own.

The complaint alleges that the city and county has heretofore appropriated out of the current revenues in different years for the construction of a municipal railroad on Geary street, the aggregate sum of $1,395,000, being $350,000 in 1905, $325,000 in 1906, and $720,000 in 1907, none of which has ever been expended in the acquisition or construction or completion of said municipal street railroad. It is urged that so far as current revenues are available, a bond issue is unauthorized. There is, however, no allegation that the moneys so collected are now in the possession or control of the city and county, or available for use in the construction of this utility. It must be presumed against the pleader that such money is not so available. It is asserted in an affidavit presented on the hearing of the application for an injunction that these moneys not having been used for the purpose of constructing a street railroad, they were at the expiration of the respective fiscal years during which they were set apart for that purpose merged in the surplus fund of the city and county in accordance with the provisions of section 3, chapter 2, article 3, of the charter, and also that the city and county was perpetually enjoined by the superior court from using for such purpose the $720,000 set apart in 1907. While this affidavit may not be considered in the matter of the demurrer to the complaint, it presents a theory not negatived thereby, affording a sufficient basis for holding that the complaint does not show that this money is available for the construction of these utilities.

The complaint alleges many facts as the basis of a claim that public interest or necessity does not demand that the city and county should construct any street railroad, such as the existence in said city and county of street railroads owned and operated by private corporations, furnishing "ample and adequate means of transportation" to the people thereof. It appears very clear that the determination of the question of public interest or necessity by the board of supervisors in a matter of this character is conclusive upon the courts, at least in the absence of fraud. As intimated by the learned trial judge, there is no material difference in this regard between such a determination and one by a board of supervisors to the effect that an ordinary public road, or street, or public ferry, is necessary, and it is well settled that the latter is not subject to review by the judicial department of the state. See Pool v. Simmons, 134 Cal. 621, 625, 66 Pac. 872, and cases there cited; 1 Dillon on Mun. Corp. §§ 94, 95.

It is said that the ordinance provides for the construction of a road that will cover more than ten blocks occupied by another street railway, and that it is therefore void under the city charter. Without admitting that such a condition would render the ordinance invalid, it is sufficient to say that it affirmatively appears from the allegations of the complaint that, if the existing road on Geary street constructed under the franchise alleged to have been granted to Charles Main et al. on November 6, 1878, and assigned to the Geary Street, Park & Ocean Railroad, be excluded from consideration, there is no existing franchise for any ten consecutive blocks on the portions of any of the streets over which it is proposed to construct these railways. The Geary Street, Park & Ocean Railroad franchise is to be excluded from consideration because there is no allegation in the complaint tending to show that it has not expired by limitation. The pleader with scrupulous care has abstained from alleging, as in the case of the other franchises granted, the term for which this franchise was granted, and from appending to his complaint a copy of the ordinance granting the same. But under well-settled rules of pleading we must assume, in the absence of allegations to the contrary, that the franchise has expired. If we assume that the charter provision (subdivision 27, § 1, c. 2, art. 2, as amended February 5, 1903 [St. 1903, p. 586]) is applicable in the case of municipally owned street railways, it is clear that the utmost that can be claimed for it is that it precludes the authorization by the supervisors of the joint use by two or more street railways of more than ten consecutive blocks of any street.

There is nothing in any of the ordinances granting franchises to private street railroad corporations, copies of which are appended to plaintiff's complaint, which can be construed as purporting to apply to street railroads owned and operated by the municipality. So far as the Sutro franchise covering six consecutive blocks on a portion of Point Lobos avenue to be traversed by the municipal Geary street railroad is concerned, there is no provision whatever referring to the right of the board of supervisors in regard to grants by it to other corporations of privileges over the streets embraced therein, except the general provision that the rights and privileges granted shall be held and enjoyed, "upon such terms, conditions, and restrictions as are now or may be hereafter imposed by the laws of the state of California."

The express prohibition of section 499 of the Civil Code against the occupation and use of the same street or track for a distance of more than five blocks by two lines of street railway operated under different managements was eliminated by amendment in 1907 (St. 1907, p. 837), and the section now expressly permits two or more lines of street railway, operated under different managements, by arrangement among themselves, to use the same streets or tracks for any distance exceeding five consecutive blocks; the use for not exceeding five consecutive blocks being authorized without any arrangement. As we understand the allegations of the complaint, the only joint use of a street in excess of five consecutive blocks by any two or more railway lines, in consequence of the construction of the proposed municipal railroads, will be that of one block on Point Lobos avenue and that of two blocks on Market street. Assuming solely for the purposes of this decision that section 499, Civil Code, is applicable to municipally owned and operated street railroads, and also that it controls the charter provision above referred to, certainly we cannot assume in this proceeding to enjoin the incurring of the bonded indebtedness proposed, that arrangements have not or cannot be made that will permit such a use as is authorized thereby.

We see nothing in the allegations as to existing franchises that can be held to preclude the issuance of the proposed bonds. No other points are made in the briefs against the proposed bond issue.

Whatever basis there may be for the doubts expressed as to the wisdom of the policy of the acquisition and operation by the city and county of San Francisco of the proposed municipally owned street railways, we have no doubt that the city and county has the power to construct and operate the same and the power to incur a bonded indebtedness for such purpose, and also that the proceedings in that behalf presented for review on this appeal are free from substantial irregularity. It necessarily follows that the conclusion of the trial court was correct.

The judgment is affirmed, as is also the order denying plaintiff's motion for an injunction.

UNION OIL CO. v. STEWART et al.

(L. A. 2,489.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 19, 1910.)

1. Deeds (§ 114*)—Construction—Land Conveyed.

A grantor conveyed land described as the central portion of J. ranch containing about 20,000 acres, bounded on the east by the L. ranch owned by W. Previous to the execution of the deed, a dispute had arisen concerning the boundaries of the land of the grantor and the L. ranch, and in settlement thereof the owner of the L. ranch deeded to the grantor a strip of land lying along the eastern patent boundary of the J. ranch. Held, that the descriptive words carried the boundary beyond the ranch line, so as to include the strip conveyed from the L. ranch to the land owned by W., which would answer the whole of the description given, any uncertainty being resolved against the grantor, under Civ. Code, § 1069, providing that a grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantee, and section 1654 providing that, in cases of uncertainty not removed by certain rules, the language of a contract should be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist.

2. Husband and Wife (§ 16*)—Adverse Possession by Wife of Land of Husband—Statutes.

While a wife may not acquire title to her husband's land by continuous, exclusive possession, adverse to him, while they are living together and he remains the head of the family, yet when a husband deserts his wife, remaining permanently separate from her, and at the same time delivers to her possession of his land, she may claim title to it as her separate estate and acquire the legal title in fee by adverse possession against him in view of Civ. Code, § 162, providing that all property of the wife acquired by her after marriage by gift, devise, bequest, or descent, with the rents and profits thereof, are her separate property, and that she may without her husband's consent convey her separate property, under which she may own and control her separate property the same as her husband could own his, and section 157 providing that neither spouse has any interest in the separate property of the other, and Code Civ. Proc. § 370, providing that a married woman may sue or be sued alone when the action is between herself and her husband.

3. Husband and Wife (§ 126*)—Separate Property of Wife—"Accumulations."

Civ. Code, § 169, declares that the accumulations of a wife while she is living separate from her husband are her separate property. Held, that property of the husband by him put in possession of the wife and acquired by her by adverse possession during the marriage while living separate from her husband is an accumulation, and is not subject to execution for the husband's debts, accumulations of property generally meaning any property which a person acquires and retains without regard to the means by which it is obtained.

4. Appeal and Error (§ 1051*)—Harmless Error—Admission of Evidence.

In an action to quiet title to land, error in admitting immaterial testimony of the father of plaintiff's predecessor in title that the land was regarded by such predecessor and her husband as included in a tract part of which was conveyed by the husband to the wife was not prejudicial, where the facts that the land when acquired by the husband was immediately fenced so as to be within the same inclosure as the tract, and that it was afterwards maintained in that condition, were proved by other evidence, and was not contradicted.

5. Deeds (§ 200*)—Delivery—Evidence.

A letter of a grantor to a third person, inclosing a deed to the grantee, and directing such person to deliver it to the grantee, was admissible to prove delivery of the deed.

6. Evidence (§ 269*)—Declarations—Showing Intent.

In an action to quiet title which involved the adverse possession of plaintiff's predecessor in title as against such predecessor's husband who had abandoned her, leaving her in possession of the land in question, a letter from the husband to a third person stating that he had left his wife and family for all time was admissible to establish the husband's intent to desert his wife.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by the Union Oil Company against Nat. Stewart and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas, for appellants. C. A. Storke and E. W. Squier, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff's action is to quiet its alleged title to certain land, and to enjoin defendant, Stewart, from selling said land on an execution issued to him, as sheriff of Santa Barbara county, upon a judgment in favor of the defendant Mullenary against one J. Ben Burton. The suit of Mullenary v. Burton was begun January 8, 1903, and on that day an attachment therein was issued and levied on the land in dispute. Judgment was recovered from Burton for $2,710.63, and it became final on June 14, 1906. Mullenary v. Burton, 3 Cal. App. 263, 84 Pac. 159. The defendant's claim is that the land was at the time he levied the attachment the property of J. Ben Burton, or at least subject to execution for his debts. The plaintiff claims title to the land by mesne conveyances from Stella F. Burton; her conveyance being subsequent to the levy of the attachment. The sole question presented in the case is whether at the date of the levy the land was the property of J. Ben Burton, or the property of Stella F. Burton.

J. Ben Burton was the owner of the land on February 7, 1895. He was then and still is the husband of Stella F. Burton. On that day, as the court found, he deserted and abandoned her, and left the state of California, and he has ever since that time lived separate and apart from her and outside of this state. On that day he executed to her a deed of conveyance, the effect of which to convey the land in dispute is one of the main questions in the case. The court finds that the descriptive clause in this deed included the land in controversy. Immediately after its execution Stella F. Burton entered into possession of the entire tract described therein, including the land in controversy, claiming title thereto under the deed, and the court finds that from that time continuously until January 28, 1903, she occupied and possessed the same openly, notoriously, exclusively, adversely to all others, under a claim of right and title thereto, cultivating the same in the usual manner and paying all taxes thereon. On January 28, 1903, she conveyed it to one Rudisell who upon March 13, 1903, conveyed it to the plaintiff, and plaintiff has ever since held possession thereof in the same manner above described.

Two principal points upon which the defendant urges reversal are that the finding that the deed of 1895 included the tract of 139.54 acres, which comprises the land in dispute, is contrary to the law and the evidence, and that under the law Stella F. Burton could not acquire title to her husband's land by adverse possession against him while the marriage relation continued to exist. There is some contention that the finding of the court with relation to the facts constituting adverse possession is not supported by the evidence. We do not think it necessary to discuss the evidence upon the point. It is sufficient to say that there is ample evidence to support the finding on that subject.

The court correctly held that the deed to Stella F. Burton included this land. The defendant Mullenary is a mere attaching creditor of J. Ben Burton. He has no standing, with respect to this question, different from that which J. Ben Burton would have if he were claiming the land for himself. He is not a bona fide purchaser for value. Burton became the owner of the 139.54 acres in 1891. At that time he was the owner of a large tract of land which the evidence indicates contained exactly 20,000 acres, situated in what is called the central part of the rancho Jesus Maria. This rancho according to the United States patent therefor contained 42,179 acres of land bordering on the Pacific Ocean. The 20,000 acres belonging to Burton extended from the ocean easterly through the rancho to its easterly boundary. Another large rancho designated as La Purisima adjoined it on the east. A dispute arose concerning the boundaries between the lands of Burton and the owners of La Purisima. In settlement thereof the owners of La Purisima on November 17, 1891, executed a deed to J. Ben Burton purporting to convey to him a strip of land containing 139.54 acres, 12 chains in width, east and west, and 116 chains in length, north and south, lying along the eastern patent boundary of the Jesus Maria rancho. The boundaries of this tract, as described in the deed, indicate that it lay entirely within the rancho La Purisima. It constitutes the land in controversy. Immediately after acquiring it Burton extended his fences so as to include it in the same inclosure as the 20,000-acre tract, and thereafter it was occupied and used by him in connection with his 20,000 acres and as a part of the same ranch or farm. The land in La Purisima rancho adjoining this strip on the east belonged to John H. Wise and Thomas Denigan at the time Burton acquired the strip, and it is referred to in the evidence as the land of Wise.

On February 7, 1895, Burton, being at San José, Cal., drew up and signed the deed to his wife, inclosed it in an envelope and mailed it to George Tebbetts, his wife's father, who was then at Santa Barbara, accompanying it with a letter to Tebbetts stating that he had left his wife and family for all time and directing him to deliver the deed to her. She was at that time residing in San Francisco. This deed describes the land intended to be conveyed as follows: "All that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, * * * bounded and described as follows, to wit: The central portion of the Rancho Jesus Maria containing about 20,000 acres, bounded on the north by the land owned by H. Dutard, on the east by the Rancho of La Purisima owned by John H. Wise, on the south by land owned by A. Packard, on the west by the Pacific Ocean (for more particular description see patent on record in city of Santa Barbara, California.)" On February 21, 1903, after the levy of the Mullenary attachment, Burton executed to her a deed purporting to convey the 139.54-acre tract, declaring therein that it was a part of the premises which he intended to convey to her by the deed of February 27, 1895, and that this later deed was executed to render more certain the description of the premises intended to be conveyed by the deed of 1895.

A grant of this character is to be interpreted against the grantor. Civ. Code, § 1069. In other respects grants are to be interpreted in like manner with other contracts. Civ. Code, § 1066. In cases of uncertainty in a contract, it is to be interpreted most strongly against the party who causes the uncertainty to exist. Civ. Code, § 1654. It was Burton himself who caused the existence of such uncertainty as appears in the description in the deed of 1895. It clearly appears from the evidence that after the execution of that deed he never attempted to exercise any ownership over any part of the land and that he intended to give it all to his wife for the support of herself and her children. The deed states that the land conveyed is "the central portion of the rancho Jesus Maria containing about 20,000 acres," and that it is bounded "on the east by the rancho of La Purisima owned by John H. Wise." If the phrase "owned by John H. Wise" had been omitted, it would have been clear that the land actually conveyed included only the land within the proper patent boundaries of the rancho Jesus Maria and that no land included in the rancho La Purisima could have been considered as passing by the conveyance. But Wise did not own that part of the rancho La Purisima adjoining the rancho Jesus Maria. His land lay 12 chains easterly of that line. The effect of the descriptive words was to carry the boundary beyond the ranch line to the land, which, by reason of the fact that it was owned by Wise, would answer the whole of the description above given. It might be urged perhaps that the language of the description leaves some uncertainty whether the eastern boundary line was intended to be the surveyed line of the rancho or the boundary of the land owned by Wise. But, by reason of the rules above stated, this uncertainty is to be resolved against the grantor in favor of the grantee, and the last phrase must be considered as the controlling part of the description. The result is that the deed conveys all of the lands owned by Burton at the time extending easterly to the lands owned by Wise, and therefore that it includes the land in controversy. The situation of the respective tracts at that time and all the attending circumstances, as well as the subsequent conduct of the parties with regard to its possession, all lead to this conclusion as the only reasonable theory.

We see no sufficient reason for the determination that a wife cannot, under any circumstances, acquire title to her husband's land by continuous exclusive possession adversely to him. It may be conceded that she could not do so while they were living together and he remained the head of the family. This has in effect been decided by this court in Frink v. Alsip, 49 Cal. 103, First N. Bank v. Guerra, 61 Cal. 113, and Mauldin v. Cox, 67 Cal. 390, 7 Pac. 804. But the language of these decisions is carefully qualified by the phrases we have stated above. In Bank v. Guerra the court says: "She could not claim adversely to him, or to those claiming under him, so long as he remained the head of the family." In Mauldin v. Cox it is said: "We conclude that during coverture, while the husband remains the head of the family, neither party to the marital relation can hold the homestead adversely to the other." This qualified language shows an intent to distinguish those cases from one where the husband has deserted his family and no longer remains at its head. But, when he has left his family, has ceased to contribute to its support, and has abandoned his property to the use of his wife for that purpose, there is no consideration of public policy which prevents her from exercising the same powers and acquiring the same rights with respect to the property left in her hands as if she were an unmarried person. Our liberal statutes concerning the rights and powers of married women invest her with sufficient power to hold adversely to her husband. She may own, hold, and control her separate property as fully and completely as the husband can own and control his separate property. Civ. Code, § 162. Neither spouse has any interest in the separate property of the other. Civ. Code, § 157. Either may sue the other to recover possession of his or her separate property. Code Civ. Proc. § 370; Wilson v. Wilson, 36 Cal. 453, 95 Am. Dec. 194. It is true that neither spouse can be excluded from the other's dwelling. Civ. Code, § 157. Perhaps there could not be adverse possession in law of the dwelling, although doubtless there could be, in fact, an exclusive hostile holding thereof by one spouse. The point is not involved here for the wife did not dwell on any part of the land in dispute or on the other part of the rancho during the time of the adverse holding. She resided in San Francisco in 1895, and thereafter so long as she continued to own the land. It was occupied by a tenant or managing agent, and she only made occasional short visits to it.

Property acquired by either spouse during coverture, other than by gift, devise, bequest, or descent, is declared to be community property. Civ. Code, §§ 162–164. If these sections stood alone and controlled this case, it might be argued that property acquired by adverse possession by the wife during the marriage would be community property and as such subject to execution for the debts of the husband. But this argument does not apply to the present case. Section 169 of the Civil Code declares that "the earnings and accumulations of a wife, and of her minor children living with her or in her custody, while she is living separate from her husband, are the separate property of the wife." The word "earnings" according to its ordinary meaning would not apply to property acquired by adverse possession. But property so acquired and held in ownership would clearly be included in the term "accumulations." When one speaks generally of accumulation of property, he is understood to refer to any property which a person acquires and retains, without regard to the means by which it is obtained. Of course, if it were acquired by the wife by purchase with community funds, or in exchange for other community property, it would not be accumulated in the sense here involved. Such an acquisition would be a mere exchange, and it would have the character possessed by that given in exchange for it. But where the wife, while living separate from her husband, through her own industry, labor, skill, or efforts of any kind, obtains property and holds it in possession, it is what would ordinarily be called an accumulation of property, and, under the rules stated in section 169, it would be a part of her separate estate.

The decision of this court in Siddall v. Haight, 132 Cal. 320, 64 Pac. 410, goes even farther than this. There a parol gift of land was made to the wife by her sister and in pursuance of the gift the wife was put in possession of the property. The husband was living with his wife on the property, but did not claim any interest therein under the gift. The decision was that she acquired the title to the property from the donor by adverse possession in pursuance of the parol gift, and that the character of the property as separate or community was determined by the fact that it first became hers by gift, and that in consequence thereof the title gained by adverse possession was a title in her as of her separate estate If it be suggested that title by adverse possession is founded on a presumed grant to her, the result would be the same. Under the provisions of section 164, Civ. Code, such a grant to the wife raises a presumption that it is her separate property.

We conclude, therefore, that when a husband abandons and deserts his wife, remaining permanently separate from her, and at the same time delivers to her the possession of his land, she may claim title to it as her separate estate and acquire the legal title in fee by adverse possession against him. The case of Warr v. Honeck, 8 Utah, 61, 29 Pac. 1117, is substantially to the same effect. There a decree of divorce had awarded to the wife a certain segregated part of the property of the husband. She took and held possession of it thereafter, claiming it as her own, and lived upon it separate and apart from her husband. The decree was absolutely void both as to the property and the divorce. The court held that, notwithstanding the continuance of the marriage relation in point of law, she could and did acquire the title to the land from him by adverse possession.

Some rulings upon the admission of evidence are assigned as error. The testimony of Tebbetts, the father of Mrs. Burton, to the effect that the land in dispute was regarded and treated by Burton and his wife as a part of the Jesus Maria rancho, should not have been allowed. His opinion as to how they treated and considered this land was immaterial and incompetent. But its admission could not have caused any substantial injury to the appellant. The fact that the 139.54 acres when acquired by Burton was immediately fenced so as to be within the same inclosure as the adjoining part of the land previously owned by him, and that it was thereafter maintained in that condition, was proven by other evidence and there was no contradiction thereof; nor was the fact ever disputed. The letter of Burton to Tebbetts, inclosing the deed to Mrs. Burton and directing Tebbetts to deliver it to her, was admissible to prove the delivery of the deed. Its contents also established the intent of Burton to desert his wife, and it was admissible for that purpose. The other alleged errors are so insignificant that we do not consider it necessary to discuss them.

The order is affirmed.

SHAW, J. Action to quiet title to two certain lots fronting on Glenarm street in the city of Pasadena, described as lots 24 and 25, Mills tract.

Defendants admit plaintiff's title to the property, but claim and assert a lien thereon by virtue of an assessment for the cost of certain street improvement work done under the street improvement act, which lien they ask, by cross-complaint, to have foreclosed. The court made its findings upon which a decree of foreclosure was rendered in accordance with the prayer of defendant's cross-complaint. Plaintiff appeals from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

The city council of Pasadena by resolution in due form declared its intention to improve Glenarm street from the east line of Fair Oaks avenue to the original east boundary line of the city, the width of which street is not disclosed by the record. It is admitted that on the face thereof all the proceedings were duly had and taken. Nevertheless appellant claims that the resolution of intention and all the proceedings had thereunder were wholly void for the reason that in said resolution of intention and proceedings had thereunder the city council included therein the private property of plaintiff. This claim is based upon the fact that said lots 24 and 25, which front upon the north side of the street, extended across the north line thereof as the same was located on either side of said lots, and that they projected into the street a distance of 10 feet, and the sidewalk, the construction of which was included among other improvements ordered, was by the contractors constructed over this 10-foot strip so projecting into the street.

Appellant lays much stress upon a finding made by the court to the effect that the city of Pasadena unlawfully and without right claimed said 10-foot strip as a part of the street; and it contends that by reason of such claim on the part of the city it necessarily follows that it was the intention of the city council to improve the strip by constructing the sidewalk thereon. "The whole fault," says appellant, "lies in the fact that in the resolution of intention and the ordinance ordering the work to be done the private property was claimed to be a part of the street and was proposed to be improved as such." It is undoubtedly true that the intention of the city in this regard must be determined from the resolution of intention and proceedings had thereunder. Neither the resolution of intention nor other proceedings, however, so far as disclosed by the record, make any reference to property other than that embraced within the side lines of the street between the points named, which is conceded to have been an open public street. Regardless of what its undisclosed claim may have been as to lands other than those actually embraced in the street, it cannot be said that by such proceedings the city council proposed or attempted to exercise jurisdiction over such land, to which it had no right and which in fact was no part of the street. There is absolutely nothing in the resolution of intention or other proceedings which tends in the slightest degree to show that the city authorized, or that it was its intention to authorize, the improvement of the private property of plaintiff, or the laying of the sidewalk other than along the side of the street. Hence there is no analogy between this case and Spaulding v. Wesson, 115 Cal. 441, 47 Pac. 249, cited by appellant. It was there held that what was designated in the proceedings as "Union street," between Larkin and Franklin streets, in San Francisco, was not a public street, but that it was held in private ownership, and had not been dedicated to public use. The proceedings there taken contemplated the improvement, not of a public street, but of a piece of land held in private ownership, known as "Union street." Clearly no warrant existed in the street improvement act for the doing of the work thus described in the resolution of intention.

In the case at bar, as the council did not order other than the area embraced in Glenarm street to be improved, it follows that the contractors had no authority by virtue of said proceedings to construct a sidewalk upon the 10-foot strip which was no part of the street. The superintendent of streets should not have accepted the work as completed for the reason that the sidewalk was constructed on and not in front of these lots. Neither should the cost thereof have been included in the assessment made to cover the total cost of the improvement. Conceding, however, that the contractors constructed the sidewalk upon this strip under the direction of the superintendent of streets, nevertheless, inasmuch as it was not included in the resolution of intention and the council did not order it, there was no authority for doing it; and hence the officer erred, both in directing it to be done and in accepting the work thus incomplete, as well as including the cost thereof in the assessment. None of these acts, however, rendered the assessment and lien thereof void. By the provisions of section 11 of the street improvement act (Henning's Gen. Laws Cal. p. 1322), the determination and acts of the street superintendent in relation to all of these matters is made the subject of an appeal to the city council by the owners or any person interested. Upon the hearing of such appeal the city council is given the power to "confirm, amend, set aside, alter, modify, or correct the assessment in such manner as to them shall seem just, and require the work to be completed according to the directions of the city council; and may instruct and direct the superintendent of streets to correct the warrant, assessment, or diagram in any particular, or to make and issue a new warrant, assessment, and diagram, to conform to the decisions of said city council in relation thereto, at their option"; "and revise and correct any of the acts or determinations of the superintendent of streets relative to said work." Plaintiff did not exercise its right to appeal. Had it done so, and the attention of the council been directed to the fact that not only was the work incomplete by reason of the failure of the contractors to construct the sidewalk in front of the lots instead of on and across the ends thereof so projecting into the street, but also to the fact that the cost of the sidewalk so constructed had been included in the assessment for the total cost of the work, no doubt the council would have met the objections by an exercise of the power vested in it by section 11 and caused the errors to be corrected. At all events, we must indulge in that presumption. Lambert v. Bates, 137 Cal. 676, 70 Pac. 777; Warren v. Riddell, 106 Cal. 352, 39 Pac. 781; Diggins v. Hartshorne, 108 Cal. 154, 41 Pac. 283.

PEOPLE v. DAVENPORT. (Cr. 118.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 18, 1910. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 11, 1910.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 397*) — IMPEACHING TESTIMONY—EFFECT.

Evidence of inconsistent statements does not in any way tend to establish the truth of the matters contained in the contradictory statements.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for rape, the instruction: "I instruct you that the testimony of the oral declaration or admission of a witness or party should be viewed with caution," though in conflict with the rule forbidding judges to charge juries with respect to matters of fact, is harmless, as stating a mere commonplace within the general knowledge of jurors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3128, 3154, 3163, 3169; Dec. Dig. § 1172;* Rape, Cent. Dig. § 104.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 778*) — INSTRUCTIONS—PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE—"SHOWN."

In a prosecution for rape, the instruction that one accused of a crime "is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is shown and his guilt established by the evidence," was not defective in the use of the word "shown," which plainly meant "proved," nor because of the failure to repeat "beyond a reasonable doubt," as the jury was repeatedly told this in other portions of the charge.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6500, 6501.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 778*) — INSTRUCTION — PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE.

In a prosecution for rape, while the instruction that "the presumption of innocence remains with the defendant at every stage of the trial unless it has been overcome by the evidence" was not very clear, yet the jury must have understood it to mean that the presumption of innocence remained to the last with defendant, and until in their deliberations upon the evidence they became convinced of his guilt.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 318*) — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

In a prosecution for rape, the testimony by a friend of defendant that he had been directed by defendant "not to tell any more about the story and to say 'no' to everything they would ask me," and to "change my name," and that defendant told the father of witness that "I got in some trouble up here and he had to send me to Roseville and keep me out of the way," was properly admitted, leaving it for the jury to determine whether it indicated a purpose on the part of defendant to suppress testimony against himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 735; Dec. Dig. § 318.*]

6. WITNESSES (§ 289*)—REDIRECT EXAMINATION—SCOPE.

Where, in a prosecution for rape, testimony was shown that the reason why defendant wished to conceal the witness was because the witness had gotten into trouble, and not because defendant wished to suppress testimony against himself; and then it was shown on cross-examination that witness had really had such trouble, it was improper on the redirect examination to show that defendant had encouraged the improper relations between the witness and B. which caused the trouble referred to, as it would be prejudicial to defendant, and was collateral to the object of the testimony which was to discover whether defendant had attempted to conceal witness in order to suppress testimony against himself.

7. WITNESSES (§ 277*) — CROSS-EXAMINATION —SCOPE.

In a prosecution for rape, it was proper to ask defendant on the cross-examination where he was on the preceding and succeeding nights of the offense in order to test the accuracy of his memory as to where he was at the time of the offense, and also to clarify his explanations as to his movements at that time.

8. WITNESSES (§ 277*) — CROSS-EXAMINATION —WHAT MAY BE SHOWN.

In a prosecution for rape, the prosecution may seek upon cross-examination, to bring out evidence which tends directly to explain, qualify, or contradict defendant's testimony.

9. WITNESSES (§ 268*) — CROSS-EXAMINATION —SCOPE.

Where, in a prosecution for rape, evidence was admitted of defendant's having taken prosecutrix to a doctor, defendant should have been allowed the widest latitude to show on cross-examination that defendant was not responsible for the condition of prosecutrix, for which medical aid was sought.

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 700*)—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

While the prosecuting attorney should exhibit industry and zeal commensurate with the importance of the case and the gravity of the opposition, yet he should be mindful of the rights of the defendant and endeavor to maintain the equipoise of judgment and demeanor becoming to one engaged in the pursuit and administration of justice.

11. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 110*)—LANGUAGE OF STATUTE—OMISSION OF "FELONIOUSLY."

Where an information for rape described the offense in the language of the statute, the word "feloniously" was not necessary.

12. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 91*)—INFORMATION—NECESSITY FOR "WILLFULLY."

Where an information for rape alleged that the offense was committed, it was not necessary to aver that it was "willfully" done, as that would be inferred from the allegation that the act was committed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Isaac T. Davenport, was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed.

J. R. Hughes and A. C. Huston, for appellant. U. S. Webb and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

BURNETT, J. Appellant seeks a reversal of the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial upon the grounds that the court committed error in the giving and refusing of instructions and in its rulings upon the admissibility of evidence during the trial, that the district attorney was guilty of prejudicial misconduct, that the demurrer to the information was improperly overruled, and the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict.

1. The portion of instruction No. 4 given by the court, to which criticism is directed, reads as follows: "It is wholly immaterial whether Martha J. McManus, the prosecuting witness, was of previous chaste character or not, at the time of the alleged offense. Want of chastity of a female under the age of 16 years is no defense to a charge of rape upon her. Any statement reflecting on the previous chastity of Martha J. McManus is to be wholly disregarded by you." It is admitted that "as an abstract proposition of law these expressions are probably correct." But it is contended that they were erroneous by reason of the fact that certain evidence admitted by the court as to improper relations between the prosecutrix and parties other than the defendant was material, in the determination of the question whether the act charged against the defendant in the information really occurred. But it is apparent that the court was dealing with the particular phase of the law involved in the suggestion that it might be no crime to have sexual intercourse with a female under the age of consent, if she was of previous unchaste character. The court had stated that it was immaterial whether the prosecutrix had consented or not to the act of intercourse, and then proceeded to declare, susbtantially, that "for the same reason" it was immaterial what was her previous character as to the element in question, and therefore any statement reflecting on her previous chastity should be disregarded.

But appellant is mistaken in the contention that the court admitted evidence of the relations existing between the prosecutrix and persons other than the defendant. Mrs. Manchester testified that the prosecutrix had stated to her that the defendant was not responsible for her "condition." What was meant by "condition" does not appear, but attributing to it the scurrilous signification contended for, there is no evidence as to when the "condition" originated, and, besides, it is only impeaching testimony and therefore could not be considered as evidence of the want of chastity. The rule is that "impeaching testimony does not establish, or in any way tend to establish, the truth of the matters contained in the contradictory statements." 3 Jones on Evidence, 861. The purpose of such testimony is, of course, as the term implies, to affect the credibility of the witness impeached and an instruction to that effect would have been proper had appellant desired it.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "I instruct you that the testimony of the oral declaration or admission of a witness or party should be viewed with caution." It is the contention of appellant that this has been before the Supreme Court many times for construction and it has been held to be in conflict with section 19 of article 6 of the Constitution of the state, which provides that: "Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact; but may state the testimony and declare the law." In support of the position these cases are cited: Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 269, 29 Pac. 481; People v. Rodley, 131 Cal. 240, 63 Pac. 351; People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, 74 Pac. 744; People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, 77 Pac. 169, and Gross v. Steiger Terra Cotta, etc., Works, 148 Cal. 155, 82 Pac. 681. Appellant seems to place a proper construction upon those decisions. It is equally true, however, as admitted by appellant, that these authorities "take the view that such an instruction is harmless, for the reason that 'it states mere commonplace matter within the general knowledge of the jury.'" Indeed, the language used in People v. Wardrip, supra, is that the instruction "states a mere commonplace within the general knowledge of jurors; and we do not think that either the giving or refusing of such an instruction would warrant a reversal." It may be, as insisted by appellant, that upon further consideration, the Supreme Court will hold that such an instruction is not only violative of the Constitution, but also prejudicial to the defendant; but the propriety of our declination to anticipate and forestall such a decision must be apparent.

Some of appellant's objections to instruction No. 8 seen quite hypercritical. Therein the jury were told that "the defendant is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is clearly established by the evidence. All presumptions of law are in favor of the innocence of persons accused of the commission of crime, and every person so accused is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is shown, and until his guilt is established by the evidence in the trial of the case, and this presumption of innocence remains with the defendant at every stage of the trial, unless it has been overcome by the evidence." The use of the word "shown" is criticised, but it is apparent that it was employed in the sense of "proved." It was not necessary for the court to repeat the expression "beyond a reasonable doubt," as in other portions of the charge the jury were told repeatedly that the prosecution must prove the charge to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt. Upon this point one of the instructions was: "Before you can convict the defendant you must be satisfied from the evidence that he is guilty beyond all reasonable doubt. A bare preponderance of the evidence in support of a criminal accusation against the defendant is not sufficient to warrant his conviction, but on the trial of this and all other criminal causes, the guilt of the defendant must be established to the satisfaction of the jury to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, or he should be acquitted." They were further instructed that "the burden of the proof never shifts, but remains upon the prosecution throughout the whole case to prove the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." The jury could not, therefore, have understood from the criticised instruction that a less degree of proof was required of the prosecution than "beyond a reasonable doubt." There is some ground for the objection to the instruction in reference to its statement of the presumption of innocence. The language is not as clear as it should be but we think the jury could not have been misled thereby.

In People v. McNamara, 94 Cal. 514, 29 Pac. 953, cited by appellant, the instruction was: "And the presumption of innocence goes with him all through the case, until it is submitted to you." The Supreme Court properly said that "the presumption of innocence does not cease upon the submission of the cause to the jury, but operates in favor of the defendant, not only during the taking of the testimony, but during the deliberations of the jury, until they have arrived at a verdict." But appellant's contention is directly answered by the case of People v. Arlington, 131 Cal. 231, 63 Pac. 347. The language there, being almost identical with what we have here, was, "and it is a presumption that abides with him throughout the trial of the case until the evidence convinces you to the contrary beyond all reasonable doubt." In commenting upon this language and in reply to the suggestions of appellant, the Supreme Court said: "We do not think the language conveyed the impression that the presumption ceased to operate at the close of the evidence of the prosecution or at any time before the jury had finally determined upon a verdict. The court meant, and we think must have been by the jury understood to mean, that the presumption remained to the last with defendant, and until in their deliberations upon the evidence they became convinced of his guilt. When the jury reached that conclusion on the whole evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt, of course, the presumption disappeared and should disappear." The instruction upon this subject requested by defendant, it may be remarked, has been approved by the Supreme Court as an entirely accurate statement of the law and might well have been given by the trial judge, but, as already declared, we think the jury were substantially so instructed.

2. One George Blohm was allowed to testify to certain movements made by him upon the contention of the district attorney that they were directed by the defendant for the purpose of having the witness concealed, that he might not be called to testify at the trial. It appears that the witness was at Mr. Davenport's house at the time the offense is claimed to have been committed, and acquired knowledge of certain facts incriminating the defendant. He testified that he was directed by Davenport "not to tell any more about the story and say, 'no,' to everything they would ask me," and also "to change my name and say it was George King," and furthermore that the defendant went to Roseville and brought the witness down to Sacramento, and directed him to conceal his identity in crossing the Sacramento river, and they went together to San Francisco and defendant told the father of witness that "I got in some trouble up here and he had to send me to Roseville and keep me out of the way."

It was for the jury to determine whether this testimony indicated a purpose on the part of defendant to suppress testimony against himself. Any act or declaration on his part in pursuance of that object, it is admitted, would be admissible; and while the testimony thus far detailed of the witness Blohm might be construed as indicative of defendant's desire to shield said Blohm, it was for the jury to determine whether that was the motive of defendant, or whether he was trying to further his own exculpation. The evidence was probably admissible, since a rational inference might be drawn from it that defendant thereby manifested a consciousness of guilt.

The witness was then asked the question: "Had you been in trouble?" and he answered, "No, sir," and then he qualified the answer by adding, "Not at Roseville; no." On the cross-examination he said the trouble he was in related to his conduct with Gladys Bryant at Mr. Davenport's house. On the redirect examination he was permitted to state, over objection, that the defendant was present when the incident occurred with Gladys Bryant and that he told the girl to come upstairs. The witness was persistently questioned in regard to the matter by the district attorney, and he stated quite positively that the defendant encouraged and advised the unseemly conduct on the part of the witness and the said Gladys Bryant. The evidence was admitted on the theory, as stated by the court, that "the matter was brought out on cross-examination as to the cause of his trouble, and the cause of the trouble having come in, it is admitted solely for the purpose of explaining that trouble." But we think the prosecution was allowed to go too far. The direct examination was for the purpose of showing that the defendant endeavored to conceal the witness, to prevent him from giving adverse testimony on the present charge. During this examination it developed that the defendant had told the father of the witness that the latter had gotten into trouble and that on this account he sent the witness to Roseville and kept him out of the way. It was certainly proper for the defendant, on cross-examination, to show by the witness that this statement was true, that he did have trouble, and that it was on this account that the defendant sought to conceal him. This did not open the door for a recital, at the instance of the district attorney, of the details of that separate offense in a manner so calculated to prejudice the defendant. It was entirely collateral to the main question, which was whether the boy's trouble or the present charge against the defendant was the moving cause of the so-called attempt to conceal said witness. It was not the occasion for explaining the boy's trouble in the sense of permitting an inquiry beyond its general nature, and the rule invoked did not sanction evidence of a separate offense which could not fail to be of decisive importance in the estimation of the jury. If the evidence had been offered on the direct examination of the witness, no one would deny that it should have been rejected. As presented it was no less objectionable. It is within the principle announced in People v. Fong Ching, 78 Cal. 174, 20 Pac. 396, and People v. Altmeyer, 135 Cal. 82, 66 Pac. 974. If the jury believed the testimony of Blohm, the effect upon their minds can be easily imagined. It would require little, if any, additional evidence to induce a conviction of defendant.

It is undoubtedly true, as said by the Supreme Court in People v. Baldwin, 117 Cal. 249, 49 Pac. 187, that: "In this class of prosecutions the defendant, owing to the natural instincts and laudable sentiments on the part of the jury, and the usual circumstances of isolation of the parties involved at the commission of the offense, is, as a rule, so disproportionately at the mercy of the prosecutrix's evidence, that he should be given the full measure of every legal right in an endeavor to maintain his innocence." Scarcely anything could more fully arouse the just indignation of the jury or awaken a spirit of resentment against the defendant than such a recital as was given by said witness. We cannot but feel that the defendant's rights were grossly transgressed in this respect.

There was no error committed in the cross-examination of defendant. Complaint is made that the district attorney was permitted to ask him as to his movements at other times than the occasion involved in the charge. The questions were limited, however, to the preceding and the succeeding night. This was entirely proper to test the accuracy of his memory as to where he was at the time of the alleged offense, and also to throw a side light upon the validity of his explanation of his movements on the said night of September 30th. He had stated in the direct examination that he had spent that night on the oil barge down the river, and he had done so because he had seen some tramps near the place and he was afraid that they might steal something. Of course, it would have been proper for the district attorney to ask him if it were not the night before or the night after instead of the night in question that he stayed on the barge. This was the effect of the cross-examination, and besides, the answers disclosed nothing prejudicial to the defendant. There is no doubt that the prosecution may seek, upon cross-examination, to bring out evidence which tends directly to explain, qualify, or contradict his testimony. People v. Arrighini, 122 Cal. 127, 54 Pac. 591.

On the direct examination of the prosecutrix the district attorney asked this question: "Did you prior to that time (the arrest of defendant) go with Mr. Davenport to a doctor's office in Sacramento?" and the witness answered, "Yes, sir." No inquiry was made as to the purpose of the visit or as to what occurred there, but it would seem that only one inference—not necessary to state here—could be drawn from the testimony. On cross-examination it was sought to show by the witness than on the 30th of September—at the time when the offense is charged against the defendant—she had intercourse with another person, and she was further asked the question: "After going into the front room, Mrs. Manchester said to you: 'Martha, who was it got you in the fix?' You says: 'I don't know.' Mrs. Manchester says: 'Was it Del Lawrence or any of his company?' You said: 'No.' Mrs. Manchester said: 'Is it the man with the glasses?' You said: 'No.' Mrs. Manchester said: 'Is it Mr. Davenport?' You said: 'No.' Mrs. Manchester said: 'Haven't you any idea who it was, Martha?' You said: 'You know who it was; it was Gussie Deuche.' Were these things said?" The questions were answered but after some discussion the court virtually excluded the testimony from the consideration of the jury, stating: "You can ask any question in regard to any act or contradiction of any act of this defendant, but I will exclude the testimony in reference to any condition of the little girl." As we have already seen, the evidence would not be admissible for the purpose of showing her unchastity at the time of the alleged offense, but if it had a logical tendency to rebut any unfavorable inference against the defendant that might be drawn from any act testified to on the direct examination, it should have been admitted for that purpose. Indeed, that was the ground upon which defendant bases his contention that it was proper cross-examination, stating to the court: "Your honor has permitted evidence to go in here that this defendant took this girl to a doctor, the district attorney will argue from that he took her there from an ulterior motive, and that is the inference to be drawn. Haven't we a right, on cross-examination, to show, as against her testimony on that point, that immediately and at that time she denied that Davenport was responsible for her condition, and if she denied that Davenport was responsible for her condition, isn't that legitimate testimony for us to take before the jury to argue that this evidence of her going to the doctor is of no detriment to us?" The answer of the district attorney to this contention was: "We haven't proved any evidence in this case that this girl was in any condition whatever." But the jurors, not possessing the technical skill, perhaps, of the district attorney in making nice distinctions or in turning phrases, would not be slow to conclude as to what her condition was that seemed to make it necessary for the defendant to take her to see a doctor, and the defendant should have been allowed the widest latitude to rebut the unfavorable inference necessarily drawn from said testimony.

3. Appellant complains bitterly of the conduct of the district attorney in asking improper questions and in transgressing the limits of official decorum in his argument to the jury, thereby depriving defendant of a fair and impartial trial. Every one familiar with the execution of the criminal law knows that to convict the guilty when ably defended by attorneys of high standing at the bar and in the community, the district attorney must be not only a man of consequence, but he must exhibit industry and zeal commensurate with the importance of the case and the gravity of the opposition; but he should, of course, be mindful of the rights of the defendant and endeavor to maintain that equipoise of judgment and demeanor so becoming to one engaged in the pursuit and administration of justice.

The only specification in this regard, though, that we consider of sufficient importance to notice is the comment made by the district attorney carrying the implication that the defendant was guilty of another offense in his treatment of the witness George Blohm. The remarks were calculated to arouse the most bitter resentment on the part of the jury, and to disqualify them to view dispassionately and fairly the evidence against the defendant upon the particular charge in the information. It is true, as said in People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459, 34 Pac. 1078, that "if a defendant cannot be fairly convicted he should not be convicted at all; and to hold otherwise would be to provide ways and means for the conviction of the innocent."

4. The demurrer to the information was properly overruled. It was not necessary to use the word "feloniously," as the offense was described in the language of the statute. People v. Olivera, 7 Cal. 403; People v. Murray, 10 Cal. 309; People v. Garcia, 25 Cal. 531. Nor was the district attorney required to aver that the act was "willfully" done. When it is alleged that a person does an act it implies willfulness.

5. There is no merit in the claim that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The testimony of the prosecutrix was sufficient for that purpose. There was also additional evidence lending aid to the inference of guilt, but for the reasons stated we cannot uphold the verdict.

The judgment and order are reversed.

4. TRIAL (§ 398*)—FINDINGS — INCONSISTENT FINDINGS.

One count of a complaint in an action to recover money alleged that defendants obtained the money under a scheme to defraud through an agent or title-holding branch, and alleged an express promise of repayment. The court found against plaintiff on the first count, which involved all facts upon which an agency might be predicated, and found for plaintiff on the second count, which finding could only be supported on the theory that the court determined under the evidence that the money was received fraudulently, or by means of some agent or representative. Held, that the two findings were so inconsistent as to require a reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance and W. R. Guy, Judges.

Action by S. W. Rand against the Columbian Realty Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, the mentioned defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Wadham & Pritchard, for appellant. Eugene Daney and Cassius Carter, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The complaint as originally presented to the trial court contained five counts. The first thereof alleged that the defendants the Columbian Realty Company and the Columbian Investment Company were each regularly organized corporations carrying on business under the same management and control, acting jointly in real estate operations; that appellant was a solvent affair, while its codefendant was wholly irresponsible; that appellant took the title to all property purchased by the investment company, paying the purchase price thereof; that this was in furtherance of a scheme through which the appellant was to acquire property without incurring liability on account of the purchase, and the investment company was to assume the obligations, thus affecting a fraud upon those with whom it contracted to purchase property or do business; that at the date named, under this arrangement and agreement, the investment company acquired an option to purchase certain premises in San Diego county, such option being taken in the name of the investment company, but, in fact, for the use and benefit of appellant realty company; that the investment company, pretending to be the owner of such option, contracted with plaintiff and his assignor to sell to them an undivided one-half of the land covered by said option for $17,500, part in cash and the balance on time; that when the cash payment came to be made the same was made to the appellant under representations by the managing officers thereof that the two corporations were the same, and that the investment company was a part and parcel of the realty company; that after the cash payment was made both corporations permitted the option to expire, but that after the expiration of such option the realty company collected from plaintiff, who had no knowledge of the expiration of such option, a large amount of the purchase money; that thereafter, and after plaintiff became aware of the expiration of the option and the failure of consideration, he demanded a return of his money and the same was agreed to; that the written agreement to refund such money was signed by the investment company; that after such agreement was entered into the realty company repaid a large part of the money received, but refused to repay the sum of $7,839 and more, for which the suit was brought; it being made to appear that a part thereof was paid by plaintiff and a part thereof by the assignor of plaintiff.

The second cause of action was one in indebitatus assumpsit, alleging indebtedness to plaintiff for money had and received, with the additional allegation of an express promise to repay the same; the amount being similar to that mentioned in the first cause of action. In such count there was no allegation that the money was had and received to the use of plaintiff. The other remaining three counts in the complaint were obviously for the recovery of the same sum in different forms.

Demurrer was interposed to the complaint and each count thereof and overruled by the court; and it is insisted that the second count was insufficient in that it omitted to allege that the money was had and received to the use of plaintiff. This omission would have been fatal were it not that the complaint contains an allegation of a direct promise to repay, which had the effect to state a cause of action. Motion to require the plaintiff to elect upon which count he would proceed at the trial was denied. All of the various counts in the complaint having reference to the same transaction, and being for the recovery of the identical sum, we see no error in the action of the court refusing to require an election.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Upon the trial of the action the court found that within two years last past the appellant became and was indebted to plaintiff and to his assignor in the sum named on account of moneys had and received of the said parties, as alleged in plaintiff's second cause of action; found in favor of plaintiff as to the assignment of the portion thereof as alleged; found that the appellant had repaid the money which had been repaid under the agreement; and further found that all other allegations of plaintiff's complaint, except those admitted by the answer of defendant realty company, are not sustained, and judgment went for plaintiff and against appellant upon the second cause of action alone. Motion for a new trial was regularly filed, which was denied, and from the judgment and order denying a new trial the realty company alone appeals; the action having been dismissed by the court as to the investment company.

The record discloses that the evidence received upon the trial without contradiction showed facts and circumstances connected with the receipt of this money very similar to those involved in the case of Thomas v. Moody, 57 Cal. 215; but it will be observed that, notwithstanding the evidence, the trial court found against plaintiff upon the allegations of the first cause of action, which involved all facts upon which an agency might be predicated; the accuracy of which finding is not challenged. The judgment rendered must, therefore, rest upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding of the court that the appellant was indebted at the date named to plaintiff for money had and received, together with the promise of repayment. At common law the common count for money had and received could be used to recover for money obtained by false and fraudulent representations. 1 Chitty's Pleadings, 364; Minor v. Baldridge, 123 Cal. 190, 55 Pac. 783. The promise to repay found by the court can only have support in the proposition that the money was received by appellant either directly or through an agency, or by one holding a representative relation, express or implied. There could be no difficulty in determining from the record that the circumstances of this transaction were such as to establish the receipt of this money by appellant without consideration and in furtherance of a scheme to defraud, or through the investment company as its agent or title-holding branch, were it not for the general finding of the court that the allegations contained in the first cause of action were not sustained. It is the duty, however, of an appellate court to sustain the judgment and support the findings of the trial court, if there be any evidence in the record tending to support such findings.

All presumptions are in favor of the correctness of the findings of the trial court and its conclusion. The finding that the money was received as alleged in the complaint, and the complaint alleging a contract of repayment, can only be supported upon the theory that the court determined under the evidence that the money was received fraudulently and through misrepresentation, or by means of some agent or representative as above suggested. This finding, however, which it must be presumed the court based upon the evidence in the record, is entirely inconsistent with the other finding in connection with the first cause of action which related to the same facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction. These two findings are so at variance that a reversal of the judgment is made necessary.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

1. Homicide (§ 338*) — Appeal — Harmless Error.

Where deceased's dying declaration was admitted without objection, error in previously permitting a physician who attended deceased to answer the question, "From your experience in seeing persons wounded, what was your opinion as to his living or dying?" was not prejudicial; the witness having positively declared his opinion when he told deceased he would die, and the nature of the wound admitting of no difference of opinion as to its probable outcome.

2. Criminal Law (§§ 419, 420*)—Evidence—Declarations.

A witness is incompetent to testify to a declaration made by a party when it is necessary to have it translated before it can be understood by the witness.

4. Homicide (§ 234*)—Evidence.

6. Criminal Law (§ 363*)—Evidence—"Res Gestæ."

7. Homicide (§ 340*) — Instructions — "Involuntary Manslaughter."

While under Pen. Code, § 192, subd. 2, providing that a person is guilty of involuntary manslaughter where death results in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony, and that the aider and abettor can be guilty of no greater offense than the principal, an instruction in a murder trial that if defendant was present, aiding and abetting in the commission of an unlawful act, and that if in the commission thereof one R. was killed, a verdict of murder in the first degree should be rendered, was erroneous, abstractly considered, it was not prejudicial, the only unlawful act of which there was any evidence being a deliberate attempt to take the life of R. and his associates, unless it would be held that there was some evidence of an attempt to commit robbery, which latter contingency would bring the instruction within the contemplation of the statute.

8. Homicide (§ 287*) — Instructions — Motive.

An instruction, "If you are satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the crime of murder has been committed, and there is evidence sufficient to satisfy you to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant is guilty thereof, then the motive for its commission is unimportant and not material," was not erroneous, being simply equivalent to a direction that the jury might convict defendant of murder if they were satisfied of his guilt, though no motive for the crime was disclosed.

9. Criminal Law (§ 759*)—Instructions.

In a murder trial an instruction that, if the jury found that after defendant was arrested he attempted to escape from jail, such fact, while not itself evidence of guilt, was a circumstance the jury might "well" consider in determining defendant's guilt or innocence, was not erroneous as indicating a purpose to throw the influence of the court into the balance against defendant, since, if the jury might consider the fact at all, they might "well" consider it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 759.*]

10. Homicide (§ 305*)— Instructions.

An instruction that if one is killed by a bullet fired from a pistol, and two persons, each at the same time, fire loaded pistols at him, and one of the persons who fired is on trial, and there is no conspiracy proven between the two persons who fired, and the jury are in doubt as to which shot killed deceased, defendant is entitled to the benefit of that doubt and should be acquitted, would have precluded the jury from considering the theory that defendant was an aider and abettor, though there might be no conspiracy, and hence was properly refused.

11. Criminal Law (§ 829*)—Instructions—Instructions Covered.

The refusal in a criminal trial of instructions requested is proper, where the principles embodied therein, as far as they are correct and pertinent, are covered by the instructions given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Rafaele Petruzo was convicted of murder and appeals. Affirmed.

L. N. Peter, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, and M. C. Kerr, for the People.

BURNETT, J. The evidence is clear and convincing that defendant was justly convicted of murder in the first degree. Indeed, he may consider himself fortunate that the jury fixed the punishment at life imprisonment, instead of leaving the severer penalty to be imposed by the court. There is no pretense of excuse or justification for the homicide, and the showing in behalf of defendant was meager and inconsequential, directed to the contention that he was somewhat under the influence of liquor, together with certain circumstances related by two or three witnesses tending to create a suspicion that a party not arrested may have committed the crime. The defendant did not take the witness stand, and, as far as the record shows, offered no explanation of the affair, and made no denial of the charge except what is implied in his plea of "not guilty."

The case for the people rested upon the dying declaration of the deceased, the testimony of eyewitnesses to the shooting, and the defendant's attempt to escape from jail after his arrest. The tragedy occurred after dark on a mountainous trail on the north fork of Feather river, while a party of seven Italians, including appellant, and a party of five Austrians, including the deceased, were returning to their respective camps from a Sunday afternoon visit to a saloon about two miles from the line of the Western Pacific Railroad, then in course of construction. The deceased, one Sam Radich, and another member of the Austrian party, named Peter Sunajko, were shot at the same time and both died the following day.

The said dying declaration was in writing, signed by the deceased, and in the following language: "Long Bar, California, 30th, 1908. Being in the fear of death and believing I am about to die, I make the following statement: That I was shot at by De Carlo Antonino and Raphael Petruzo and hit in the abdomen by a bullet from a revolver. This occurred at a point on the river trail near Long Bar, Plumas county, California, on November 29th, 1908, about 6:60 p. m., Peter Sunajko was coming to my assistance and was shot in the back." The members of the said Austrian party related, in somewhat broken English, the incidents of the homicide, from which it appears that they passed the party of Italians on the trail, greeting the latter in a friendly manner. Shortly afterwards some shots were fired from the rear, but without effect, and then, in the language of one of the witnesses: "After that two shots come, them two fellows, Raphael Petruzo and Spenelli. They come with a gun right in the hand. I say to Shorty: 'Where you going to, boys?' I call Spenelli 'Shorty.' He never tell me nothing, just pass me. They shoot Sam Radich right there by me, that man was in the lead. All these men were there at the time the shooting took place. These two had two revolvers in their hands. They were using them. They were shooting men with the revolvers." Another one testified: "I saw these two fellows (pointing to Spenelli and Petruzo) shoot. Antonio Spenelli and Raphael Petruzo both had guns in their hands. None of these Austrian boys did anything at the time of the shooting. When Spenelli had the gun, he was in the middle and shoot Sam Radich. Petruzo was going along the front shooting too."

The dying declaration was admitted in evidence without objection, but prior to its introduction Dr. A. S. Bradshaw testified that he treated Radich for the wound, which was in the lower right-hand portion of the abdomen, "in a place liable to produce death. He was suffering a good deal of pain when I was called upon. I informed Radich that he would die." He was then asked the question: "From your experience in seeing persons wounded, what was your opinion as to his living or dying at that time?" The defendant objected "on the ground that it is not pertinent or material to the case. The opinion is absolutely immaterial for any purpose that I can see. The question so far as this witness goes is whether he lived or died." It is perfectly apparent, however, that, if defendant was technically correct in his position, the ruling of the court in permitting the question to be answered was entirely without prejudice, as the doctor had quite positively declared his opinion when he stated to the deceased "that he would die." Considering, also, the nature of the wound, there could be no difference of opinion as to its probable outcome. The doctor proceeded to state: "At the time I told him he was going to die, my opinion was then he would certainly die. I think I informed him through another party at the time they were brought in before he made any statement. I told them to tell him he couldn't get well; he ought to tell the truth. I think these parties were brought before him at the time. I think they were all lined up before the bed where he could see them all. When these parties were brought before Sam Radich, he pointed out two who he said were shooting at him. Their names were Petruzo and De Carlo." On cross-examination he testified: "All that I had to do with him was done through an interpreter and the interpreter spoke to him." The defendant then moved "to strike out all the testimony of Dr. Bradshaw as to anything connected with a dying declaration on the ground that it appears to be irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, no proper foundation laid for its introduction, it being apparent the witness himself doesn't know what statement the man made."

It is, of course, well settled that a witness is incompetent to testify to a declaration made by a party when it is necessary to have it translated before it can be understood by the witness. It is clearly hearsay, as the witness necessarily testifies to what the interpreter declares that the other party said. People v. Ah Yute, 56 Cal. 119; People v. John, 137 Cal. 220, 69 Pac. 1063. But here the doctor gave the testimony without objection after stating that his communication with the wounded man was through other parties. The defendant was therefore informed of the infirmity which he afterwards urged in support of his motion and he should have objected if he desired to have the testimony withheld from the jury. "An objection to testimony as hearsay and incompetent cannot be taken for the first time by a motion to strike out." People v. Samario, 84 Cal. 484, 24 Pac. 283; People v. Nelson, 85 Cal. 425, 24 Pac. 1006. The ruling of the court could be supported also upon other grounds, if required. For instance, the physician testified that the deceased "pointed out" the defendant and another person as those who had shot him. The purpose for which the various persons were brought into the room could hardly be misunderstood, and under the circumstances the testimony of the physician related to an exoteric physical manifestation rather than to the declarations of the wounded man. It is also true that this testimony amounted to nothing more than a repetition of the written declaration which was translated so as to be understood by Radich before he signed it. Besides, W. A. Look testified that he was present at the time and Radich identified the two men in English. Franklin H. Smith, an officer, also testified: "I spoke to Sam Radich at this time in English. He seemed to understand me. I asked him if he was sure that this was the man that shot him, to make no mistake about it, he was about to die and I wanted him to be sure and make no mistake as to the identity of the men. He said that was the man that shot him and that other man shot too. He pointed to Petruzo as the man that shot him. De Carlo was the man that was also pointed out as the man that also shot." If the said ruling, therefore, had been erroneous, it would simply constitute error without prejudice.

The same suggestions will apply to the ruling in relation to the similar testimony of the witness Cleveland, who prepared the said written dying declaration. It is true that one Marcus testified in regard to the identification that "then he (Officer Smith) bring them three together after this, they point them out. Sam Radich pointed these two men out here. (Pointing to Spenelli and De Carlo.) I don't know whether they gave their names at the time they were pointed out. Peter gave his name. Sam gave his name to these two men that they both shot at him. Sam Radich picked out the two men that shot at him at that time." The jury probably concluded that the witness was mistaken as to the two men identified by Radich, but, at any rate, the testimony of the other witnesses and the statement in the said dying declaration were positive and overwhelming as to the identification of the defendant as one of the parties participating in the homicide. It is entirely immaterial that the witnesses did not all agree as to whether defendant alone fired the fatal shot or aided and abetted in the consummation of the crime, since there was ample evidence on either theory to justify the conviction.

Nor was the district attorney required to elect one or the other of these positions upon which to base his claim for a verdict. His duty was done when he had presented the evidence. It was for the jury, under proper instructions, to follow the witnesses whose testimony carried conviction. The case is not like those where the evidence tends to connect the defendant with separate offenses. An example of this latter character is found in People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 165, 65 Pac. 323, where the evidence disclosed many separate acts of intercourse by the defendant with the prosecutrix, and it was properly held that the main charge relied upon for a conviction should be selected, and the defendant should be notified thereof at the beginning of the trial. After stating that the court below had charged the jury to the effect that if they believed that defendant had had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix at any time within three years before the finding of the indictment, she being under the age of 16, they must find him guilty, the Supreme Court says: "The jury were not even told that they must all agree that some specifically described act had been performed. A verdict of guilty could have been rendered under such an instruction, although no two jurors were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, or at all, of the truth of the charge, as to any one of these separate offenses." But in the case at bar the witnesses testified to only one transaction and one offense. Under the law the defendant was a principal in either of the contingencies to which we have referred and he could justly be convicted of the charge of murder, although some of the jurors may have believed that he personally fired the fatal shot, while others were convinced that he was an aider and abettor in the crime. However, if it were necessary to uphold the verdict, we should be guided by the presumption that all the jurors adopted the same theory.

It can hardly be seriously contended that the court committed error in sustaining the district attorney's objection to a question asked of the witness Petrino as to a conversation he had with one Mangano. The question was: "Did he say anything to you about any shooting the night before?" It is true that "the facts, circumstances, or declarations which grow out of the principal fact in question which are contemporaneous with it and serve to illustrate, qualify, or explain it constitute the res gestæ (Gillam v. Sigman, 29 Cal. 638)," and for that reason are admissible, but the term "res gestæ" is not so comprehensive as to include declarations made upon the day following and many hours after the homicide.

The court gave this instruction to the jury: "You are instructed that if you believe upon the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was present, aiding and abetting in the commission of an unlawful act, and that in the commission of said unlawful act Sam Radich was killed, then it will be your duty to bring in a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree." Abstractly considered, this is manifestly an erroneous statement of the law. Subdivision 2 of section 192 of the Penal Code provides that a person is guilty of involuntary manslaughter where death results "in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony," and the aider and abettor can be guilty of no greater offense than the principal. Indeed, the instruction is accurate only as applied to certain felonies. Section 189, Pen. Code. But this instruction, as others, must be considered in view of the undisputed evidence in the case. People v. Piner, 11 Cal. App. 542, 105 Pac. 780; People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 475, 98 Pac. 194. The only unlawful act of which there is a particle of evidence is the deliberate attempt to take the life of Radich and his associates, unless it may be held that there is some evidence of an attempt to perpetrate robbery, and this latter contingency would bring the instruction within the contemplation of the statute. The instruction was, of course, intended to present the law applicable to a certain feature of the case disclosed by the evidence, and it must have been so understood by the jury. It is probably capable of the interpretation put upon it by appellant when he says: "The court in effect tells the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant was present and abetting some other person in the shooting of wild game out of season, or any other trivial misdemeanor, and that in the commission of such an unlawful act Sam Radich was accidentally killed, the defendant would be guilty of murder in the first degree." But, if the instruction had been given in so many words, it would have been manifestly without prejudice, as there was no evidence of such hypothetical case.

In People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 474, 98 Pac. 196, the Supreme Court, referring to a certain instruction, said: "Upon the other proposition, it may be conceded that if the instruction is taken alone, without reference to the facts of the case or the crime involved, and as an abstract proposition, it would be erroneous. * * * But an instruction may be incorrect as an abstract or general proposition and yet not erroneous when considered in connection with the particular case and the facts to which it relates." Here the unlawful act to which the court referred is pointed out in another instruction given at the request of defendant: "You are instructed that every defendant on a trial for homicide is to be judged according to his own intent, and, where he is charged as an aider and abettor, he is to be tried according to the intent with which he may have participated. It must therefore be proved to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that the person charged as an aider and abettor of his malice aforethought was present, aiding and abetting his principal in the act of taking the life of the deceased. Unless you are convinced to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that there existed in the mind of the defendant the intent to unlawfully take the life of Sam Radich, you cannot convict him of murder."

There is no error in the following instruction: "If you are satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the crime of murder has been committed, and there is evidence sufficient to satisfy you to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant is guilty thereof, then the motive for its commission is unimportant and not material." It was simply equivalent to a direction that the jury might convict the defendant of murder if they were satisfied of his guilt, although no motive for the crime was disclosed. This cannot be questioned. As stated in People v. Owens, 132 Cal. 471, 64 Pac. 771: "While the motive for the commission of the homicide is not plainly manifest from the evidence, yet the establishment of a motive is not at all essential as an element necessary to justify a conclusion. The presence or absence of motive is simply a circumstance in each particular case, sometimes weak and sometimes strong, going to the question of guilt or innocence. People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179 [48 Pac. 75]." That the court could not have been understood as minimizing or ignoring the importance of the question of motive is shown by this instruction given at request of defendant: "You are instructed that, if the evidence fails to show any motive on the part of the accused to commit the crime charged, this is a circumstance in favor of his innocence which the jury ought to consider together with all the other facts and circumstances in making up their verdict. The absence of all evidence of an inducing cause or motive to commit the crime when the fact is in reasonable doubt as to who committed it affords a strong presumption of innocence."

There was evidence that after the arrest and while the defendant was in the county jail he made an attempt to escape. The jury were instructed that, if they found this to be true from the evidence, "that fact of itself is not evidence of guilt, but it is a circumstance that the jury may well consider in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant." The particular objection is to the use of the word "well," but it is apparent that, if the jury should consider it at all, they might well consider it. It cannot be said that it is an instruction as to a matter of fact or that it contains anything indicating a purpose to throw "the influence of the court into the balance against the defendant." A similar instruction was approved in the case of People v. Strong, 46 Cal. 302, and People v. Welsh, 63 Cal. 167. The instruction is probably more favorable to defendant than he could expect, since the court declared that the attempt to escape "of itself is not evidence of guilt," but of this appellant cannot complain.

In view of the facts and circumstances of the case, the jury could not have been misled by the following instruction: "You are instructed that every person is presumed to intend what his acts indicate his intention to have been; and if you find, from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant fired a loaded pistol at the deceased and killed him, the law presumes that the defendant intended to kill the deceased, and, unless it is shown by the evidence that his intention was other than his acts indicated, the law will not hold him guiltless." A similar instruction was approved in People v. Langton, 67 Cal. 427, 7 Pac. 843, and People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 162, 22 Pac. 127, 549. It was however, condemned in People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 50 Pac. 405; People v. Solani, 2 Cal. App. 225, 83 Pac. 281, and People v. Grill, 3 Cal. App. 514, 86 Pac. 613. But in the first two of these the defendant claimed self-defense and there was evidence in support of it. Hence, while there was no controversy as to the intention to kill, it was error to instruct the jury that guilt would follow from such intention.

In the Grill Case the defense was based upon the claim of accidental homicide and the defendant so testified. Under the peculiar facts, it was held that the presumption that a person intends the natural consequences of his act must give way to the presumption of innocence. It is worthy of note, however, that in the Newcomer Case the court declared its indorsement of the position that an intention to kill would be inferred from "the shooting of the deceased with a pistol," and in the Solani Case it is said: "The shooting with a pistol would naturally indicate intent to kill, and would be sufficient proof of such intent if there was no other proof tending to show that he did not intend to kill." Here, as we have seen, the concluding portion of the said instruction which was the subject of animadversion in the cases cited by appellant is entirely without prejudice in view of the evidence and other instructions. See People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 363, 97 Pac. 871.

The court refused the following instruction requested by defendant: "You are instructed that if a person is killed by a bullet fired from a pistol, and two persons, each at the same time, fire loaded pistols at him, and one of the persons who fired is on trial, and there is no conspiracy proven between the two persons who fired, and the jury are in doubt as to which shot killed the deceased, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of that doubt and should be acquitted." The instruction would have precluded the jury from considering the theory that defendant was an aider and abettor, although there might be no conspiracy, and for that reason it was properly rejected. In the discussion of a somewhat similar instruction in the case of the People v. Woody, 45 Cal. 289, the contingency that we have just suggested seems to have escaped the attention of the court. It certainly would be a reproach to the law if it countenanced the doctrine that where A. and B. deliberately and unlawfully fire at C. with intention to kill him, and one shot takes effect causing his death, but it is uncertain whether A. or B. fired it, neither can be convicted of murder unless a conspiracy should be shown between them. In any rational view each must be considered as aiding and abetting the other and both responsible for the homicide.

Complaint is made of the action of the court in refusing some other instructions, but the principles embodied therein, as far as they were correct and pertinent, were covered by the instructions given.

It may not be amiss in conclusion to repeat the suggestion, which has been given substantially in other opinions of appellate courts, that if the district attorney in every criminal trial would carefully prepare and formulate the various principles of the law involved in the evidence presented on behalf of the people, scrupulously adopting the form of statement that has been approved by the Supreme Court in its latest utterances, and the trial court would adopt this, together with whatever pertinent and correct instructions may be requested by defendant, as its charge to the jury, only supplying what may seem necessary in the interest of justice, the probability of a reversal of a righteous verdict would be greatly reduced.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In a counter affidavit, counsel for defendant does not controvert any of the facts above set forth, but deposes that after the commencement of said action, "to wit, at the time of the appearance of said defendant in said action," defendant served on plaintiff its demand for a change of the place of trial, from Yuba county to the city and county of San Francisco, together with an affidavit of merits; that thereafter, to wit, on January 26, 1910, said motion was denied; that within 60 days thereafter defendant perfected its appeal from said order and prepared and served upon plaintiff its purported bill of exceptions to said order denying said motion, and on May 12, 1910, said bill was allowed and filed. It is further deposed, apparently to excuse the failure to file the transcript on appeal from the judgment, that it was the intention of counsel, upon leave being obtained from the court, to incorporate in the record of appeal from the order the record also constituting the transcript on appeal from the judgment. Defendant prays that the time within which to print, serve, and file transcript on appeal from the judgment be extended 15 days from June 6, 1910, and that the record on both appeals be included in one transcript, or, if such leave be not granted, that the appeal from the judgment be dismissed without prejudice.

Counsel for plaintiff has filed an affidavit in reply to defendant's affidavit, in which he denies that at the time of defendant's appearance defendant served upon plaintiff its demand for a change of the place of trial, and avers the fact to be that defendant did not serve and file its notice of said motion and affidavit of merits until after it had appeared in the action by demurrer and after said demurrer had been overruled.

Section 396, Code of Civil Procedure, requires the party desiring to move for a change of the place of trial, to file an affidavit of merits, and demand in writing that the place of trial be had in the proper county, "at the time he answers or demurs." If his motion or demand is made after demurrer filed and overruled, he fails to comply with the statute, and the demand should be denied. Rule 2 (78 Pac. vii) provides that the appellant in a civil action shall within 40 days after the appeal is perfected serve and file the printed transcript of the record. The rule sets forth certain facts which, if made to appear, will excuse noncompliance therewith. Here, however, appellant makes no showing that these facts exist, and respondent shows affirmatively, as provided in rule 6 (78 Pac. ix), that they do not exist. The bill of exceptions and statement of the case referred to in rule 2 (78 Pac. vii) is a bill or statement "which may be used in support of such appeal"—i. e., the appeal from the judgment—and does not refer to a bill of exceptions such as was prepared on motion to change the place of trial. Appellant should have perfected its appeal from the judgment and filed its transcript in time, and not having done so the pending appeal from the order denying its motion for change of place of trial cannot avail him as an answer to the present motion.

Rule 5 (78 Pac. viii) provides that, "if the transcript of the record or appellant's points and authorities be not filed within the time prescribed, the appeal may be dismissed upon motion, on notice given." The rule further provides that "if the transcript, or the points and authorities, though not filed within the time prescribed, be on file at the time such notice is given, that fact shall be sufficient answer to the motion." Subdivision 5 of rule 2 (78 Pac. viii) provides for extending the time within which points and authorities must be filed, but no such provision is made as to the filing of the transcript of the record on appeal. Assuming, however, that the court, as seems to be implied in the case of McCabe v. Healey, 139 Cal. 30, 72 Pac. 359, upon sufficient showing, will relieve a party from his default in filing his points and authorities in time, will also relieve him from like default, on sufficient showing, in failing to file his transcript in time (a point not necessary to decide), there is here no showing whatever excusing defendant's failure. The judgment was rendered in February, 1910, and in March, defendant served its notice of appeal. There is no showing that a transcript of the record on appeal from the judgment, or any bill of exceptions, or statement in support of such appeal, is in course of preparation and no excuse is offered for defendant's failure to prepare such transcript.

The grounds on which the change of place of trial was moved do not appear and presumptively they were wholly insufficient and the motion properly denied. Furthermore, as we have seen, it appears from the affidavit in behalf of plaintiff that the demand for a change of the place of trial was not made until after the demurrer was filed and overruled, and it may be that this was one ground on which the trial court denied the motion.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal in the above-entitled action on the ground that no transcript of the record on appeal from the judgment in said action has been filed and more than 40 days have elapsed since the perfection of such appeal. With the exception as to the amount of the judgment recovered by plaintiff, the facts are the same as in Union Lumber Company v. Conformably with the decision in that case, the appeal is dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by Fairbanks, Morse & Co. against C. E. Getchell. From an order denying defendant's motion to dismiss the attachment, he appeals. Reversed on rehearing.

Geo. Flournoy, for appellant. W. W. Kaye, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion to discharge an attachment.

On May 6, 1910, an opinion was filed herein whereby the ruling of the trial court in denying defendant's motion to discharge an attachment was reversed. In that opinion the court overlooked section 558, Code Civ. Proc., as it was amended in 1909 (St. 1909, p. 253), and in the absence of anything to the contrary being said by respondent, whose attorney it appears did not deem the case of sufficient importance to warrant him in filing points and authorities, or otherwise to offer any suggestions touching the points involved, it accepted appellant's contention based upon Winters v. Pearson, 72 Cal. 553, 14 Pac. 304, and Tibbet v. Tom Sue et al., 122 Cal. 208, 54 Pac. 741, to the effect that an affidavit for attachment is not subject to amendment in this state. Our attention having been directed to the inadvertence, an order was made on May 19th whereby the judgment heretofore rendered was set aside and vacated and a rehearing ordered for the purpose of correcting the erroneous statement contained in the former opinion. Defendant's motion for the discharge of the attachment was made upon the ground that the writ of attachment was improperly and irregularly issued. Section 556, Code Civ. Proc. The irregularity is said to have consisted of the alleged fact that the writ of attachment was issued without the affidavit required by the provisions of section 538, Code Civ. Proc.

As appears from the record, there was filed with the clerk on July 21, 1909, the date of the issuance of the writ of attachment, what purported to be an affidavit of plaintiff's agent. This document contained the title of the court and cause with the venue laid in the county of Kern, state of California, together with a statement of facts entitling plaintiff to the issuance of the writ. It was not subscribed by affiant, but had attached thereto the jurat of the notary as follows: "Sworn to before me this 21st day of July, 1909. W. W. Kaye, Notary Public." As shown by the affidavit and jurat, affiant appeared before the notary in Kern county and made oath to the affidavit. Kaye, however, when upon the witness stand, testified as follows: "I am the attorney for the plaintiff herein and am a notary public in and for the county of Kern. That is my signature which appears to the jurat on the affidavit for attachment filed in this court on July 21, 1909. Mr. Chas. A. Meyer, whose name appears in the body of said affidavit, was not in Bakersfield on that date. He lives in Los Angeles and was in Los Angeles on that date. I called Mr. Meyer up in Los Angeles on that date over the telephone, and he made oath to the matters contained in the affidavit. He related the facts contained in the affidavit and under oath stated to me that they were true. I am well acquainted with Mr. Meyer and recognized his voice over the telephone."

Appellant contends that the affidavit was made in Los Angeles county, and that W. W. Kaye, the notary, having been appointed in and for the county of Kern, state of California, had no authority to act officially as such notary in the county of Los Angeles.

To justify the issuance of the writ there must be received by the clerk an affidavit by or on behalf of the plaintiff. It is not necessary that the affidavit be signed by the party making it. Ede v. Johnson, 15 Cal. 53; Pope v. Kirchner, 77 Cal. 152, 19 Pac. 264. Neither is it any defense to a prosecution for perjury thereon that the oath was taken or administered in an irregular manner. Pen. Code, § 121. Nevertheless the document which purports to be sworn to is not an affidavit unless the person before whom his assent to the solemn obligation is assumed had authority at the time to administer the oath. People v. Cohen, 118 Cal. 74, 50 Pac. 20. In the absence of statutory regulation providing therefor, the general rule is that a notary cannot act as such official outside of the county for which he is appointed. In re House Bill No. 166, 9 Colo. 628, 21 Pac. 473; 29 Cyc., page 1090; Byrd v. Cochran, 39 Neb. 109, 58 N. W. 127. We are unable to find any provision in the Codes of this state which could be construed as authorizing a notary of one county to administer an oath in a county other than that for what he is appointed. Section 791 of the Political Code provides that the Governor may appoint such number of notaries public for the several counties as he shall deem necessary for the public convenience, but limits the number which he may appoint in cities and counties of the first class to not exceeding eighty. If notaries of other counties could maintain offices and act officially in the city and county of San Francisco, the provision thus limiting such number would be nullified. To qualify one for such appointment he must have resided in the county for which his appointment is made for six months. Section 792. Furthermore, he is required to keep an official seal upon which, among other things, must be engraved the name of the county for which he is commissioned. Subdivision 7, section 794, Pol. Code. All these provisions are inconsistent with the view that the Legislature intended the jurisdiction of a notary to be coextensive with the state.

As appears from the record, the oath was administered by communication had between the notary and affiant over the telephone, and appellant contends that the act was void and of no effect for this reason. Such contention finds direct support in the case of Sullivan v. First National Bank, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 228, 83 S. W. 421. According to our view, however, it is unnecessary to determine this point. Assuming, but not deciding, that an oath may be administered and the obligations thereof assumed by communication had over the telephone, the validity of such act must be held to apply to those cases only where both notary and affiant are within the territorial limits for which the notary has been appointed and commissioned.

At the time he made the affidavit and assented to the obligations of the oath, Meyer, the affiant, was in the county of Los Angeles. His act signifying his assent to the obligation must be deemed to have been had and done in Los Angeles county, where he then was. If untrue, it could not be claimed that he committed an act in swearing to a false affidavit in the county of Kern upon which a prosecution for perjury could be predicated, for the reason that it clearly appears he was not in Kern county when the act was committed. The oath was administered by a notary commissioned for Kern county to an affiant conceded to have been at the time in Los Angeles county, and, the notary being vested with no authority to administer an oath in Los Angeles county, it necessarily follows that the act was a nullity, and the purported affidavit upon which the attachment was issued was void and of no effect.

At the hearing of the motion there was presented and filed what is termed an "amended affidavit," which is in proper form and sufficient in substance to justify the issuance of the writ of attachment. Section 558, Code Civ. Proc., as amended in 1909 (St. 1909, p. 253), provides that, notwithstanding the fact that the writ of attachment is improperly or irregularly issued, nevertheless it shall not be discharged "if at or before the hearing of such application the * * * affidavit * * * upon which such attachment was based shall be amended and made to conform to the provisions of this chapter." Prior to the enactment of this amendment, the affidavit for attachment could not be made the subject of an amendment under the laws of this state. Winters v. Pearson, 72 Cal. 553, 14 Pac. 304; Tibbet v. Tom Sue et al., 122 Cal. 208, 54 Pac. 741. Inasmuch, however, as the act of Kaye in administering the oath was a nullity and the purported affidavit void, it follows there was nothing to amend. The authorized amendment of the affidavit contemplates the existence of an affidavit. There could be no irregularity in that which had no existence. In the case of Cobbossee Nat. Bank v. Rich, 81 Me. 164, 16 Atl. 506, the court in discussing the distinction between that which is void and that which is irregular, says: "Generally speaking, it is the difference between substance and form, between void and voidable, or between void action and imperfect action. Error or nullity goes to the foundations and discovers that the proceedings have nothing to stand upon; while irregularity denotes that the court was acting within its jurisdiction, but failed to consummate its work in all respects according to the required forms. The one applies to matters which are contrary to law, the other to matters which are contrary to the practice authorized by the law. One relates more to the act, and the other more to the manner of it." In this case it is not the manner of performing the act, but the total absence of the act the performance of which was a necessary prerequisite to the issuance of the writ. Under this proviso the attaching party may by amendment supply that which, by reason of inadvertence or oversight, was omitted from the affidavit; but the provision cannot be construed as authorizing the filing of an affidavit in support of a writ theretofore issued in the absence of that which constitutes the substance of the act required as a prerequisite to the issuance thereof.

We think the court erred in its ruling, and the order denying defendant's motion to discharge the attachment is, therefore, reversed, with direction to the lower court that it make its order granting the same.

PEOPLE v. SMITH. (Cr. 124.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 18, 1910. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 11, 1910.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 564*) — Evidence — Venue.

In a prosecution for rape, a witness was asked, "This that you have testified to occurred in the county of Tehama and state of California, did it, Mr. Keeran?" And the answer was, "Yes, sir." There was no conflict in the evidence that the offense was committed at the home of Mrs. Ladd, which was in fact in the county of Tehama. Held, that the venue of the offense was established.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1277; Dec. Dig. § 564.*]

2. Criminal Law (§ 412*)—Evidence—Declarations—Admissibility of.

In a prosecution for rape, evidence that defendant had made a statement that he had had one of the Ladd girls down on the bed, and could have had sexual intercourse with her, was not inadmissible as not showing which one of the girls was meant, as it was for the jury to decide on the evidence whether the statement referred to the one subsequently raped.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 412.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 706*)—Conduct of Prosecuting Attorney—Questions.

In a prosecution for rape, the prosecuting attorney asked a witness if defendant had not made any statement in regard to his action with a 13 year old girl. The answer was, "Yes, he did." The court then asked the attorney if the girl that was raped was the one referred to. He answered, "No, sir." The evidence was excluded, but the district attorney explained that defendant had make the remark about a 13 year old girl without mentioning her name and did not say when it occurred. Held, that it must be assumed that the district attorney acted in good faith and believed the evidence referred to the girl that was outraged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1661; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

4. Criminal Law (§ 651*)—Personal Inspection of Premises by Jury — When Allowed.

Where, in a prosecution for rape, the premises where the offense was committed were clearly described by witnesses and by photographs, drawings, etc., the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to direct that the jury personally inspect the premises.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1516; Dec. Dig. § 651.*]

5. Criminal Law (§ 815*) — Instructions — Conformity to Evidence.

A requested instruction in a prosecution for rape as to a conviction on the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecutrix was properly refused where there was some corroboration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1986; Dec. Dig. § 815.*]

6. Criminal Law (§ 829*) — Instructions — Requests — Instructions Covered by Charge Given.

7. Criminal Law (§ 761*) — Instructions — Assuming Facts.

In a prosecution for rape, the court properly refused to give an instruction as to the failure of the prosecutrix to make prompt and seasonable complaint, as it assumed that the delay was unreasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1754–1764; Dec. Dig. § 761.*]

8. Criminal Law (§ 807*)—Argumentative Instructions.

In a prosecution for rape, the court properly refused an instruction as to the policy of the law in relation to the conviction of innocent persons, as the court is required to state to the jury the law, and not the reasons for its enactment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1960; Dec. Dig. § 807.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Harvey E. Smith was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

James T. Matlock, Jr., for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape in having sexual intercourse with a female who was under the age of consent and not the wife of said defendant.

1. There is no merit in the contention of appellant that the venue was not proved. The witness Keeran was asked this question: "This that you have testified to occurred in the county of Tehama and state of California, did it, Mr. Keeran?" and the answer was "Yes, sir." The witness had just detailed certain occurrences at the home of Mrs. Ladd, the mother of the prosecutrix, and there was no conflict in the evidence that the offense was committed at said home. The showing could not have been more direct or satisfactory as to the county in which the crime was perpetrated.

2. Appellant claims that the trial court erred in overruling his objection to certain testimony given by the said witness Keeran. He was asked this question: "Mr. Keeran, in reference to the two Misses Ladd, the young ladies, did the defendant ever make any statement to you about having one of them down on the bed?" Without any objection he answered the question, "Yes, sir." Then he was asked: "Will you please state to the jury what that conversation was?" An objection to this was overruled, and he answered: "He was speaking of the Ladd girls, and he said he had one of them down on the bed, the other night, and had felt of her, and she first fought and finally just gave way to him, and he felt of her, and could have had sexual intercourse with her if he had wanted to." The point of the objection is that the testimony referred to defendant's action with some other than the prosecutrix, but this, we think, was for the jury to determine. He was speaking of both of the girls, and said the conduct occurred with one of them, without mentioning her name. Manifestly, it might have referred to either, but in connection with the other evidence the jury were justified in concluding that he referred to lewd conduct with the prosecutrix. It may be said, also, that the answer to the question, which was not objected to, carried with it an inference as unfavorable as the subsequent question and answer.

Again, the witness was asked: "And on another occasion, during the time you were in that neighborhood and you were making your headquarters at Mrs. Ladd's, did the defendant ever make any statement to you in regard to his action with a 13 year old girl?" The objection to this question was overruled, and he answered: "Yes, he did." He was then directed to state the conversation. He was proceeding to do so when the court, interrupting, asked the district attorney, "Do you mean this girl?" and the district attorney answered, "No, sir." The court then sustained the objection and directed the jury to disregard what was said in relation to it. The district attorney, however, in further explanation, stated that the defendant made a remark about a 13 year old girl, but mentioned no name, and did not state when it occurred. We must assume that the district attorney acted in good faith, and believed the evidence was relevant and referred to the prosecutrix. It is often difficult to determine whether language used relates to the issue involved, and we cannot say that the question here is so plain that it must be held that the prosecuting officer, in violation of his oath of office, endeavored to deprive the defendant of a fair trial by offering testimony which he knew to be inadmissible. The cases cited by appellant on this point are quite different in their facts.

In People v. Stewart, 85 Cal. 175, 24 Pac. 722, evidence tending to show lewd, immoral, and indecent conduct on the part of the defendant with persons other than the prosecutrix was admitted over his objection, and the court very properly said: "The admission of the evidence was clearly reversible error."

People v. Elliott, 119 Cal. 593, 51 Pac. 955, is to the same effect, where evidence was admitted that the defendant had asked other girls than the prosecutrix to go to the house of defendant to have illicit intercourse with men.

In People v. Derbert, 138 Cal. 467, 71 Pac. 564, the Supreme Court agreed with the claim of appellant that "the persistent conduct of the district attorney in asking improper questions during the trial, and making improper insinuations was such error that the case should be reversed." In the course of the discussion, it is said: "The court promptly sustained objections to all these questions, but that did not cure the error. It clearly appears that the object of the district attorney was to leave the impression upon the mind of the jury that defendant had committed other crimes, and that he had changed his name. His questions were directly in face of the rulings of the court and certainly with the knowledge that the court would not permit them to be answered. The object was to ask the questions, and not to get the answers." No such imputation can be indulged here. While, in this class of cases, especially, the rights of the defendant should be scrupulously protected, we can find nothing in the conduct of the district attorney to demand a reversal of the judgment.

3. The court did not abuse its discretion in declining to direct the jury to be taken to the Ladd residence for an inspection of the premises where the offense is said to have been committed. The practice invoked by the defendant should be adopted only in exceptional cases, as it usually increases the hazard of a mistrial. The premises were fully described by the witnesses; photographs and drawings of them were received in evidence, and the court was clearly right in the opinion that a personal inspection by the jury was entirely unnecessary.

4. No error was committed by the court in refusing the instruction in reference to a conviction upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix, for the reason that there was some corroboration. Besides, it is argumentative, and the caution that it required of the jury was sufficiently covered by the instructions which were given.

5. The requested instruction as to the failure of the prosecutrix to make "a prompt and seasonable complaint" of the crime was an invasion of the province of the jury, in assuming that her delay in making complaint was unseasonable and inexcusable, and in the suggestion as to the weight and effect of certain evidence. It was therefore properly refused. Similarly, the action of the court was clearly right in refusing the instruction as to the policy of the law in relation to the conviction of innocent persons. The court is required to state to the jury the law, not the reasons for its enactment, or the nature of the public opinion which sanctions it.

It was not necessary to state that each individual juror was required to be convinced of the guilt of the defendant, as that was clearly implied in several instructions given by the court.

In fine, it may be said that every needful instruction was given to the jury to enable them to consider and determine intelligently the facts bearing upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused.

The defendant was fairly tried and the evidence supports the verdict. The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re GUINASSO'S ESTATE.

GUINASSO v. ARATA et al.

(Civ. 769.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 30, 1910.)

1. Wills (§ 302*) — Destruction — Restoration—Proof of Contents.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1339, providing that, where a will has been destroyed by public calamity during the lifetime of the testator without his knowledge, "at least two credible witnesses are necessary to prove its provisions," the testimony of one witness who had personal knowledge of its provisions, and the testimony of another witness who had gained her knowledge by having had it read to her by the first witness, was not sufficient.

2. Evidence (§ 186*) — Writings — Proof of Contents.

The contents of a writing cannot be proved by the testimony of a person who heard the writing read.

3. Stipulations (§ 14*)—Construction—Matters Covered.

Where a will had been destroyed, a stipulation by the contestants of the will that it was proved to have been duly executed by the deceased before two attesting witnesses, and that proof of such execution was duly made, did not preclude the objection to allowing the probate because of the lack of two witnesses to prove the contents of the will.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Proceedings for the probate of the will of Luigi Guinasso, deceased, contested by Maria Arata and Louis Guinasso. From an order admitting the will to probate, contestants appeal. Order reversed.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, for appellants. Bourdette & Bacon, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from an order admitting to probate the will of Luigi Guinasso, deceased. The petition for the probate of the alleged will was filed by John W. Bourdette, and sets forth that the will was destroyed by the great conflagration of April, 1906, which occurred in San Francisco, and also sets forth what purports to be the provisions of the will in hæc verba. It is also alleged that the testator at the time of his death believed the will to be in existence, and had no notice or knowledge of its destruction. Appellants are heirs at law of decedent, and in due time filed a contest of the will. The court made findings in favor of the proponent as to all issues raised by the pleadings, and it is the sufficiency of the evidence to support these findings that is attacked by appellants. In their opening brief three points were made by appellants: First, that the evidence did not support the finding as to the due execution of the alleged will; second, that the evidence did not support the finding that decedent had no notice or knowledge of the destruction of the will, and that he believed it to be in existence at the time of his death; and third, that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court as to the provisions of the will. Subsequently, by stipulation filed in this court, appellants waived the first point.

We have examined the evidence as to the second point, and do not think that appellants' contention can be maintained; but, as we think the third point is well taken, we have not deemed it necessary or profitable to review the evidence under the second point.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

As before stated, the will was offered as a will destroyed by public calamity. Section 1339, Code Civ. Proc., provides that: "No will shall be proved as a lost or destroyed will, unless the same is proved to have been in existence at the time of the death of the testator, or is shown to have been fraudulently, or by public calamity, destroyed in the lifetime of the testator, without his knowledge, nor unless its provisions are clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses."

According to the record before us, only two witnesses testified as to the contents of the destroyed will—J. Bourdette and respondent Nellie Guinasso. J. Bourdette drew the will, and of course had knowledge of its contents. Upon the destruction of the will his parol testimony was competent to prove its provisions. But the record shows that the only knowledge that Nellie Guinasso had of the contents of the will was from hearing what purported to be the will or a copy thereof read by Mr. Bourdette. She does not claim to have herself read the will, but only that it was read to her by Mr. Bourdette. She testified: "Mr. Bourdette held the will in his hand and read it to me. I am not able to swear whether it was the original or a copy." Does such testimony comply with the law that the provisions of a destroyed will must be clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses?

It is contended by appellants that the law requires that two witnesses must be produced, each one of whom gives primary evidence, or evidence from personal knowledge as to the contents of the will, and that a destroyed will cannot be established by one witness testifying to its contents from personal knowledge, and another testifying to its contents from statements made to him by the witness who had personal knowledge of its contents. This contention seems to be sound. If Mr. Bourdette, the first witness, had testified that he did read the will to the second witness, which he did not, and that it was correctly read to her, it is apparent that the whole proof would finally depend upon the credibility of Mr. Bourdette. The Legislature never contemplated, when it enacted the requirement that the provisions of a destroyed will must be clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, that one such witness might in effect multiply himself into any number of witnesses by reading a will or stating its contents to other persons.

The contents of a writing cannot be proved by the testimony of a person who heard the writing read. Propst v. Mathis, 115 N. C. 526, 20 S. E. 710; Nichols v. Kingdom Iron Ore Co., 56 N. Y. 618; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Tillman, 84 Tex. 31, 19 S. W. 294.

Respondent, in answer to the contention of appellants upon this point, has contented herself with urging that appellants are precluded from making this point by the stipulation filed in this court. This stipulation has no bearing upon the sufficiency of the evidence to prove the provisions of the will, but only relates to the proof upon the issue as to its due execution. It is clearly a stipulation only "that the will of said deceased was proved to have been duly executed by him before two attesting witnesses, and that proof of such execution was duly made in" the trial court, and that the "first point made by appellant in his points and authorities on file herein" is waived. Proof of the provisions of a destroyed will is quite a different matter from proof of its due execution before two attesting witnesses.

The provisions of the destroyed will were not clearly and distinctly proved by at least two credible witnesses, and for this reason the finding as to the provisions of the will is not supported by the evidence.

The order admitting the will to probate is reversed.

SWANSON v. WILSEN et al. (Civ. 709.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 12, 1910.)

1. COURTS (§ 212*)—DISTRICT COURT OF APPEAL—JURISDICTION.

In an action by a partner for his share in a certain amount received for engineering work, where the case involved no accounting among the copartners and no equitable relief was asked, the Court of Appeals had jurisdiction upon direct appeal, under Const. art. 6, § 4.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 129*) — ADMISSIBILITY—SIMILAR FACTS AND TRANSACTIONS.

Where, in a suit to recover a partner's share in proceeds from certain construction work, defendants claimed that, by reason of an oral agreement, the partners who quit work on the job before its completion should receive only day's wages, and that defendant should therefore recover only that amount, evidence that one of the other partners quit and received only day's wages as compensation under the agreement was admissible to prove such oral agreement.

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 86*)—ORAL AGREEMENT AS TO PARTNERS' SHARES—CIV. CODE, § 2403—APPLICATION OF.

Where, after forming a partnership, an oral agreement was made as to the rights and shares of the partners, Civ. Code, § 2403, providing that, "in the absence of any agreement on the subject, the shares of partners in the profit and loss of the business are equal," would not apply.

Action by A. Swanson against John Wilsen and others, partners as John Wilsen & Co. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. D. Gregory, for appellant. Geo. Foster Jones, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The Utah Construction Company was made a party defendant, and was sought to be enjoined from paying over certain money to the other defendants. The company paid the money into court, and was no longer interested in the suit, and as to it the action was treated as dismissed. The equitable element of the case being thus eliminated, the remaining issues were within the jurisdiction of this court to which the appeal was taken. The amount of money involved and the definite amount thereof to which plaintiff laid claim appears in the complaint and these amounts are not denied to be correct, the issue presented by the answer being, that plaintiff is entitled only to a certain part, to wit, $275.15, of the sum claimed by plaintiff. Had the case involved an accounting among the copartners and the settlement of the copartnership business, thus requiring the aid of the equitable powers of the court, we would have been without jurisdiction upon direct appeal. Const. art. 6, § 4.

Plaintiff's action is to recover the sum of $1,441.44, as assignee of one John Olsen, as the latter's share of the earnings of an alleged copartnership consisting of defendants, the said Olsen and one Antone Carlson—seven in all. These seven men entered into a written agreement describing themselves therein as "a partnership doing business under the firm name of John Wilsen & Co., the party of the first part," with the Utah Construction Company, party of the second part, bearing date December 1, 1907. By this agreement they—first parties—agreed to do "all the clearing, grubbing, grading, tunneling, masonry, culverts, ditches, creek channels, and such other work connected therewith and rendered necessary thereby as may be required by the engineer in charge of the work," between certain indicated points, "on the line of the said Western Pacific Railroad in the County of Plumas"; the work was to "be commenced at once and shall be entirely completed so as not to delay track laying," and "within the time herein specified." The specifications of the work were attached to this contract, but do not appear in the record. The time fixed for the completion of the work does not appear in the contract, but doubtless was stated in the specifications. It appeared that defendants completed the work "to the satisfaction of the engineer" July 5, 1909. The amount then due from the construction company was $14,384.48. By agreement of the parties all but $2,697.44 was paid to these workmen, and that sum was by like agreement paid into court subject to its decision in this case, of which plaintiff claimed to be entitled to $1,441.44. The court found that the agreement referred to above was entered into about December 1st, but was not reduced to writing and signed until December 21, 1907; that "defendants, John Wilsen & Co., entered into an agreement among themselves, under and by virtue of which, it was mutually agreed, understood, and consented to by all the persons comprising the partnership, that in case any member of said gang or association should quit work during the period of such construction and leave and abandon the same prior to the completion thereof, that the said party so quitting and abandoning the work prior to the completion of the contract, and leaving the gang or association should receive no profits, but only the ordinary going wages received by men employed in work of like character on said construction; less any amounts which had been advanced to said party so quitting work, for supplies or on account of personal expenses during the time he was actually working with said gang or association"; that, "in accordance with said agreement among the said partners, the said Antone Carlson, one of said partners, performed work and labor for 65 days and 5 hours thereon, and left said gang or association, and received wages at the rate of three dollars per day, less his expenses"; that "said John Olsen, also a member of said partnership, worked 231 days only, and on or about the 15th day of August, 1908, ceased to work, abandoned said contract, and did not again return to said work; that the Utah Construction Company advanced to said John Olsen the sum of $417.85 and charged the same to the copartnership of John Wilsen & Co., leaving a balance due the said Olsen of $275.15"; that defendant John Wilsen worked 448 days, Nels Newman 471 days, C. Heiner 458 days, Chris Nelsen 443 days and Andrew Foer 362 days, all of whom last named "worked until the completion of the contract." As conclusion of law the court found that plaintiff was entitled to receive $275.15 and gave judgment accordingly. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff states in his brief that the principal error complained of is the finding as to the agreement made subsequently to the written agreement, i. e., the finding relating to the agreement among themselves as to how the members of the association were to be treated who quit the work before its completion. The claim is that the evidence does not support this finding.

The contention of appellant is that, as a partnership was alleged and shown and no subsequent agreement proven, his rights must be determined by section 2403 of the Civil Code, which reads: "In the absence of any agreement on the subject, the shares of partners in the profit and loss of the business are equal."

There was evidence tending to show that the seven men who entered into the engagement with the Utah Construction Company did so upon an equal footing, each to share equally the profits resulting from the work they undertook to do, nothing having at the start been said as to how a partner would share or be paid in case he quit the job. This question had no practical importance at the beginning as all were supposed to continue working to the completion of their contract. Later this question became a practical one when Antone Carlson quit work after having worked 65 days, and there was evidence that it was then agreed among the remaining members, including plaintiff, that should one quit the work he should be paid $3 per day for his work, and it was the understanding that thenceforward, when one of the number quit work and did not return, he should be paid at the same rate as Carlson was paid and no more. Plaintiff's assignor, Olsen, quit when the work was less than half completed, too sick to work. His illness was of no considerable duration. He was at the camp several times in apparent good health after quitting, but he never thereafter resumed or offered to resume work. His claim now is that he should have shared in the total earnings of the partnership in the proportion which the number of days he worked bore to the whole number of days' work performed by all of the members. The learned trial judge gave him judgment for his days' work at $3 per day, less advances made to him. This, we think, was justified by the evidence.

In the agreement entered into with the construction company, where the laborers were described as a partnership under the name of John Wilsen & Co., nothing appeared as to the terms of the partnership. Undoubtedly it was competent to show what the understanding of the members was as to how they were to share the profits, and this understanding was within their own control and it was not necessary that it should be in writing and could be determined at any time. The evidence as to how Carlson was paid was admitted as tending to show the agreement to have been as claimed by defendants, and, as Olsen was then a member of the association, it was admissible for that purpose, and tended to corroborate the testimony of defendants that the rule adopted in Carlson's case was made the understanding which was to govern should others quit the work. The section of the Code relied upon by appellant does not apply, for it is intended to reach cases in the absence of any agreement relating to the shares of partners in the profit and loss of the business. There was nothing unreasonable or inequitable in the agreement found by the court; on the contrary, it was but just to those who stood by their contract with the construction company to the finish and took the risks of loss in the business that they alone should share whatever profits might result from their fidelity to their obligations.

There was much evidence that the custom among these "section gangs," as they were called, was in accordance with the agreement found by the court, but on plaintiff's motion all evidence relating to custom was stricken from the record and was not considered. The findings were grounded upon the testimony of the members of the partnership association, other than that of Olsen, and was, we think, as to the rights of any who quit work, ample to support the view taken by the trial court.

Appellant's brief is almost entirely devoted to a discussion of the evidence, as to which the most that may be said in his favor is that it is conflicting. It would serve no useful purpose and would needlessly prolong this opinion to undertake an analysis of the testimony in the case.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 1, 1910.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 1158*)—Appeal—Order on Affidavits—Review.

Where an order dismissing an information on affidavits that accused had not been legally committed by a magistrate was appealed from, the appellate court is bound by the same rule that controls where oral testimony is presented for review, and if there is any conflict in the affidavits, those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true and the facts stated therein considered established.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1158.*]

2. Attorney and Client (§ 72*)—Appearance by Attorney—Authority.

In a prosecution against a corporation for alleged violation of the statute prohibiting conspiracy in restraint of trade, affidavits held to warrant a finding that accused had authorized no one to appear in its behalf, and that no one had authority to represent it in proceedings before a committing magistrate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

3. Attorney and Client (§ 72*)—Appearance by Attorney—Authority.

While it is presumed that an attorney appearing and acting for a party to a cause has authority to do so, and the burden rests on the party denying such authority to sustain his denial by a clear preponderance of the evidence, such appearance is not conclusive and the party for whom the attorney appeared may thereafter show that the attorney appeared without authority.

Western Meat Company and from an order setting it aside, the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Chas. Jones, and Eugene S. Wachhorst, Dist. Atty., for the People. L. T. Hatfield and Jesse W. Lilienthal, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is by the people from an order of the superior court of Sacramento county setting aside the information on the ground "that before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate." Section 995, Pen. Code.

The particular infirmity in the proceedings before the magistrate which was urged at the hearing of the motion was set forth by respondent as follows: "That said defendant was never summoned to answer any charge in any court in accordance with the requirements of section 1390 or of sections 1391 to 1396, both inclusive, of the Penal Code of California," and "that said defendant never appeared, either in person or by counsel, before the committing magistrate or any magistrate to answer the charge set forth in the information filed in this proceeding or any other charge." In brief, the reason for urging the dismissal was that defendant had no notice to appear, and that it actually did not appear, either personally or by counsel, at the examination; and hence the committing magistrate had no authority to hold it to answer.

Said section 1390 provides that "upon an information or presentment against a corporation, the magistrate must issue a summons, signed by him, with his name of office, requiring the corporation to appear before him, at a specified time and place, to answer the charge, the time to be not less than ten days after the issuing of the summons." Said section 1391 provides the form of the summons; section 1392, when and how it shall be served; and section 1393 is as follows: "At the appointed time in the summons, the magistrate must proceed to investigate the charge in the same manner as in the case of a natural person, so far as these proceedings are applicable." Other provisions place a corporation, as far as the subsequent steps are concerned, on the same footing as an individual under similar circumstances.

It is admitted that no summons at all was issued, and that no process whatever was served upon the defendant corporation. It is not disputed that if the corporation did not appear, either by its proper officer or by attorney, the court below was justified in setting aside the information. There is no contention that the corporation made an appearance at said examination in any manner except by its attorney. Indeed, the only controversy here is as to whether such an appearance was made, and it is largely a question of fact. The evidence submitted consisted of certain records and affidavits, a summary of which may be necessary for an intelligent disposition of the appeal.

From the records introduced by respondent it appears that the complaint in the justice court charged the Western Meat Company, the Sacramento Butchers' Protective Association, and one J. O'Keefe, jointly, with an offense in restraint of trade, defined in the statute of 1907 commonly known as the Cartwright Act. A warrant of arrest was issued by the justice directed to a peace officer and reciting that a complaint had been filed charging that the crime of conspiracy against trade had been committed and accusing J. O'Keefe thereof and directing said officer to arrest him and bring him before the magistrate. The docket of the justice shows the following entries, among others: "Jan. 25. Warrant of arrest returned and filed, indorsed, served on J. O'Keefe by bringing him in court, Jan. 25. One hundred dollars was deposited by defendant as cash bail. Feby. 3. Demurrer to complaint filed. Feby. 4. Demurrer argued by L. T. Hatfield, attorney for defendant. April 8. This case coming on regularly for hearing this day the following proceedings were had; the people being represented by deputies district attorney F. F. Atkinson, Esq., and J. W. S. Butler, Esq.; the defendant being present with counsel, L. T. Hatfield, Esq. and J. B. Devine, Esq.," etc. The said demurrer purported to be signed "Jesse W. Lilienthal and L. T. Hatfield, attorneys for defendant J. O'Keefe."

The affidavits of L. T. Hatfield and James B. Devine set forth that they were present at all times during the said preliminary examination of the defendant J. O'Keefe, that neither of them appeared for nor was either authorized to appear as counsel for the defendant Western Meat Company; that at the said preliminary examination they repeatedly stated to the court and to the counsel for the prosecution that they appeared solely for the defendant O'Keefe and did not represent any of the other defendants named in the complaint, and that said Western Meat Company was not summoned nor notified to appear at said examination and never appeared thereat at any time, either in person or by any of its officers, employés, or stockholders, or by counsel, and the said company was never arraigned by said magistrate or brought before him for examination. The affidavit of John O'Keefe was to the effect that he was not authorized to appear for said company, that he never employed counsel and never stated to any person that he appeared or was authorized to appear, and as a matter of fact he never did appear or act for said corporation in this proceeding. The affidavit of Leroy Hough, the vice president and general manager of the company, recited that said company was never served with any summons or other process of law in the proceeding; that said company never at any time or in any manner authorized any person to appear for or on its behalf in said justice court, or in any court until the 6th day of July, 1908, four days after a plea of "not guilty" had been entered in behalf of said corporation in the superior court. That on said day, affiant and the members of the board of directors of said corporation received notice that it had been arraigned on the 2d day of July, 1908, and a plea of "not guilty" entered therein, and thereupon said directors by a resolution duly adopted, authorized and empowered attorneys to protect the interests of the corporation; that during the preliminary examination of said O'Keefe affiant was present and testified therein, but it was simply in obedience to a subpœna and not otherwise; that affiant was the only person authorized to employ counsel during the pendency of these proceedings and that the said O'Keefe never had any authority to appear for or on behalf of said corporation.

In opposition to the motion, the affidavits of the committing magistrate, the assistant district attorney, and of the district attorney were received in evidence. In the first, it is denied that counsel for O'Keefe repeatedly stated that he did not appear for respondent, and it is averred that affiant has no recollection of any such statement and during the entire course of said examination he was of the opinion that Messrs. Hatfield and Devine of Sacramento, and Mr. Lilienthal of San Francisco, represented all of the defendants named in the complaint and that he proceeded with the examination upon that theory; that during said examination the said L. T. Hatfield stated: "We want it distinctly understood that we are not appearing for any defendant except Mr. O'Keefe, both the Western Meat Company and Mr. O'Keefe. If there are any other defendants we would like to know it." The affidavit of the district attorney discloses certain statements made by Mr. Devine on an application for a change of venue in the superior court of said Sacramento county in which he referred to himself and Mr. Hatfield as the attorneys of record for the defendants at the preliminary examination, and also the transcript of certain questions asked by Mr. Hatfield of certain witnesses called by him at the preliminary examination, in reference to the connection of the said Western Meat Company with the offense charged in the complaint. The affidavit of Mr. Atkinson, the assistant district attorney, sets forth quite fully the proceedings before the committing magistrate and the superior court, detailing circumstances from which the inference might be drawn that the attorneys for Mr. O'Keefe were acting for respondent herein. But, attaching full significance to the showing made by appellant, we have simply a conflict in the evidence as to whether the Western Meat Company was actually represented by counsel at said preliminary examination. There can be no kind of doubt as to the conclusion from the said affidavits offered on the part of said company that it had authorized no one to appear in its behalf, and as a matter of law no one had any authority to represent it in said proceedings. The rule is well established, as stated in Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 18, 91 Pac. 1001, that "in the consideration of an appeal from an order made upon affidavits, involving the decision of a question of fact, this court is bound by the same rule that controls it where oral testimony is presented for review. If there is any conflict in the affidavits, those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true, and the facts stated therein must be considered established." See, also, Henderson v. Cohen, 10 Cal. App. 580, 102 Pac. 826.

As the court below had the legal right to conclude that the said company was represented at the preliminary examination by no one authorized to appear as its attorney or agent, the only question remaining is whether an attorney, by his appearance for a defendant at a preliminary examination, can prevent an inquiry into his actual authority as such attorney. It seems to be the contention of the Attorney General that the declarations and conduct of Messrs. Hatfield and Devine were binding upon respondent and precluded it from showing to the contrary any want of authority. In other words, a corporation is made a defendant in a criminal case. No summons is issued, and no notice is given to said corporation of the pendency of the proceedings. A preliminary examination is held, it may be without even the knowledge of the officers of said corporation, but an attorney, without authority, announces himself as the representative of the defendant. Can it be said that under such circumstances the defendant is denied the right to show that it has not been actually represented by counsel? The law is not subject to any such reproach. This would be in violation of section 13, art. 1, of the Constitution, providing that "in criminal prosecutions, in any court whatever, the party accused shall have the right to a speedy and public trial; to have the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf, and to appear and defend, in person and with counsel."

The rule, founded in reason and sanctioned by the authorities, is that it is presumed that an attorney appearing and acting for a party to a cause has authority to do so and to do all other acts necessary or incidental to the proper conduct of the case, and the burden of proof rests on the party denying such authority to sustain his denial by a clear preponderance of the evidence. Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 3, p. 375.

A case in point is Merced County v. Hicks, 67 Cal. 108, 7 Pac. 179. There was no service of summons upon any of the defendants but a demurrer was filed by Hicks and signed at his sole request by an attorney without any authority from respondents. The demurrer upon its face purported to be for all of the defendants, but the court said: "We think there was no appearance by the respondents. 'A defendant appears in an action when he answers, demurs, or gives written notice of appearance for him.' Code Civ. Proc. § 1014. But a defendant cannot be said to demur unless he does so in person or by an attorney authorized to represent him."

The cases cited by appellant sustain the position of respondent herein. For instance, in State v. Passaic County Society, 54 N. J. Law, 260, 23 Atl. 680, it is said: "In this case the record shows that Robert I. Hopper, one of the practicing attorneys of this court, appeared and filed a demurrer to the indictment. If he had appeared, knowing that he had no authority to do so, it would have been in contempt of the trial court. His appearance was presumably lawful. Otherwise the trial court should, in all cases where a corporation appears by attorney, require him to establish his right to do so by competent evidence. Such has never been the practice. The burden is on the corporation to show that the appearance was unauthorized. As the record stands, it sufficiently appears that the defendant was in court to answer to the indictment."

Upon the affidavits and testimony thus far considered, we can entertain no doubt that the trial court was justified in its conclusion that the corporation satisfied the requirement of the rule imposing upon it the burden of proof that it was not represented at said preliminary examination, and the order must be sustained. It is only just, however, to say that at the hearing of the motion Mr. Hatfield filed a counter affidavit in which he denied having stated in the justice court that he appeared for respondent, and he disclaimed any purpose or attempt to make it appear that he was authorized to represent, and he averred that he did not, in fact, represent the Western Meat Company at said proceeding. Indeed, a reasonable inference from the entire showing made and which, no doubt, was entertained by the trial court, is, that the attorneys and the justice all acted in good faith, but a mistake was made by the latter in assuming that respondent was represented by counsel.

The counter affidavit to which we have referred was inadvertently omitted from the transcript of the testimony as first certified by the trial judge, and by him it was afterwards allowed as an amendment to said transcript. The appeal was then pending in this court and the contention is made that the court below was without jurisdiction to amend the transcript. Section 1247c of the Penal Code, as added by the Legislature of 1909, provides for a further transcription of the record upon suggestion to the appellate court that such action is necessary. The said section contemplates that the order shall be made by the appellate court and the additional transcription follow. The course pursued here is somewhat irregular, as, after the amendment has been made, we are asked to sanction it, but it is not claimed that said affidavit was not used on the hearing and no prejudice has resulted from the irregularity. While said amendment is not necessary for a determination of the cause, we think it should be made a part of the record, and it is so ordered.

The order setting aside the information is also affirmed.

Whether Hastings College of Law in the University of California created by St. 1877–78, c. 351, as a matter of law has affiliated with the university, as provided by such act, and whether the faculty of the university has granted diplomas to persons applying for admission to the bar thereon, cannot be tried collaterally on such application.

Under St. 1877–78, c. 351, providing that the diploma granted students of Hastings College of the Law in the University of California shall entitle the student to a license to practice in all the courts of the state, subject to the right of the Chief Justice of the state to order an examination as in ordinary cases of applicants without such diploma, it is the duty of the Supreme Court, on application of the students of such college, to license students holding such diplomas to practice as attorneys and counselors in all courts of the state.

In the matter of the application of students of the Hastings College of the Law for admission to practice. Granted.

Thomas I. Bergin, for Directors of College. Edward R. Taylor, for students.

PER CURIAM. Application has been made, on motion of Hon. Edward R. Taylor, dean of Hastings College of the Law, for an order admitting the following named persons to practice as attorneys and counselors at law in all the courts of this state, to wit: Stephen Cornelius Asbill, Gustave Louis Baraty, Edward Ignatius Barry, Absolom Francis Bray, Jr., Harry Alexander Davie, Harry

Under the act to create "Hastings College of the Law in the University of California" (St. 1877–78, p. 533), it is provided that the said college shall affiliate with the university of the state, and shall be the law department of the state university. The act provides: "Sec. 3. The faculty of the university shall grant diplomas to the students of the college, and the president shall sign and issue the diplomas. * * * Sec. 6. The diploma of the students shall entitle the student to whom it is issued to a license to practice in all the courts of this state, subject to the right of the Chief Justice of the state to order an examination as in ordinary cases of applicants without such diploma."

Each of the above-named persons has a diploma signed by the president of the university. We must presume that official duty has been regularly performed, and that the faculty of the university has granted the diplomas in pursuance of the law. We must also presume that the said Hastings College of the Law has affiliated with the university of the state; in fact, the Legislature, by its many appropriations, and by its appropriations for suitable buildings for the law department of said college, has time and time again recognized the Hastings College of the Law as a department of the university. The very title of the act is "To create Hastings College of the Law in the University of California." The questions as to whether or not the said college has, as matter of law, affiliated with the university, and as to whether or not the faculty of the university has granted the diplomas which the said persons hold, cannot be tried collaterally on this application.

It is our duty to grant a license to each of said persons entitling him to practice as an attorney and counselor at law in all courts of this state, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. EDWARDS. (Cr. 146.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 427*)—EVIDENCE—SUBSEQUENT EVENTS.

Defendant and male companion, while driving in the country, overtook two girls who got into the buggy. When they arrived at a bayou defendant's male companion and one of the girls got out of the buggy and went some distance therefrom, whereupon prosecutrix charged that defendant had intercourse with her in the buggy; that thereafter the male companion and the other girl returned and the four drove on for nearly half a mile at which point prosecutrix and the male companion got out of the buggy, proceeded a short distance, where another rape was committed by defendant's male companion on prosecutrix. Held that, in the absence of proof of conspiracy, the rape committed by defendant's companion on prosecutrix constituted a separate substantive event, and was inadmissible as against defendant.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 368*)—EVIDENCE—"RES GESTÆ."

Since res gestæ is matter incidental to a main fact and explanatory thereof, made up of acts and words so closely connected with a main fact as to really constitute a part thereof and without knowledge of which the main fact might not be properly understood, proof of a separate rape alleged to have been committed on prosecutrix by defendant's male companion some time after the offense alleged to have been committed by defendant was complete and at a point some distance therefrom, having no connection therewith, was inadmissible as res gestæ.

Webb Edwards was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. T. Miller, J. R. Dorsey, and Thomas Scott, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape committed by reason of having sexual intercourse with a female under the age of 16 years, she at the time not being his wife. From a judgment pronounced upon the verdict, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

Numerous errors are assigned as grounds for reversal, but we are of opinion that the action of the trial court in admitting, over defendant's objection, evidence of the commission of another rape upon the prosecuting witness by another party on the same day, at a remote place, was erroneous and so prejudicial as to seriously affect defendant's rights. The record discloses that the defendant and another young man started to drive out into the country and overtook two young girls who were walking along the road; that these girls got into the buggy with the young men, the prosecuting witness sitting on the lap of defendant and the other girl on the lap of his companion; that during the drive out into the country defendant took improper liberties with the prosecuting witness; that after they arrived at a point near what is known as Elk Bayou defendant's male companion and the girl who had previously been sitting on his lap got out of the buggy and went some distance therefrom; that thereupon defendant had sexual intercourse with the prosecuting witness while both parties were in the buggy; that thereafter the male companion and the other girl returned, joined the parties in the buggy, which was then driven a distance of nearly half a mile to a point on what is called Woodville road, at which point the girl who had theretofore been sitting on the lap of defendant left the buggy and the male companion also got out of the buggy and the two proceeded a short distance therefrom, where another rape was committed by defendant's male companion upon the prosecuting witness.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The record discloses that but a very small part thereof relates to incidents and transactions connected with the substantive offense with which defendant stood charged; that the major portion of the record is taken up with an account of the rape committed by the male companion of defendant upon the prosecuting witness. Defendant objected to all of the testimony with reference to this offense of the male companion upon the ground that the same was immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant, which objection the court overruled, and permitted the introduction of all the disgusting details connected with the rape of the prosecuting witness by the male companion of defendant. The information charged the defendant alone with the offense. There was no evidence offered, nor was the prosecution conducted, upon the theory that there was any conspiracy or collusion between defendant and his male companion, and even had such condition been shown, all of the criminal acts of the male companion were shown to have been perpetrated long after the offense was committed with which defendant stood charged. It is established law that "the prosecution cannot prove the commission by defendant of other offenses for the purpose of increasing the likelihood that he committed the particular offense with which he is charged"; the exception to this rule being that it may be made to appear in order to show intent. In People v. Lane, 100 Cal. 387, 34 Pac. 859, the following rule laid down by the Supreme Court of Illinois is quoted and approved: "But the general rule is against receiving evidence of another offense, and no authority can be found to justify its admission, unless it clearly appears that such evidence tends in some way to prove the accused guilty of the crime for which he is on trial." And further along in the same opinion there is quoted with approval this language of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania: "If the evidence be so dubious that the judge does not clearly perceive the connection, the benefit of the doubt should be given to the prisoner, instead of suffering the minds of the jurors to be prejudiced by an independent fact, carrying with it no proper evidence of the particular guilt." In People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 168, 65 Pac. 324, Mr. Justice Temple, in speaking for the court in a case involving a similar offense, says: "In this case, as well as in any other, the prosecution must charge a specific offense, and the conviction, if one is had, must depend upon the proof of that offense alone. Other incidents are important only as tending to prove the one specific offense for the alleged commission of which defendant is on trial." These and many other decisions of like import all relate to the proof of substantive offenses by the defendant, but in no case to which our attention has been called has any court justified the admission of a distinct offense by another party, except in instances where the acts and declarations of conspirators are sought to be shown, but acts and declarations even of a conspirator are not admissible after the commission of the crime. We are unable to see how it can be claimed that the acts and conduct of a third party, involving an independent and substantive crime committed after the offense charged against defendant was completed, and at a remote place therefrom, have a logical or necessary connection with the offense charged against defendant. There is no pretense that the defendant was guilty of any criminal act after he left the point near Elk Bayou. If the evidence discloses his guilt it was for the crime there committed, and the admission of the evidence in relation to the conduct of his companion, for which he is not shown to have been in any sense responsible, violates, in our opinion, all the well-established rules.

The Attorney General insists that these acts of the companion were part of the res gestæ, and, therefore, admissible. While the use of the term "res gestæ" has been criticised by eminent authority, it has grown into use as signifying circumstances and declarations which grow out of a main fact, and which are contemporaneous with it and serve to illustrate its character. As said by the Supreme Court of Kansas in Eagon v. Eagon, 60 Kan. 697, 57 Pac. 942: "Res gestæ is matter incidental to a main fact and explanatory of it. It is made up of acts and words which are so closely connected with a main fact as to really constitute a part of it, and without a knowledge of which the main fact might not be properly understood." It is not possible for us to conceive how these acts of the male companion can be regarded as a necessary incident of the criminal act charged against the defendant. We think the action of the court in declaring before the jury, as it did by its implied declaration, that this testimony was competent and material, could have no other effect upon the minds of the jury than to lead them to the conclusion that a rape committed by the companion under the circumstances of this case tended to prove the substantive offense charged against the defendant. The conviction rests almost entirely upon the testimony of the prosecuting witness. The corroborating evidence was not of such a character as to afford much aid to the jury. The defendant was shown to have been a young man of irreproachable character, who denied all of the acts charged, and these things may not be ignored in considering the probable prejudicial effect of the testimony improperly admitted.

We are of opinion that for the error above referred to the judgment and order should be reversed, and that the other errors assigned are not of such a character as to require of necessity a review as affecting the subsequent trial.

Judgment and order reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings.

ATWOOD et al. v. LITTLE BONANZA QUICKSILVER CO. et al. (Civ. 807.)

1. Attachment (§ 62*) — On Promissory Notes—Must Be Payable in This State.

The right to an attachment in any event depends upon the contract being for the direct payment of money, and, to support an attachment, the contract itself must contain some provision indicating that such money was payable in this state.

2. Evidence (§ 441*) — Parol Evidence — Notes—Place of Payment.

Where notes made by a foreign corporation failed to show any place of payment, they were payable in the state of the domicile of the maker under Civ. Code, § 3100, providing that a negotiable instrument which names no place of payment is payable at the residence or place of business of the maker, or wherever he may be found, and hence parol evidence was inadmissible to show an agreement whereby they could be paid in this state, in order to sustain an attachment thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action on attachment by R. A. Atwood and others against the Little Bonanza Quicksilver Company and others. From an order refusing to grant a motion to dissolve the attachment, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Wm. Shipsey, for appellants. Lamy & Putnam, for respondents.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was upon certain negotiable instruments on their face executed by the corporation at Boston, Mass., without definite place of payment therein stated. At the commencement of the action, plaintiffs, by an affidavit filed, alleged that the notes were payable within this state, and other facts requisite in order to procure a writ of attachment. No statements, however, were therein contained as to the residence of defendant corporation. The writ was issued and a motion made to dissolve the same, upon the ground that the instruments were made in another state and were not payable in this state. Upon the hearing of such motion, affidavits were presented by the defendants to the effect that defendant corporation was a foreign corporation, with its principal place of business in Massachusetts; that the members of the board of directors were all residents of said state; that the notes were there executed, copies of which notes were set out in the affidavits. Plaintiffs by certain affidvaits filed sought to show that, notwithstanding the omission to specify the place of payment, it was understood and agreed when said notes were delivered that the same were payable either in Massachusetts or California; that payment thereof was to be made from the proceeds of certain mines being operated by defendant corporation in San Luis Obispo county, this state; that after the execution of the notes defendant corporation filed copies of its articles of association in this state and appointed a person upon whom process might be served, all in conformity with the laws of this state; that other actions had been commenced after the execution of these notes and judgment had thereon against defendant corporation in this state. The court below denied the motion to dissolve, from which order defendants appeal.

It is insisted by respondents that the order of the court denying the attachment rests upon an implied finding that the notes were payable in this state, and there being a conflict in the evidence in that regard, an appellate court will not disturb the same. This would be the true rule were a conflict in the evidence apparent. As the record is presented, however, the question of conflict only arises upon the theory that the evidence offered of a contemporaneous oral agreement was proper for consideration and admissible. It is true that section 3100, Civ. Code, provides: "A negotiable instrument which does not specify a place of payment, is payable at the residence or place of business of the maker, or wherever he may be found." Were it an open question we should be inclined to the opinion that such section was intended to modify a rule declared in many jurisdictions, to the effect that, "where no place of payment is expressed in a note, the place of payment is understood to be where the maker resides"; while in other jurisdictions the rule was, "as between the original parties, however, all debts are payable everywhere, unless some special provision to the contrary is made, and the rule is that debts have no situs but accompany the creditor everywhere." Story on Bills, § 159; Slacum v. Pomery, 6 Cranch, 221, 3 L. Ed. 205. But we are confronted with the construction of such section as applied to attachment proceedings in Tuller v. Arnold, 93 Cal. 168, 28 Pac. 864, where it is said: "The contract, having been made in Illinois, was presumptively to be performed there, and an attachment could not be taken out here, even although it is true in a general sense that the money was payable wherever the defendants could be found. To authorize the issuance of an attachment, the money must have been made payable in this state by the contract itself"—citing authorities. The right to an attachment in any event depends upon the contract being for the direct payment of money, "and it is essential to such right that the agreement itself contain some provision indicating that such money was payable in this state." Drake v. De Witt, 1 Cal. App. 618, 82 Pac. 982; citing, in support, Dulton v. Shelton, 3 Cal. 208; Eck v. Hoffman, 55 Cal. 502. Accepting this as the rule, and the terms of the note being admitted, it follows that no evidence was competent which undertook to change or modify the language of the instrument. Whatever may have been the understanding of the parties as to the place of payment, they are concluded by the terms of their written contract and the legal presumptions attaching thereto, whenever they invoke the attachment laws of this state. No conflict arising, therefore, from competent evidence, we are constrained to hold that as a question of law the writ of attachment should have been dissolved, and that the court erred in denying such motion.

PEOPLE v. HARRISON. (Cr. 145.)

1. Jury (§ 105*)—Trial by Jury—Qualification of Jurors—Bias.

There is no difference in the application of the rule that accused is entitled to an inalienable right of trial by a jury of unbiased and unprejudiced jurors, where the prejudice extends against the defendant individually for some particular cause personal in its nature, or where it exists on account of the offense with which he stands charged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 480, 481; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

2. Jury (§ 133*)—Qualification of Jurors—Actual Bias—Facts.

On a challenge of jurors for actual bias, the trial court is bound to determine the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 595–596; Dec. Dig. § 133.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 1152*)—Jury—Disqualification of Jurors—Review.

In determining a challenge of a juror for actual bias, large discretion is vested in the trial court, and its ruling will be reviewed only in exceptional cases where the evidence on the juror's voir dire examination presents a question of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3056; Dec. Dig. § 1152.*]

4. Jury (§ 105*)—Qualification of Jurors—Actual Bias.

Where a juror in a prosecution for rape testified on his voir dire that his condition of mind was such that he could not fairly and impartially try the case because he had such a prejudice against any one charged with such offense that he could not sit impartially and determine the matter with the same degree of calmness as he could where other offenses were charged; that it would require considerable evidence to overcome his prejudice; and that there would be a certain amount of sympathy for prosecutrix and her family—he was disqualified, as a matter of law, for actual bias, and did not qualify himself by a further statement on cross-examination that he could give defendant the benefit of all reasonable doubt, such statement being mere opinion as to his ability to set aside an admitted prejudice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 480, 481; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

5. Jury (§ 105*)—Qualifications of Jurors—Statutes.

Pen. Code, § 1076, providing that a juror may qualify himself by stating that he can and will try the cause impartially, notwithstanding an opinion previously formed, had no application, where a juror in a prosecution for rape testified that he had such a prejudice against a person charged with such offense that he could not sit impartially and determine the matter without prejudice, and that it would take considerable evidence to remove the prejudice he entertained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 480, 481; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

6. Criminal Law (§ 1166½*)—Disqualifcations of Jurors—Peremptory Challenge—Use—Prejudice.

Where accused was required to use a peremptory challenge to excuse a juror after the court had erroneously overruled a challenge for actual bias, and he was compelled to exhaust his peremptory challenges before the jury was complete, the ruling was prejudicial.

Edward Harrison was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. T. Miller, J. R. Dorsey, and Thomas Scott, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape committed by reason of having sexual intercourse with a female under the age of 16 years, she at the time not being his wife. From a judgment pronounced upon the verdict, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

The Attorney General insists upon a dismissal of the appeal for failure upon the part of defendant to announce in open court his appeal from said judgment and order. The additional and supplemental record filed in this case by leave of court discloses that such notice was actually given in open court at the proper time.

Appellant in an extended brief specifies and presents numerous alleged errors upon the part of the trial court. A careful examination of the record does not warrant us in determining that any prejudicial error appears therein, other than the following:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

One Kinkler was called as a juror and was examined in open court as to his qualifications. Upon such examination he stated that he was the father of five girls; that it would take quite a weight of evidence to overcome his prejudice against a defendant simply because he is charged with the crime of rape; that he would enter upon the trial of such a case with a certain amount of feeling against the defendant; that it would require quite an amount of evidence to remove that feeling; that such feeling would be a kind of prejudice and it would require evidence to remove that; that there would be a certain amount of sympathy go to the family; that there would have to be conclusive evidence that the defendant was innocent; that while his sympathy might not operate to the extent that he would convict a man of rape on less satisfactory evidence than he would convict him of some other crime, the juror was afraid it would be a little that way, to be honest; that he had such a prejudice against one who was charged with the crime of rape that, to an extent, it might lead him to do him an injustice; that he would always give the benefit of the doubt the other way—to the family; that the sympathy he might feel, for instance, for the small girl who it is claimed was the victim, might affect his judgment and might bias him in favor of the prosecution. And when asked by the court: "You think that would be so in any case of that character?" his answer was, "In a certain extent, it would, Judge; honest, I believe it would." And when interrogated as to whether he could approach the decision of a question where rape was involved with the same degree of calmness which he would exercise under similar circumstances where other crimes were involved, answered: "I am afraid not; I am afraid I would be a poor juror on a case of this kind." Thereupon, the court cross-examined the juror, and after a full and complete explanation of the rights of a defendant and the duty of a juror to listen to and follow the instructions of the court, and the presumptions always resting in favor of a defendant, the juror answered that he felt he could give him the benefit of all reasonable doubt. The defendant challenged this juror for cause under subdivision 2 of section 1073 of the Penal Code, which challenge was denied.

It appears from the record that after this challenge was denied, defendant as to Kinkler exercised his ninth peremptory challenge, and later exercised his tenth and last challenge as to another juror. Thereafter, jurors Frame and Snodgrass were sworn to try the case, two other jurors were drawn from the box and sworn on their voir dire, and one thereof, W. H. Bird, was subsequently sworn as a juror to try the cause; and the record contains the following statement: "The defendant, before the jury was completed to try the case, made and was allowed ten peremptory challenges, and requested no more."

The right to unbiased and unprejudiced jurors is an inseparable and inalienable part of the right of trial by jury guaranteed by the Constitution." Lombardi v. California St. Ry. Co., 124 Cal. 313, 57 Pac. 68. We do not recognize any difference in the application of the rule where the prejudice exists against a defendant individually for some particular cause, personal in its nature, or where a like prejudice exists on account of the offense with which he stands charged. The challenge being for actual bias, the trial court was called upon to determine the facts. "Under such circumstances, a large discretion is vested in the trial court, and its ruling is only reviewed by this court in exceptional cases; for it is only when the evidence upon the voir dire examination of the juror presents to this court a question of law that an exception to the disallowance of a challenge for actual bias may be reviewed." People v. Flannelly, 128 Cal. 86, 60 Pac. 671. It will be observed that the juror Kinkler frankly admitted that his condition of mind was such that he could not fairly and impartially try the cause. He conceded frankly that he had such bias and prejudice against any one charged with this offense that he could not sit impartially and determine the matter with the same degree of calmness which he could exercise in cases where other offenses were charged. There is, to our mind, no conflict in the evidence upon the voir dire examination as to the matter of actual prejudice and bias, unless his subsequent opinion upon cross-examination, that he could give the benefit of all reasonable doubt to the defendant, could be so regarded. We regard this cross-examination in the sense of an opinion as to his own ability to set aside an admitted prejudice. The rule permitting a juror to qualify by stating that he can and will try the cause impartially, notwithstanding an opinion previously formed (section 1076, Pen. Code), has no application here. There being, then, in our judgment no conflict in the evidence presented upon the trial of the challenge for cause, the matter is resolved into a question of law, and is strikingly similar to that considered in Quill v. Southern Pacific Co., 140 Cal. 270, 73 Pac. 991. Nor do we regard the case of Graybill v. De Young, 146 Cal. 422, 80 Pac. 619, as establishing a different doctrine; for in the last-mentioned case, as said by the court in the majority opinion, "the answers of the juror tended to show that he would be bound by the evidence," and in that respect it is distinguishable from the case of Quill v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, as well as from the case under consideration. We are, therefore of opinion that, as a matter of law, the court erred in disallowing the challenge to the juror Kinkler, and that such matter is reviewable upon this appeal. This, then, leads us to a consideration of the effect of such disallowed challenge upon the rights of the defendant in respect of his peremptory challenges. We regard People v. Helm, 152 Cal. 534, 93 Pac. 99, as determinative of this question. The fact that defendant was required to exercise one of his peremptory challenges in order to remove Kinkler from the panel was, in effect, restricting his peremptory challenges to nine in number. As said in the case last cited: "It makes no difference in this respect that no challenges for cause were interposed by defendant to any jurors called to the box after the exhaustion of his peremptory challenges had been forced by the improper rulings of the court upon his challenges for cause. It may often happen that a juror most obnoxious to a defendant may successfully pass examination upon his voir dire. That examination may disclose no ground for the interposition of a challenge for cause. Yet there may be some reason known to the defendant which would make it most prejudicial to him that the juror should be retained. Even more, the right to exercise peremptory challenges is absolute. Such a challenge may be exercised upon the mere whim or caprice of defendant; so that again we say that any rulings of a court which compel a defendant to exhaust his peremptory challenges and force him to accept jurors after his challenges have been so exhausted, become the proper subject of review." As said by the Supreme Court of Ohio in the case of Hartnett v. State, 42 Ohio St. 578: "Where, as in this case, the accused does exhaust his peremptory challenges before the jury is impaneled, * * * it cannot be said 'no prejudice resulted to defendant from such erroneous rulings of the court.'" This case cites with approval People v. Weil, 40 Cal. 268, in which case it is held that the practical result of the erroneous disallowance of defendant's challenge for cause was to contract the number of peremptory challenges to which he was entitled and may have been seriously prejudicial to the defendant. This seems to be recognized in other jurisdictions and may be said to be settled law.

We are of opinion that this error of the court in denying defendant's challenge for cause had the effect to deprive defendant of his full right to exercise ten peremptory challenges, and is so prejudicial as to warrant a reversal of the judgment and order.

Judgment and order denying a new trial reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

FAIR v. HOME GAS & ELECTRIC CO.

(Civ. 798.)

1. Pleading (§ 63*)—Statutory Provisions—"Gas."

Even if the word "gas" in St. 1905, c. 435, § 629, requiring a gas company on application to furnish gas, and authorizing recovery of damages for its failure to do so, means gas for lighting purposes, it is enough for a complaint founded thereon to use simply the word "gas," as it will be given therein the same meaning it has in the statute.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3044, 3045.]

2. Gas (§ 13*)—Refusal to Supply Consumer—Action for Damages—Complaint.

The complaint based on St. 1905, c. 435, § 629, requiring a gas company on application of the owner or occupant of a building not more than 100 feet from one of its mains to supply gas therefor, and authorizing recovery of damages for its failure for 10 days to do so, which alleges that from June 26th to July 28th plaintiff was the occupant and inhabitant of a certain building and premises, which "are and were throughout said period" distant not more than 100 feet from one of defendant's mains, that on June 26th defendant connected the building and premises with one of its mains, and supplied gas thereto till July 28th, when it discontinued the supply, and that on July 29th plaintiff demanded in writing of it that it supply him with gas therefor, sufficiently avers, in the absence of anything other than a general demurrer, that at the time of the demand the building and premises were within 100 feet of one of defendant's mains.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by Peter Fair against the Home Gas & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Halsey W. Allen and Campbell & Moore, for appellant. E. C. Campbell, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The complaint alleges the incorporation of defendant and that it is engaged in the business of supplying heating and illuminating gas to the inhabitants of the city of Redlands in San Bernardino county; that between June 26, 1908, and July 28, 1908, plaintiff was the occupant and inhabitant of a certain building and premises in the city of Redlands, which building and premises are and were throughout said period distant not more than 100 feet from one of defendant's gas mains; that on the date first named defendant connected said building and premises with one of its mains, and until July 28th supplied gas to plaintiff for said building and premises; that upon said last-named date, without plaintiff's consent, defendant discontinued the supply of gas to said building, shutting off the same therefrom, without making any demand whatever on plaintiff for the payment of any sum on account of gas theretofore used; that on July 29, August 14, and August 24, 1908, plaintiff made demand in writing of defendant that it supply him with gas for said building and premises; that from July 28th until the filing of the complaint no gas was supplied to said building or premises; that on July 28th and 29th, at the time plaintiff's written demand upon defendant to supply him with gas was made, plaintiff was not in arrears for the payment of gas supplied; that defendant's sole purpose in removing the meter and shutting off the supply of gas was to annoy and injure plaintiff; that defendant demanded of plaintiff a cash deposit or bond of indemnity against loss as a condition of again installing the meter in said premises and supplying gas; that this was an arbitrary discrimination against plaintiff; that no other consumers were required to make a deposit of $10; and that such exaction was to spite, harass, and annoy plaintiff; that from July 28th until the time of the filing of the complaint herein plaintiff resided in said building and premises, and during that time has been without any heating or illuminating gas; that on October 28, 1908, plaintiff demanded of defendant the payment of $50 and $5 per day from August 9, 1908, said sums being damages fixed by law for defendant's failure to supply him with gas; and he asked judgment accordingly.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Defendant denies all the allegations of the complaint other than as to the demand of plaintiff to supply him with gas as averred. Upon the hearing, the court found all the allegations of the complaint to be true, except as to certain allegations which have no significance upon this appeal. The court also found, in conformity with the answer, that another corporation had at all the times mentioned gas mains within 100 feet of said premises and dwelling house of plaintiff, found that at all times service pipes belonging to defendant were connected with defendant's gas mains for supplying plaintiff with gas, and are still located upon said premises. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for $625, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from the date of such judgment. This appeal is from the judgment alone.

Appellant's primary contention is that the complaint is insufficient, in that there is no allegation that the application to defendant was for gas for lighting purposes, and no averment that plaintiff ever made application in writing to defendant to furnish him with gas for lighting purposes, nor any averment that defendant ever refused or neglected to supply gas for lighting purposes. This action is one based upon a statute, the enacting clause of which is as follows: "An act to repeal Title XV of Part IV of Division First of the Civil Code, and to substitute therefor in said code a new title XV, relating to corporations formed for the purpose of furnishing light for public use." St. 1905, p. 592. The statute provides (section 629): "Upon the application in writing of the owner or occupant of any building or premises distant not more than one hundred feet from any main, or direct or primary wire, of the corporation, and payment by the applicant of all money due from him, the corporation must supply gas or electricity as required for such building or premises, and cannot refuse on the ground of any indebtedness of any former owner or occupant thereof, unless the applicant has undertaken to pay the same. If, for the space of ten days after such application, the corporation refuses or neglects to supply the gas or electricity required, it must pay to the applicant the sum of fifty dollars as liquidated damages, and five dollars per day as liquidated damages for every day such refusal or neglect continues thereafter." Conceding for the purposes of this decision that the language in the body of the statute, when it refers to gas, means gas for lighting purposes, nevertheless, the complaint in the action is in the language of the statute. A similar question was presented to the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of Gebhart v. Adams, 23 Ill. 397, 76 Am. Dec. 702, wherein it is held that: "It is a correct rule in declaring upon a statute, to describe the cause of action, whatever it may be, in the words of the statute. Even in criminal cases this is allowed. * * * The court cannot put one construction upon words in a statute, and deny them the same construction when the same words are used in a declaration or plea. The pleader is not bound, in declaring upon a statute, to set forth all or any of the words the court may have used in construing the statute, for when they have placed their construction upon it, and say that it means a particular thing, the words of the statute must be construed to mean the same thing in a declaration on that statute. This is a self-evident proposition." Accepting this rule—and the reasoning upon which it is based is most convincing—the statute under consideration and the complaint based thereon must receive the same construction, and the word "gas," when used in either, shall be held to have a like meaning and a like application. It follows, then, that the averments in the complaint found by the court to be true must be held sufficient under the statute.

We do not think the criticism directed to the allegations of the complaint, because of the alleged omission to aver definitely the location of the house and premises at the time when the demand for gas was made and thereafter, is so serious as to warrant a reversal of the judgment. It is alleged that from June 26 to July 28, 1908, plaintiff was the occupant and inhabitant of the building and premises known as 536 Chestnut avenue, "which said building and premises are and were throughout said period distant not more than one hundred feet from one of defendant's mains." It is further averred "that from June 26, 1908, until the present time plaintiff has resided in said building and premises." The answer admits that at all times mentioned in the complaint service pipes belonging to defendant connected with said gas mains at plaintiff's said premises and residence have been and still are located on said premises. We think a fair construction of the complaint is to say that it avers that the house and premises were at the date of the filing thereof within the required distance, and were so situated during the limited period mentioned. Aside from any distinction which may be said to exist between the effect to be given subdivision 32, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc., in relation to presumptions arising from certain things proven and the presumptions which will follow the allegations of the pleading, the imperfection, if any, in plaintiff's allegation as to the status in the interim is aided by the answer, which, fairly construed, tends to allege a continuance of the status during all the times mentioned in the complaint. The demurrer was general. No uncertainty was claimed as to such complaint, and a consideration of its allegations after judgment leads us to regard it as a sufficient basis for the judgment.

As to the demand, there is no denial thereof in the answer, and the defendant was plainly informed that it was required to perform a duty to which the demand referred. In addition to this, it affirmatively appears by the answer that the refusal to furnish gas was not based upon the insufficiency or uncertainty of the demand, but the reason therefor was plaintiff's refusal to pay an arbitrary and unwarranted claim for $10 deposit, which defendant sought to exact and which it had no right to do. By its answer defendant admitted that conditions were such that it was willing, upon payment of the deposit, to furnish plaintiff with the gas required.

We are of opinion that the complaint alleged and the court found sufficient to entitle plaintiff to recover under the statute, and that the amount of the judgment under the statute was correctly computed.

Judgment affirmed.

MILES v. JUSTICE'S COURT OF PASADENA TP., LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 853.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 20, 1910.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 101*)—JUSTICE'S COURT—TRANSFER OF CAUSE—AFFIDAVIT OF BIAS.

Under Pen. Code, § 1431, providing that, when it appears from the affidavit of defendant that he has reason to and does believe that he cannot have an impartial trial before the justice because of the prejudice of the justice, the cause must be transferred to another justice, the filing of the affidavit does not deprive the justice of jurisdiction to pass on the application and on an unfavorable determination to proceed with the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 204; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

2. CERTIORARI (§ 1*) — GROUNDS FOR ISSUANCE.

A writ of review can only be granted when an inferior tribunal exercising judicial functions has exceeded its jurisdiction and there is no appeal.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1011*)—SUMMARY TRIAL—REVIEW.

Since the filing of an affidavit of prejudice in a criminal case in a justice's court under Pen. Code, § 1431, does not ipso facto deprive the justice of jurisdiction to pass on the application for a transfer, the propriety of his action in denying the application and proceeding with the trial, even if erroneous, is not reviewable by writ of review.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2569; Dec. Dig. § 1011.*]

T. J. Miles was convicted for the violation of an ordinance in the justice's court, and appealed to the superior court, which affirmed the judgment, and he now applies for a writ of review. Writ denied.

Randall & Gaines, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. It is alleged in the petitioner's affidavit that he was charged with the violation of an ordinance of Los Angeles county, claimed to have been committed in Los Nietos township in said county; that defendant was arrested and taken before a justice of the peace in and for Pasadena township, and his cause set down for trial; that petitioner filed an affidavit and motion for a change of venue on the ground that the justice of the peace was biased and prejudiced and interested against him, and he could not have a fair and impartial trial before such justice; that expecting said motion to be granted he did not prepare for trial at the time set, which matter being brought to the attention of the justice he refused, notwithstanding the acquiescence on the part of the prosecuting officers, to continue the trial on account of the absence of the witnesses; that objection was made to proceeding further with the trial because it was claimed that the justice had lost jurisdiction by reason of the affidavit, which objection the justice overruled. It is alleged further that upon the trial he was convicted without the introduction of the evidence necessary in order to establish the offense, and that the court erred in giving certain instructions to the jury; that at the conclusion of the trial the jury found petitioner guilty; that from the judgment pronounced upon such verdict the petitioner appealed to the superior court of Los Angeles county; that upon the hearing of such appeal the judgment was by the superior court affirmed; and this writ is sought to review and annul the judgment of said justice.

The theory of petitioner is that the same effect should be given to section 1431 of the Penal Code as is given to section 833 of the Code of Civil Procedure, namely, that upon the filing of an affidavit showing bias and prejudice the justice must transfer the cause, and that he is without jurisdiction further to act. In the case of Lowrey v. Hogue, 85 Cal. 602, 24 Pac. 995, a distinction is drawn by our Supreme Court as between the two sections, and in which it is held that in a criminal action upon the facts stated in the affidavit the court is called upon to determine whether the reasons given support the conclusion, and for any abuse of discretion shown in relation thereto the defendant has a speedy and adequate remedy by an appeal to the superior court. In Ex parte Wright, 119 Cal. 401, 51 Pac. 639, a construction of section 1431 of the Penal Code is given, in which it is said the refusal of the justice to change the place of trial may have been error, and, if so, the prisoner has an ample remedy by appeal, but the justice did not exceed his jurisdiction in proceeding to trial after overruling the motion for a change of venue. This writ of review can only be granted when an inferior tribunal exercising judicial functions has exceeded its jurisdiction and there is no appeal. From the action of the court, either in passing upon the motion for a change of venue, or in determining the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant a conviction, or in charging the jury as to the law of the case, the justice was acting within his jurisdiction, and for errors committed in its exercise this writ will not lie.

Writ denied.

BAUME v. MORSE. (Civ. 820.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 23, 1910.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 106*)—CONTRACT FOR SALE OF LAND—SUFFICIENCY OF WRITING.

A writing as follows: "Received of Samuel Baume forty dollars deposit on 5 acres in Compton. Good till the first of Nov. 1908," signed by the vendor, is not enforceable as a contract for the sale of land, because not naming the purchase price and embracing a description not sufficiently definite.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 210, 211; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

2. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 47*)—APPLICATION OF STATUTES.

Civ. Code. § 3402, providing that a contract may be first revised and then specifically enforced does not apply to an action on a contract for sale of land, insufficient under the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 197; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 442*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—ADDING TO WRITTEN CONTRACT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, providing that when an agreement is reduced to writing, no other evidence of the terms thereof can be shown, with immaterial exceptions, no new terms can be introduced by parol into a written contract for sale of land, insufficient under the statute of frauds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon F. Moss, Judge.

Action by Samuel Baume against M. E. Morse. From a judgment of nonsuit and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Will D. Gould, for appellant. Willis & Robinson, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Action to enforce specific performance of contract to convey real estate. The answer admitted an agreement to convey, but alleged that the purchase price was another and different sum from that alleged in the complaint, and also that the contract was oral. A nonsuit was granted at the close of plaintiff's case and judgment entered thereon; and plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only instrument in writing which was pleaded or introduced in evidence to support plaintiff's cause of action was as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., Oct. 6, 1908.

"Received of Samuel Baume forty dollars deposit on 5 acres in Compton. Good till the first of Nov. 1908.

"$40. Mrs. M. E. Morse."

It is urged as grounds for a reversal of the judgment that the trial court erred in not accepting this writing as a sufficient note or memorandum in writing to satisfy the provisions of section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and to meet the requirements of subdivision 6 of section 3390 of the Civil Code, as a certain statement of the precise act to be done.

The essentials to an enforceable contract to sell real estate are, that it, or a memorandum or note of its terms, shall be in writing; that such writing shall declare with certainty the party who sells, the party who buys, the price to be paid, and a description of the property sold by which it can be known or identified. Breckinridge v. Crocker, 78 Cal. 535, 21 Pac. 179; Craig v. Zelian, 137 Cal. 106, 69 Pac. 853. Measured by these essentials, we find the receipt for the $40 deposit, here introduced, lacking in the two respects last mentioned. No purchase price is named therein, and the description given is not sufficiently definite to justify a court of equity in enforcing the conveyance of any property. The offer to supply the other alleged terms of the contract by parol was properly denied by the trial court. There was no cause of action for revision stated in the complaint, and section 3402 of the Civil Code, cited by appellant, has no application to this case. When an agreement is reduced to writing the writing is to be considered as containing all the terms of the contract, and no other evidence of the terms of the agreement will be admitted. Section 1856, Code Civ. Proc. No new terms can be introduced into the contract by parol. Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 585, 96 Pac. 319; Bradford Inv. Co. v. Joost, 117 Cal. 204, 48 Pac. 1083; Bd. of Education v. Grant, 118 Cal. 44, 50 Pac. 5. The judgment of nonsuit was properly granted.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 907*)—JUDGMENT ROLL—EVIDENCE—FINDINGS—PRESUMPTION.

Where an appeal is on the judgment roll, and the transcript fails to show a motion for a new trial, and the evidence is not brought up, the appellate court is bound to assume that the evidence was sufficient to support the findings.

2. INSURANCE (§ 819*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT—DEATH—EVIDENCE—ABSENCE.

Where, in an action on a benefit certificate, plaintiff relied on absence for more than seven years to raise a presumption of death, she was bound to show, in addition to such absence, diligent effort to locate insured, and that she had made inquiries in all places where he might reasonably be expected to be found, if alive, and had exhausted every source of information without avail.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Kate V. Brown against the Grand Lodge of Ancient Order of United Workmen of California. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

D. J. Hirshberg, for appellant. Charles A. Shurtleff and Robert B. Gaylord, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action based upon a benefit certificate issued by the defendant to the husband of the plaintiff, by the terms of which, upon the husband's death, the defendant agreed to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $2,000.

The plaintiff's husband, Willis F. Brown, disappeared in October, 1900, and had not been heard from for more than seven years when this action was brought. In the trial court judgment went for the plaintiff, and this appeal, according to the notice thereof, is from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The appeal from the judgment is based on the sole ground that the evidence does not support the findings. The only record on appeal, however, is the judgment roll, i.e., the complaint, answer, findings, and judgment. No evidence has been brought up, and the transcript also fails to show that any motion for a new trial was ever made. In this condition of the record we are bound to assume that the evidence was sufficient to support the findings. And upon examination of the findings it is apparent that they support the judgment.

Giving full force to the authorities cited to sustain appellant's position, that in addition to the absence of an individual for seven years it must also appear that a diligent effort has been made to locate the absentee, still we cannot perceive how this aids appellant, for the court found that plaintiff had made inquiries in all places where her husband might reasonably be expected to be found if alive, and that she had also exhausted every source of information in her efforts to locate him, but all without avail.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Thos. F. Greeley, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Maxwell McNutt, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the People.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment against defendant, and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Defendant upon a previous trial was convicted, and upon appeal from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial, this court reversed the judgment, but failed to expressly or in terms dispose of the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial. Neither did this court upon the former appeal expressly order a new trial nor direct the discharge from custody of the defendant. Pen. Code, § 1262; People v. Ballard, 1 Cal. App. 222, 81 Pac. 1040. Upon the calling of the case for trial after the going down of the remittitur, defendant objected to the trial proceeding, upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to proceed, no new trial having been ordered by the appellate court. This objection was overruled and the trial proceeded. Defendant now contends that because this court failed to order a new trial upon reversing the former judgment the trial court should have dismissed the action.

We think the point has been disposed of adversely to defendant's contention by the decision of the Supreme Court, to which he applied for a discharge from custody upon habeas corpus. Ex parte Ballard, 149 Cal. 114, 84 Pac. 833. The court pointed out that where, as in this case, the appellate court reverses a judgment without either ordering a new trial or directing the discharge of the defendant, such action is evidently the result of inadvertence and of a temporary forgetfulness of the provisions of section 1262, Pen. Code, and that in such case the remedy of the defendant would be a motion in such court for an order directing such discharge. If such motion had been made this court could have made a proper order disposing of the case. As it appears that the judgment upon the first appeal was reversed for a cause that required the granting of the motion for a new trial, this court could, and doubtless would, if its attention had been called to the fact that it had failed to dispose of the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, have made an order reversing such order. This in effect would have been the ordering of a new trial. People v. Hardisson, 61 Cal. 378. The judgment of conviction having been reversed, and this court not having ordered the discharge of the defendant or a dismissal of the action, the trial court had jurisdiction to proceed with a new trial.

It is also contended that the court erred in overruling the objection of defendant to the reading in evidence the deposition of an absent witness taken on the preliminary examination of the defendant. It is not claimed upon this appeal, as it was upon the former appeal, that it had not been sufficiently shown that the witness could not be found. The record before us shows that the testimony of the absent witness was read from a transcript of such testimony taken before the police court, and of course then present in court. It is now urged that it does not appear that the witness who gave the testimony was sworn. No such objection was made before the trial court. The objection simply was that the testimony was "immaterial, irrelevant, incompetent, and hearsay." If in fact the transcript from which the district attorney read did not show that the witness gave the testimony under oath, and if the real point of the objection was that the witness was not sworn, it was the duty of counsel to specifically make the objection upon that ground. By the general objection that the evidence was "incompetent and hearsay," the court was not informed of the point now urged in this court. If it had been, doubtless the record would clearly show whether or not such witness was sworn at the preliminary examination. The record does not show that he gave his testimony without objection from defendant, who was there represented by the same counsel who represents him now, and that the witness was cross-examined by such counsel. Under such circumstances we do not think that the objection now urged was presented by the objection actually made to the trial court.

No other point is made for a reversal, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

Ex parte COOK. (Cr. 135.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 14, 1910.)

1. ESCAPE (§ 5½*)—STATUTE IN REGARD TO—POWER OF LEGISLATURE.

The invalidity of Pen. Code, § 105, making it a crime "to escape" from prison, does not affect the validity of section 106, making it a crime to "attempt to escape," as the Legislature has the power to make the "attempt" a crime, and the "escape" not a crime.

2. ESCAPE (§ 13*)—ATTEMPT—FAILURE TO PRESCRIBE PENALTY—DEFECT CURED BY ANOTHER STATUTE.

The fact that Pen. Code, § 106, providing that it is a felony to attempt to escape from prison, fails to prescribe a penalty does not prevent a conviction thereunder, as the omission is supplied by section 18, providing that except where a different punishment is prescribed, every felony is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years.

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 190*) — OFFENSES INCLUDED IN CHARGE—ATTEMPTS —ESCAPE—"ESCAPING."

An indictment for "escaping" from prison, made a felony by Pen. Code, § 105, will support a plea of guilty of an "attempt to escape," made a felony by section 106; the former necessarily including the latter.

In the matter of the application of Carroll Cook for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of Charles Murray. Application for the writ denied.

A. S. Newburgh and Carroll Cook, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, for the People.

HART, J. The contention of the petitioner is that Murray is now restrained of his liberty by the warden of the state prison at Folsom upon a commitment issued under a void judgment; that such restraint is therefore illegal, and that the prisoner is entitled to be released therefrom through the writ of habeas corpus.

It appears that, while undergoing a sentence of imprisonment for the term of 10 years in the state prison at Folsom, and before the expiration of said term, Murray, on the 17th day of May, 1904, escaped from said prison; that, subsequently, he was apprehended, and that thereafter the grand jury of Sacramento county returned to the superior court of said county an indictment purporting to charge him with the crime of escaping from state prison, as defined by section 105 of the Penal Code. Upon his arraignment upon this indictment, Murray entered a plea of not guilty. Subsequently, however, on December 8, 1904, he withdrew said plea to said indictment and entered a plea, under the allegations of the same indictment, of guilty of the crime of attempting to escape. Thereupon the court sentenced the prisoner to a term of three years in the state prison at Folsom, the term of imprisonment therefor to commence "from the time such convict would otherwise have been discharged from said prison." Section 106, Pen. Code.

If allowed under his first sentence the credits to which, upon certain conditions, he would be entitled under the terms of section 1588 of the Penal Code (Deering's Ed. 1909), Murray would now be entitled to his discharge but for the sentence or judgment of imprisonment pronounced and entered against him on his plea of guilty of the crime of attempting to escape from said prison.

The claim of the petitioner on behalf of the prisoner is that the indictment failed to state a public offense, because of the alleged invalidity of section 105 of the Penal Code, under which said indictment was framed, and that therefore "all proceedings thereafter had were void as being beyond the jurisdiction of the court." The argument upon this point is that if the provisions of section 105 of the Penal Code are in violation of the state and federal Constitutions, as is the contention, then the indictment, being based upon said section, necessarily failed to state any offense of whatsoever nature. In other words, the claim is that if the indictment does not charge the crime of "escaping from the state prison," it cannot charge the crime of "attempting to escape from state prison," for, so the argument goes, an attempt to commit an act which, when consummated, is not a crime, cannot itself be a crime.

Section 105 of the Penal Code reads as follows: "Every prisoner confined in the state prison for a term less than for life, who escapes therefrom, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for a term equal in length to the term he was serving at the time of such escape; said second term of imprisonment to commence from the time he would otherwise have been discharged from said prison." The indictment challenged here is substantially in the language of the foregoing section, and there is no claim that, if said section is not out of harmony with certain provisions of the state and federal Constitutions, the allegations of said indictment do not properly set forth a public offense.

The validity of the section of the Code under which the indictment was framed is attacked upon the ground that the punishment therein prescribed is such as that it operates with manifestly unjust and unwarranted inequality upon prisoners adjudged guilty of escaping from prison, and that, consequently, the section is in direct conflict with the terms of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, guaranteeing to all the equal protection of the law, and with certain provisions of the state Constitution, among which is the provision that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, etc.

This position, while new in this state, has been sustained in other jurisdictions upon what I conceive to be unanswerable reasoning. State v. Lewin, 53 Kan. 679, 37 Pac. 168; In re Mallon, 16 Idaho, 737, 102 Pac. 374, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1123; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. v. Missouri, 120 U. S. 68, 7 Sup. Ct. 350, 30 L. Ed. 578. But, conceding that section 105 of the Penal Code is invalid for the reasons suggested, we are nevertheless of the opinion that the indictment stated the offense defined by section 106 of the Penal Code, which provides: "Every person confined in the state prison for a term less than for life, who attempts to escape from such prison, is guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, the term of imprisonment therefor shall commence from the time such convict would otherwise have been discharged from said prison."

It is thus to be seen that the Legislature, by the terms of the foregoing section, has declared as a distinct offense, entirely apart from and in no manner or degree or to any extent whatsoever dependent for its force or vitality on the provisions of section 105, the act of attempting to escape from such prison. In other words, section 106 receives no vital force from the provisions of section 105. No one will for a moment question or doubt the power and the right of the Legislature to denounce the act of attempting to escape from a prison as a crime, regardless of whether it makes the act of actually escaping from such prison a crime. The Legislature has declared that any prisoner confined in a state prison for a term less than for life who attempts to escape from such prison is guilty of a felony, and if the Legislature has for any reason failed to declare it a crime for such prisoner to effect his escape from such prison, this mere omission cannot of itself in any measure or in any sense render the act of attempting to escape any the less a crime. Of course, if the Legislature had not made the act of attempting to escape from a state prison itself a specific and distinct crime, then the position of counsel for the prisoner would be unimpeachable, assuming that section 105 is void. But, as seen, the crime of attempting to escape is as distinct from the crime of escaping as grand larceny is from robbery, although, as is true as to the two last-named offenses, the first two necessarily possess, in some respects, the same elements.

It follows from views thus far ventured that there can be no merit in the suggestion that, if section 105 is void, there can be no penalty imposed in the case of the violation of section 106. The penalty prescribed by the last-mentioned section is entirely different from that which section 105 pretends to authorize. Section 106 declares the act therein described to be a felony, but does not expressly prescribe the penalty for the commission thereof. No difficulty, however, results from this omission, since the Penal Code elsewhere (section 18) provides that "except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by this Code, every offense declared to be a felony is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years," and thus a penalty for the act denounced by section 106 is as clearly and definitely fixed and prescribed as if the language of section 18 had been expressly referred to by section 106. The Legislature, in other words, has itself made section 18 a part of section 106, so far as the penalty is concerned.

The remaining question is, Did the indictment state the crime defined by section 106 of the Penal Code, and to which the prisoner entered a plea of guilty? As before stated, the allegations of the indictment are substantially in the language of section 105 of the Penal Code and attempted to charge the prisoner with the crime of escaping from a state prison. Necessarily the crime of attempting to escape from the state prison is included within the act of escaping from said prison, for, manifestly, one could not escape without first making the attempt to escape, and if, as counsel undertake to maintain, there be no such crime as "escaping from a state prison," the charge that the prisoner attempted to escape is, of necessity, included, if not within any crime alleged, within the language by which the alleged crime of "escaping," etc., is set forth in the indictment.

We do not intend to be understood as saying that if the only offense sought to be charged against the prisoner was that of an attempt to escape from a prison, the indictment would not have been compelled to yield to the claims of a demurrer; but there was no demurrer, and therefore whatever defects might characterize the statement of the offense to which the prisoner pleaded guilty were waived by said plea. His plea, in other words, amounted to an admission that the offense of which he thus confessed his guilt was within the language of the indictment. As is said in Re Myrtle, 2 Cal. App. 383, 84 Pac. 335, the indictment, taken with the plea of the prisoner, establishes a case of attempt to escape from a prison as completely as if it had in fact been specifically alleged in the indictment that the prisoner had made an attempt to escape. As we have stated, an attempt to escape is necessarily charged by the statement that the prisoner did escape, and thus the court, after the plea of guilty, was clothed with full power and jurisdiction to pronounce and cause to be entered the judgment upon which the prisoner is suffering the restraint of which he here complains.

We doubt not that the court had jurisdiction to accept the plea of the prisoner and thereupon to pronounce the challenged judgment.

The writ will therefore be discharged, and the prisoner remanded to the warden of the state prison.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

LYNAM v. VORWERK. (Civ. 743.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 30, 1910.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 262*)—PROPERTY ACQUIRED AFTER MARRIAGE—"COMMUNITY PROPERTY"—PRESUMPTION.

The fact that a husband and wife are in possession of money after their marriage raises a presumption that it was acquired after marriage and constitutes "community property" under Civ. Code, § 164, declaring that all property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife is community property.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 249*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—JOINT DEPOSIT—"JOINT INTEREST."

Where a husband and wife deposited money in a savings bank in their joint names and accepted in lieu thereof a passbook and writing reciting that the money should be paid on demand of either producing the book, the deposit was community property, and not owned by them as joint tenants, under Civ. Code, § 683, defining a "joint interest" as one owned by several persons in equal shares, by a title created by a single will or transfer, when expressly declared to be a joint tenancy or when granted or devised to executors or trustees as joint tenants.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 249*)—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—DEPOSIT—JOINT OBLIGATION.

Civ. Code, § 1431, provides that a right created in favor of several persons is presumed to be joint and not several, except in certain special cases. Held, that such section was inapplicable to an instrument, signed by a husband and wife at the time of making a deposit in a savings bank, directing the bank to pay the deposit to whichever of them should demand the same and produce the book, since such writing did not create a right in favor of the husband and wife for the money, but was mere authority to the bank as to paying the deposit on surrender of the passbook.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Emma L. Lynam, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Gottlieb Damkroeger, against Ernest Vorwerk, as executor of the estate of Karolina Damkroeger, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

COOPER, P. J. This is an appeal from the judgment in favor of plaintiff for $1,646.20, with interest, and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The plaintiff is the administratrix of the estate of Gottlieb Damkroeger, deceased, and the defendant is the executor of the will of Karolina Damkroeger, deceased. The facts of the case are undisputed, and raise a question of law as to the title to the money for which judgment was given. On September 29, 1899, Gottlieb and Karolina Damkroeger were, and for several years prior thereto had been, husband and wife, and had money on deposit with the German Savings & Loan Society in their joint names. In connection with the said deposit account there appears the following: "7850. San Francisco, September 29, 1899. The German Savings and Loan Society, pay all or any sum or sums that are now or may hereafter be deposited with you by us, and entered in passbook number 124,097, to whichever of us, the undersigned, shall demand and receipt for the same and produce said book. Karolina Damkroeger. Gottlieb Damkroeger." It was admitted that the writing contained the correct signatures of both husband and wife. There was no evidence other than as herein stated as to the source from which the money came, or as to its being the common, joint, or separate property of either husband or wife. Gottlieb, the husband, died in April, 1903, leaving Karolina surviving him. After her husband's death Karolina withdrew the deposit. She qualified as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, but never accounted for the moneys so withdrawn by her as any part of the assets of his estate. In January, 1907, she died, and this action was afterwards brought against the executor of her last will and testament.

The plaintiff relied upon the provisions of section 164 of the Civil Code, which declares that all property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife (except that acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent (section 163, Civ. Code) is "community property." The section expressly provides that all property acquired by either husband or wife after marriage is community property. The property (money) was in the possession of the husband and wife long after their marriage, and was by them jointly deposited in the bank. Does the fact that the husband and wife are in possession of money after their marriage raise a presumption that it was acquired after such marriage? In our opinion it does. The relation of husband and wife as to their property is somewhat in the nature of a partnership, where there is usually partnership property and the separate property of the copartners. If the copartners should jointly go to a bank and deposit money in their joint names, it seems, in the absence of other evidence, that the most reasonable inference would be that the money was the joint money of such copartners, and that, being in their possession as such copartners, it would be presumed to have been acquired by the copartnership. In fact, usually and in most cases where money, or property is in the possession of the husband or wife or both after marriage, it has been acquired after marriage. This is a matter of common knowledge. Of course such possession raises only a presumption, which may be overcome by evidence as to the facts; but in the absence of such evidence the presumption is sufficient. It has been held that the possession of money by either or both husband and wife after marriage, in the absence of other evidence, raises a presumption that it is community property. In Fennell v. Drinkhouse, 131 Cal. 447, 63 Pac. 734, 82 Am. St. Rep. 361, it was so held. The court there said: "All of the money found in the bank and received by the said administrator was deposited after the marriage of plaintiff and Mrs. Fennell, and the presumption therefore was, in the absence of other evidence, that all of it was community property, and the burden of proof was upon appellant. This presumption can be overcome by evidence of a clear, certain, and convincing character establishing the contrary, and the burden of this showing rested with the parties claiming the separate character of the property. In the absence of such proof, the presumption as to the community character was absolute and conclusive." To the same effect, see Denigan v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Society, 127 Cal. 137, 59 Pac. 389; Denigan v. San Francisco Sav. Union, 127 Cal. 142, 59 Pac. 390, 78 Am. St. Rep. 35; Rowe v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Society, 134 Cal. 403, 66 Pac. 569; Freese v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Society, 139 Cal. 392, 73 Pac. 172.

The appellant contends that the writing given to the bank had the effect to create a joint tenancy in the husband and wife, with the right of survivorship. In our opinion such contention is not plausible. It is provided in Civ. Code, § 683: "A joint interest is one owned by several persons in equal shares, by a title created by a single will or transfer, when expressly declared in the will or transfer to be a joint tenancy, or when granted or devised to executors or trustees as joint tenants." The writing given to the German Savings & Loan Society was merely an authority to the bank to pay the amount entered in the passbook to either of the parties in whose name the deposit was made. The title to the money was not created by a will or transfer, nor was it granted to executors or trustees as joint tenants. Neither does section 1431 of the Civil Code aid appellant. The writing given to the bank did not create a right in favor of the husband and wife to the money. As before stated, it was a mere authority to the bank as to paying the deposit on surrender of the passbook. See Denigan v. San Francisco Sav. Union, supra.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BECK v. SCHMIDT. (Civ. 812.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 18, 1910.)

1. Work and Labor (§ 14*)—Effect of Express Contract—Breach—Right of Action.

Where, after work was begun and materials furnished under a contract, the other party failed to make the payments agreed, the contractors who had not failed to comply with the contract on their part could refuse to proceed, and their assignees could sue for the reasonable value of the work theretofore done and materials furnished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. §§ 29-33; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 695*)—Record—Absence of Evidence.

In the absence of the contract in question and of any evidence as to its provisions in the record on appeal, no objection can be urged that findings that defendant had not complied with its terms were not supported by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2911-2915; Dec. Dig. § 695.*]

3. Appeal and Error (§ 1071*)—Harmless Error—Findings.

In an action for work done and material furnished under a contract terminated by plaintiff for defendant's alleged breach thereof, error, if any, in a finding that provisions as to payment in the original written contract had been modified by parol, was harmless where the court found that defendant had failed to comply with the written contract, and that the other party thereto and his assignees did comply with it up to the time that they ceased work thereunder because of defendant's breach.

4. Pleading (§ 9*)—Contracts—Conclusion of Law—"Due and Owing."

In an action for the value of work done and materials furnished under a contract terminated by plaintiff for defendant's alleged breach thereof, the complaint in direct terms alleging nonpayment of the sum sued for was not insufficient because not alleging that such sum was "due and owing," such words constituting a mere legal conclusion from the use of which, at most, and then only in the absence of a demurrer, the fact of nonpayment might be implied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by George W. Beck against Fred Schmidt. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

SHAW, J. Action by plaintiff as the assignee of Franklin & Drain, constituting a copartnership, to recover upon quantum meruit for labor done and materials furnished at defendant's instance and request in grading and improving a certain tract of land owned by defendant. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant prosecutes this appeal.

It is alleged in the complaint that the reasonable value of the work done and materials furnished was the sum of $51,095.74, upon which defendant paid $31,954.30 and no more, leaving a balance unpaid of $19,141.44, for which plaintiff asks judgment. In defense of the cause of action, defendant by his answer avers that the work was done and the materials furnished pursuant to a written contract made between defendant and said copartnership of Franklin & Drain, by the terms and provisions of which it was agreed that said work was to be performed as a whole, but at prices therein stipulated for each class of work, and the whole completed by December 15, 1906. Defendant further avers that neither the contract price nor the reasonable value of the labor done and materials furnished is in excess of $40,000, upon which he had paid $31,954.30, and denies that any balance remains due and unpaid by defendant for and on account of said work. It is further alleged that by said contract it was agreed that 25 per cent. of the value of the labor performed and materials furnished in doing the work should be reserved and not paid until 35 days after the expiration of the time for completion and acceptance of the whole of said work; that neither said contractors nor any one for them have performed the whole work agreed to be done and performed, and that to complete the same will require an expenditure by defendant of $5,000 over and above the contract price; that by reason of said failure to perform the contract in accordance with its terms defendant has been damaged in the sum of $25,000.

The court made findings as to the reasonable value of the work done and materials furnished, the amount paid thereon, and the balance remaining due and unpaid. In response to the affirmative allegations of the answer, the court found that Franklin & Drain, plaintiff's assignors, entered into a contract with defendant for the improvement of the tract of land, and pursuant to the terms and provisions thereof entered upon the performance of the work. It also found that by an oral agreement between the parties the contract was thereafter modified, in that the time for completion of the work was extended and provision made for making the payments other than as stipulated in the contract; that defendant neither complied with the terms of the written contract nor with the modification thereof; that plaintiff and his assignors did not refuse to complete the construction of the work mentioned in the contract or fail to comply with the terms thereof on their part, but did, on September 28, 1907, by reason of defendant's neglect and failure to make the payments pursuant to the terms and provisions of the contract, consider and treat the same terminated and refused to proceed further in the prosecution of the work thereunder. These facts, if true, clearly justified the contractors in refusing to proceed further with the performance of the work and entitled their assignee to maintain an action for the reasonable value of the work theretofore done and materials furnished. Defendant contends, however, that certain of these findings are not supported by the evidence. It is insisted that there is no evidence tending to prove a modification of the contract, and likewise a want of any evidence tending to prove that defendant failed to comply with the provisions of the contract, either as originally made or as claimed to have been modified. The contract was introduced in evidence, and the court made acquainted with its terms and conditions. It is not, however, incorporated in the bill of exceptions, or otherwise brought up in the record; nor is there any evidence touching the terms and provisions thereof. There is evidence as to what the parties did, but the record is wholly silent as to what they were required to do under the terms and provisions of the contract. It is therefore impossible for us to say that the evidence was insufficient to show a breach of the contract on the part of defendant, or to support the finding that plaintiff and his assignors fully complied with the contract on their part.

The record discloses evidence to the effect that after the work had been prosecuted for some months, during which time the payments, so far as made, appear to have been in accordance with estimates furnished monthly by an engineer, it was agreed to dispense with these estimates and defendant was to make weekly payments sufficient to meet the payrolls of the men employed by the contractors, and at the end of each month make payments in amount sufficient to meet other necessary expenses incurred in the performance of the work and furnishing the materials therefor. It also tends to prove that defendant in making the payments was in arrears practically from the commencement of the work. On September 16, 1907, plaintiff served notice upon defendant to the effect that, owing to his neglect and failure to pay the several amounts as they became due, it would be impossible to further prosecute the work, and, unless payment was made, he would abandon the work. Notwithstanding this notice, defendant refused to make a payment of $120 required to meet the payroll on September 28, 1907, whereupon plaintiff ceased work.

The court finds that the time for completion of the work as fixed in the contract was extended by the oral agreement. The contract is not before us, and the time fixed therein may have been at a date subsequent to the ceasing of work by plaintiff. There is some evidence tending to prove that the time was extended. Franklin testifies: "There was an absolute promise made by Mr. Schmidt that we were to be granted all the necessary time to complete that work." We cannot say that the expression "that work" did not refer to the whole work to be done under the contract, instead of additional work required in the sloping of embankments. Considering the conditions under which the work was done, it seems to have been prosecuted with reasonable diligence. There is also evidence tending to show that defendant was in arrears in making payments during the period covered by the months of June, July, and August. In the absence of the written contract or any evidence as to its terms and provisions, we cannot say that the findings complained of are not supported by the evidence.

Furthermore, conceding the finding as to the modification of the contract to be unsupported by the evidence, nevertheless, it became harmless in view of the fact that the court found that defendant failed to comply with the written contract, and that plaintiff and his assignors did comply with it on their part up to September 28th, when, owing to the breach of contract by defendant, they ceased work thereunder. As to the finding in this regard, no objection can be urged that it is not supported by the evidence, for the reason, as hereinbefore stated, the contract was before the trial court and it is not embodied in the record on appeal.

What is here said sufficiently disposes of the contention that defendant's motion for nonsuit should have been granted. There was no error in denying the motion.

A number of assignments of error are predicated upon rulings of the court made in excluding answers to questions put by defendant. The evidence sought to be elicited by these questions all pertained to damages alleged to have resulted from the contractors' failure to complete the work within the time specified in the contract. There is nothing in the record, however, from which it can be determined that the court erred in making such rulings.

Appellant contends that the amended complaint failed to state a cause of action by reason of the fact that it is not alleged that the amount sued for is "due and owing." In view of the fact that the complaint formally and in direct terms alleged nonpayment, no good purpose could be subserved by inserting words constituting a mere legal conclusion, and from the use of which, at most, and then only in the absence of a demurrer, the fact of nonpayment might be implied. Penrose v. Winter, 135 Cal. 289, 67 Pac. 772.

The record discloses no prejudicial error, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MARTIN et al. v. CONDREY. (Civ. 643.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 114*)—PLEADING—REQUISITES.

Adequacy of consideration and justness and reasonableness of the contract which Civ. Code, § 3391, makes prerequisite to specific performance, must be pleaded as well as proven; and hence a complaint to specifically perform a contract to convey is insufficient where it fails to plead such essentials.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 356–372; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; J. S. Beard, Judge.

HART, J. This is a suit in equity for the reformation and specific performance of a certain contract entered into between one E. Tubbs and the defendant for the conveyance to the former by the latter of certain real property situated in the town of Yreka, Siskiyou county. The court overruled a general and special demurrer interposed to the amended complaint. The defendant declined to answer, and thereupon a judgment reforming said contract and decreeing its specific performance as so reformed was entered against said defendant. This appeal is from said judgment.

The averments of the complaint fail to disclose any ground which would authorize or justify a decree compelling the specific performance of the contract involved in this controversy, and the demurrer should therefore have been sustained.

The offer by the defendant to sell said property to said Tubbs is in writing, dated "March 26, 1908," and is addressed to "Mr. E. Tubbs," and signed by the defendant. Therein the defendant offered to sell to Tubbs "all of my property in Yreka for $1,500, or the land without the building for $1,090.00 or the north half of said land for $550.00, terms cash within 24 hours or $50.00 to-day and balance on or before April 5th, 1908." Defendant further stipulated to "give you a good and sufficient deed at any time the money is put up within said time. I further agree to move off the house within 60 days should you take the whole of said land." It may here be remarked that said contract was on the 30th day of March, 1908, for a certain consideration, assigned and transferred by said Tubbs to the plaintiffs herein.

The complaint alleges that the contract between Tubbs and the defendant consisted of the written offer to sell to which we have referred and the acceptance of said offer "which was orally made by said E. Tubbs, at said Yreka City, county of Siskiyou, state of California, within the time stipulated by said offer for such acceptance, and accompanied by the proper tender of Gold Coin of the United States of America, to wit, fifty (50) dollars"; that "at or about the same time said E. Tubbs demanded of said G. E. Condrey a conveyance of the said property without the house"; that defendant has not made nor executed "any conveyance of the said property without the house to said E. Tubbs, nor to his heirs or assigns, nor to said plaintiffs herein"; that "said plaintiffs are still ready and willing to pay the purchase money of the said property to the said defendant." There is not a single averment in the complaint showing or even pretending to show that the consideration for which the defendant offered to sell the property involved in the contract concerned here is adequate or commensurate with the value of said property, or that the contract is, as to the defendant, fair and just.

Section 3391 of the Civil Code provides that "specific performance cannot be enforced against a party to a contract in any of the following cases: (1) If he has not received an adequate consideration for the contract; (2) if it is not, as to him, just and reasonable. * * *" And it is the settled rule in courts of equity that facts showing the adequacy of the consideration and, as to the party against whom specific performance is sought, the justness and reasonableness of the contract, must not only be proved but averred.

In Agard v. Valencia, 39 Cal. 292, it is said "that, in a suit for a specific performance, it must be affirmatively shown that the contract is fair and just, and that it will not be inequitable to enforce it. The court (of equity) will not lend its aid to enforce a contract which is in any respect unfair or savors of oppression, but in such cases will leave the party to his remedy at law. It is incumbent on the plaintiff, therefore, to state such facts as will enable the court to decide whether the contract is of such a character that it would be inequitable to enforce it." "There are," says the Supreme Court, in the case of Stiles v. Cain, 134 Cal. 171, 66 Pac. 232, "contracts which are perfectly valid, and which a court of equity would not set aside for fraud, mistake, or for any unfairness, but which, nevertheless, are so unfair that specific performance will not be decreed. This has always been the rule with courts of equity. They will not aid in the enforcement of a harsh and unjust contract, even though it be valid. The case cited (Bruck v. Tucker, 42 Cal. 346) also holds that the party seeking the relief must show, both by averment and proof, that the contract is, as to the defendant, fair and just. That the evidence must show such a case cannot be doubted, and this case distinctly holds that what must be proven on that subject must also be averred. This does not mean that it must be alleged in hæc verba that the contract was supported by an adequate consideration, and is, as to the defendant, fair and just. These might be held insufficient, but the fact that the contract is such as will satisfy the conscience of the chancellor, in the respects mentioned, must appear from a proper statement of the facts." See, also, Nicholson v. Tarpey, 70 Cal. 609, 12 Pac. 778; Morrill v. Everson, 77 Cal. 114, 19 Pac. 190; Windsor v. Miner, 124 Cal. 492, 57 Pac. 386; Prince v. Lamb, 128 Cal. 120, 60 Pac. 689; Flood v. Templeton, 148 Cal. 374, 83 Pac. 148; White v. Sage, 149 Cal. 613, 87 Pac. 193; Herzog v. Atchison, Topeka, etc., R. R., 153 Cal. 496, 95 Pac. 898, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 428. As stated, the allegations of the complaint here do not meet the essentials of the rule as it is expounded by the foregoing authorities, and therefore fall far short of justifying the relief of specific performance.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is pointed out under the special demurrer that the complaint is defective in that its statement of the facts pleaded is uncertain in several particulars, but obviously it is not necessary to consider the points thus urged in view of our conclusion that the complaint fails to state a cause of action for specific performance.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. DOYLE. (Cr. 114.)

1. WORDS AND PHRASES—"STACKS," "COCKS," AND "SHOCKS" OF HAY.

A "stack" of hay is a large pile gathered after the hay has been seasoned, as distinguished from a "cock" or "shock" which is a small pile into which the hay is gathered after being mowed, and thus permitted to remain until seasoned.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, p. 6492; vol. 7, p. 6620.]

2. STATUTES (§ 241*) — PENAL STATUTES — SCOPE.

Generally, where any particular article is mentioned in a penal statute as the subject of an offense, only such property as is usually designated by that term can be regarded as embraced.

3. STATUTES (§ 241*)—CONSTRUCTION—JUDICIAL POWER.

Under the express terms of Code Civ. Proc. § 1858, the Supreme Court cannot read into a penal statute language not incorporated therein by the Legislature.

4. ARSON (§ 25*)—VARIANCE.

Evidence that accused attempted to burn "cocks" or "shocks" of hay does not sustain a conviction under Pen. Code, § 600, prescribing a penalty for burning "stacks" of hay.

5. ARSON (§ 41*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Under Pen. Code, § 600, prescribing punishment for burning stacks of hay, an instruction that defendant was guilty of attempted arson if he attempted to burn stacks, regardless of their size, while proper as an abstract statement of law, was erroneous, where the evidence showed an attempt to burn cocks or shocks of hay.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Thomas Doyle was convicted of attempted arson, and he appeals. Reversed.

Frank H. Farrar, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

HART, J. The information under which the defendant was prosecuted and convicted charges him with the crime of maliciously attempting to burn "certain stacks of hay, of the value of twenty-five dollars and over, the property of one W. A. Rucker," etc. The crime which the defendant is thus charged with having attempted to commit is defined by section 600 of the Penal Code, which section, in so far as it concerns this investigation, reads as follows: "Every person who wilfully and maliciously burns * * * any stack of hay or grain or straw of any kind, or any pile of baled hay or straw, * * * of the value of twenty-five dollars or over, not the property of such person, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one year, nor more than ten years."

The appeal is from the judgment and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, and the principal contention made by the appellant here is that the evidence does not sustain or correspond with the allegations of the information. From the evidence it appears that one W. A. Rucker had under lease in the year 1909 a small tract of land in the city of Merced, and on which, in the month of May of that year, he cut and raked into "cocks" about 30 tons of hay. These "cocks" were scattered about over the land, and were situated a very few feet from each other.

The evidence shows that between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock on the evening of June 5, 1909, Rucker discovered a portion of the hay on fire; that he hastened to the field and extinguished the fire; that later on that same night another cock of hay was set on fire; and that he again went to the field, and, armed with a shotgun, concealed himself behind a pile or cock of hay situated a distance of a few feet from the spot where the second fire occurred, his purpose being to discover, if possible, the person who evidently was trying to destroy all the hay in his field. A short time thereafter the defendant appeared in the field. He walked up to a cock of hay, stooped over it, and at about this time Rucker, so he testified, "saw a lighted match or a blaze or something that he had right between his body and the hay." Rucker then stepped up to the defendant, placed him under arrest, and turned him over to the custody of the sheriff. The defendant, it appears, resided with his sister whose home and premises adjoined the land on which the fire occurred.

The proven circumstances were sufficient to justify the finding of the jury that the defendant set the fire to the hay with the purpose of destroying it. But the important question presented here is, as already stated in a little different language, does the evidence disclose that the act of the defendant, although malicious, constituted an attempt to violate the provision of section 600 of the Penal Code declaring the malicious burning of "any stack of hay" of the value of $25 or more to be a felony? It is plainly evident that, in order to answer the foregoing question in the affirmative, it must be satisfactorily shown that the Legislature intended to include and embrace within the meaning of the phrase, "any stack of hay," as said phrase is employed in the Code section, the piles of loose hay ordinarily and commonly designated as "cocks" or "shocks" of hay. There is, as is generally known, a marked and well-understood distinction between a "stack" and a "cock" or "shock" of hay. Customarily, shortly after hay is mowed or cut, it is raked into small piles or cocks, and is thus allowed to remain until it becomes thoroughly dry or "seasoned," after which it is generally picked up and put into larger piles called "stacks." Webster, in his dictionary, thus defines a "stack": "A large pile of hay, grain, straw and the like, usually of a nearly conical form, but sometimes rectangular or oblong, contracted at the top to a point or ridge and sometimes covered with a thatch." The same author defines a "cock" of hay to be "a small conical pile of hay." It will thus be observed that there is a wide distinction between a "stack" of hay and a "cock" of hay—a distinction equally as marked and obvious as is the difference between certain buildings, as, for example, a hotel and a private residence, or as is the difference between animals of the same species, as, for illustration, a horse and a mule. It may be laid down as a general rule that where any particular article of property is mentioned in a penal statute as the subject of an offense, only such property as is usually designated by such term can be regarded as having been intended by the Legislature to be embraced within its provisions.

In a very early case in Ohio (Denbow v. State, etc., 18 Ohio, 11) the defendant was indicted and convicted under a statute making it penal "to set fire to, or burn, stacks of wheat." Nothing was said in said statute about "shocks" of wheat. Reversing the judgment of conviction, the Supreme Court of that state had this to say: "When things of the same kind have different names, arising from difference in size, number, age, situation, or any other circumstance, only such as are expressly mentioned by the terms generally appropriated to them can be held to have been contemplated by the Legislature. The charge in this case was for burning stacks of wheat. The proof was the burning of shocks of wheat. Now, if the terms, 'shock' of wheat, and 'stack' of wheat, are equivalent, then the proof will sustain the indictment; but the only witness who testifies, states that he considers them different. And in common parlance the two terms have a totally distinct and different signification. The 'shock' is the term applied to the small collection and arrangement of a few sheaves together, in the field, in such manner as to protect them against the weather for a few days, until the farmer has time to gather them into his barn, or place them in the conical pile called a stack." It is very certain that, to sustain the judgment and order here, it would be necessary to read into the section of the Code involved here language which the Legislature has not inserted therein. This we cannot do without a manifest abuse of the power of courts in the construction of legislative enactments. Section 1858, Code Civ. Proc.

Why the Legislature did not include the act of maliciously burning "shocks" or "cocks" of hay within the penalty prescribed by section 600 of the Penal Code is a matter which need not be inquired into here. In the determination of the question decisive of the case here, it is enough to know that the Legislature did not do so, and that it is for that department of the government to say what wrongful acts shall incur the penalties of a felony, and what acts declared unlawful shall incur those of a misdemeanor. The defendant could have been prosecuted either under the provisions of section 594 of the Penal Code or for attempting to commit the crime therein defined as a misdemeanor, and, if it were important to ascertain the reason moving the Legislature to omit to denounce the act of burning "cocks" or "shocks" of hay as a felony, it may be found in the fact that, in the judgment of the lawmakers, crystallized and expressed in said section 594, punishment as a misdemeanor was sufficient for such an act. In any event, under the foregoing views, the evidence does not sustain nor agree with the allegations of the information, and the given instructions upon the vital point, having been framed to coincide with and support an erroneous theory, were themselves necessarily erroneous and prejudicial.

For example, the following instruction which was read to the jury expresses the theory upon which the cause was presented by the people and tried by the court: "If you find from the evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, as charged in the information, did attempt to burn certain stacks of hay of over the value of $25, then you will find the defendant guilty, regardless of the size of the individual stacks of hay, no matter whether they were large or small." (Italics ours.) The foregoing instruction, while faultless as an abstract statement of the law, was not applicable to the facts developed by the evidence, and was plainly calculated to mislead the jury. It is undoubtedly true that it would be immaterial whether a "stack" of hay is a large or small "stack" if it is a "stack" within the meaning of that term as it is used in the statute and as it is herein shown to mean and such stack was of the value of $25 or more. In other words, a pile of hay may constitute a "stack" within the commonly understood signification of that word as applied to piles of loose hay, notwithstanding the fact that it may be smaller in size or contain a less quantity of hay than other stacks of hay, for we do not understand that stacks of hay, in order to be such, need be of uniform size or contain a certain precise quantity of hay.

The evidence in the case at bar, however, discloses, as we have shown, that the field in which the alleged attempt to burn was made contained "cocks" or "shocks" of hay—that is, there were small piles of loose hay scattered about over the field, each of which did not contain a quantity of hay of a value exceeding a dollar. In short, it is not disputed that the piles of hay in the field at the time of the attempted burning charged here were nothing more than mere "cocks" of hay and arose, if at all, to the proportions of "stacks" simply because they were erroneously so characterized in the information and the instructions of the court. The truth is that there was not in the entire field a pile of hay approximately the size of a "stack," as we understand that term. Therefore the prejudicial effect of the quoted and other instructions becomes clearly apparent when it is considered that the court, in thus addressing the jury upon the law by the light of which they were to examine the evidence and so reach a conclusion upon the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant, in substantial effect treated the "cocks" of hay proved as small stacks of hay and as "stacks" coming within the contemplation and intent of the statute. In other words, the court virtually told the jury that any pile of hay, regardless of its size, constituted a "stack" of hay, and, applying this instruction to the evidence, there was, manifestly, no other alternative for the jury but to find the defendant guilty, assuming, of course, that the fact that the defendant attempted to burn a "cock" or perhaps a number of "cocks" of hay was proved to their satisfaction.

Of course, it necessarily follows that the court's refusal to give the instructions requested by the defendant defining "stacks" and "cocks" of hay and the distinction between the two, as explained in Webster's dictionary, and as commonly understood, and declaring that, unless the jury found the piles of hay attempted to be burned to be "stacks" as so defined, the defendant would be entitled to an acquittal, constituted prejudicial error. The fact is, under the proofs, the court should have advised the jury to acquit.

For the reasons stated in the foregoing, the judgment and order are reversed.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 322*)—AGENCY CONTRACT—BREACH—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for breach of an automobile agency contract, evidence held to justify a finding that defendant violated its agreement with plaintiff not to sell certain automobiles within the territory allotted to plaintiff, in that sales of automobiles and parts were made in plaintiff's territory through another agency in Ohio.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by A. F. Schiffman against the Peerless Motor Car Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur L. Hawes, A. D. Laughlin, Percy R. Wilson, and E. W. Freeman, for appellant. Lynn Helm, E. S. Williams, and Shankland & Chandler, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Action to recover damages for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals therefrom and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement on January 28, 1905, which recites that defendant is engaged in the manufacture of motor cars and parts which it desires to market to the best advantage, and that plaintiff proposes to engage in the sale of defendant's product and agrees to purchase a certain number of its motor cars, to be resold within a certain fixed territory named (seven counties of Southern California). Plaintiff agreed not to sell or solicit orders for any cars outside of the territory named at any time prior to November 1, 1905, and defendant agreed not to solicit any orders or sell any cars within said territory within that time, but to refer all inquiries from persons residing within that territory to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was to maintain proper quarters in a suitable location in Los Angeles for the storage of stock and the repair of cars and carry a reasonable quantity of supplies and spare parts for the repair and maintenance of motor cars manufactured by defendant, and the latter was to supply printed matter advertising its cars, mentioning the name of plaintiff as engaged in the sale of such cars within the territory named. Provisions were also made for local advertising by plaintiff and the expense of exhibiting at local fairs, etc. Plaintiff was to purchase three motor cars at a fixed price and model for delivery in February, 1905, being allowed 20 per cent. discount from the list price, which was f. o. b. Cleveland, Ohio; and it was agreed that defendant should sell to plaintiff motor cars, parts and supplies, manufactured or handled by it, on the same terms during the existence of the contract. Deliveries to be deemed complete on board cars at Cleveland.

The court finds that the plaintiff supplied and maintained the quarters required, and did not refuse, neglect, or fail to prosecute the sale of defendant's motor cars, but complied in all respects with the terms of the contract, and was at all times during its existence ready, able, and willing to perform it in all respects; but that defendant solicited orders and made sales of cars and parts thereof within the territory described during the term for which such contract was to continue, and that the plaintiff has suffered damages by reason of the particular breaches of contract, specifically found, in the sum of $4,145, less a set-off of $150, for which balance judgment is given.

Appellant in its attack upon the judgment relies principally upon the contention that under the contract the plaintiff was merely a purchaser of the three cars which the defendant required that he buy as an earnest of his intentions to assume the sale of its cars in the territory described. That such was not the intention or understanding of the parties is clearly disclosed, not only by the instrument itself, but the contemporaneous and subsequent construction placed upon it by them in their correspondence. The "agency of Schiffman" is frequently mentioned and assumed, and in one letter, under date of February 22, 1905, signed by defendant per its "Sales Manager," appears the following: "We are pleased to have the agency in the name of Mr. Schiffman."

Equally without support is the contention that the contract of employment by plaintiff of Messrs. J. M. Pawley and H. L. Olive constituted them partners in the agency. In the letter above quoted from, these men are mentioned as being in the employ of plaintiff, and in letters under date of February 7th and March 8th, written by plaintiff to defendant, the relation between the parties is made plain.

The evidence abundantly justifies the finding that defendant violated its agreement not to sell Peerless machines within the territory allotted to plaintiff, and also the finding that machines were sold to seven different persons, and that some $500 worth of parts of machines were also sold therein by other parties for defendant during the existence of the contract. The arrangement by which these sales were made through another agency in Toledo, Ohio, was clearly brought home to the defendant. It is also shown by the evidence that during the time these machines were being so sold the plaintiff, in compliance with the contract, continued to maintain an agency in the city of Los Angeles in the name of the defendant, paying the expenses thereof out of his own pocket, and that defendant represented to him that it was unable to supply machines to meet the orders sent to it by the plaintiff. There can be no question that this was a violation of the contract.

The measure of damages for such a breach of obligation is found in the general rule declared in section 3300 of the Civil Code, to wit, that amount which will compensate the plaintiff for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom. In applying this section, it is, of course, subject to the limitation that no damages can be recovered which are not clearly ascertainable in both their nature and origin (section 3301). The profits which plaintiff here complains that he was deprived of are those which he would have made from the sale of these machines had the defendant either refused to invade the exclusive territory granted to him or have referred the inquiries of the purchasers to him, as it agreed to do in the contract. There is nothing speculative or uncertain as to the amount of profits of which plaintiff was thus deprived, and their loss is so closely connected with the breach of the obligation by defendant that it is difficult to see any ground upon which it can be said that plaintiff's injury is too remote either in nature or origin. We are of opinion that these profits are such as plaintiff is entitled to recover under the authorities in this state. Sanford v. East Riverside, 101 Cal. 275, 35 Pac. 865; Tahoe Ice Co. v. Union Ice Co., 109 Cal. 242, 41 Pac. 1020. When profits and advantages are expressly stipulated for in the contract, and are the real purpose and direct and immediate fruit of a contract, they are part and parcel of it and must be considered as entering into and constituting a portion of its very elements. Shoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. 245, 48 Pac. 62. In such a case it cannot be said that the profits are collateral or remote. Another element entering into the consideration of such a question is that of the estoppel of defendant to deny that plaintiff would have made sale of these machines but for its violation of the contract. It does not lie in its mouth to say, "You could not have sold these machines if I had filled your orders and had not devised a method whereby your employés could make these sales through another agency."

We are not informed by counsel for either party upon what theory the balance of $3,995, for which judgment was given, was reached, and the record contains nothing from which this court can determine the prices paid for the cars sold by defendant, or determine the amount of freight which plaintiff would have paid on these cars had they been delivered to him f. o. b. at Cleveland, and he required to pay the freight. We cannot assume the trial court did not charge the freight to plaintiff, nor could the judgment be modified upon this theory, if appellant's contention in this regard is correct.

The numerous errors of law specified are not presented any further than they incidentally arise in discussing the foregoing propositions; therefore, they are not separately considered.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Merriman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. L. Williams and Hammack, Noyes & Hammack, for appellant. Purington & Adair, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was brought upon a promissory note executed by the defendant to plaintiff's assignor. The answer set up facts showing there was no consideration therefor; that the note was executed to one Rogers, plaintiff's assignor, who was agent for a life insurance company, under an agreement that, if defendant's application for a policy of insurance was declined, the note was to be returned; that defendant's application was rejected and no policy ever issued; that Rogers represented to defendant that he would make application to another company for a like policy, and that if upon receipt of said policy the defendant, after an examination of the same, was dissatisfied therewith, the privilege would be given him to return such policy without any liability for the payment of the premium, or of the note theretofore executed; that a second company did issue a policy; that defendant, within the stipulated time examined the same, was dissatisfied therewith and returned the policy to the company; that Rogers, in violation of his agreement, transferred the note to plaintiff. It was alleged that plaintiff did not purchase or acquire the note in the ordinary course of business; that he had knowledge at the time of said purchase of facts and circumstances concerning the making of the note; and that the price paid therefor by plaintiff was grossly inadequate to the amount expressed on the face of the note, sufficient to arouse the suspicions of an ordinarily prudent man and put him on inquiry as to the consideration of said note; denied that plaintiff was the bona fide holder of the note for value. The case was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict for defendant. Judgment was rendered upon such verdict June 24, 1908. Thereafter, on July 14, 1908, plaintiff moved for a new trial, specifying in said motion that the same would be made upon a statement of the case. When this motion for a new trial was denied, if, in fact, it was denied, is not made to appear. The appeal is from the order denying a new trial.

The transcript contains no statement settled or signed by the judge. Rule 3 of the court (78 Pac. viii) is violated by the omission to give the name of the judge whose decision it is sought to review. "When notice is given of a motion for a new trial, to be made on a statement of the case, it is the duty of the moving party to propose such a statement, and have it settled, signed, and certified by the judge. The statement must be authenticated in that way before it can be filed with the clerk of the court. * * * But the signature and certificate of the judge are indispensable. Without them there is no statutory statement on which the motion may be heard. An unauthenticated paper in the transcript, purporting to be a statement, is no part of the record on appeal, and must be disregarded." Adams v. Dohrmann, 63 Cal. 418. There is in the transcript a stipulation that the same contains a correct copy of the record, including the instructions given and refused by the court, as well as the statement on motion for a new trial, but this cannot have the effect to properly present such statement to the court as a basis for a review of the evidence therein contained. Conceding, for the purposes of this case, that this stipulation presents the instructions given and refused, we cannot say, in the absence of any evidence presented upon the trial, that the giving or refusal of such instructions constituted reversible error. Nor is there anything before us indicating that the giving or refusing of such instructions was properly excepted to at the time. It is said in Frost v. Grizzly Bluff C. Co., 102 Cal. 526, 36 Pac. 929, that, where a bill of exceptions merely shows instructions given and refused and the exceptions thereto, the judgment will rarely be reversed; all intendments being in favor of sustaining it. If such instructions were proper under any view of the evidence properly admissible under the issues, the action of the court must be sustained.

We find no reversible error in the record, and the order is affirmed.

Where a complaint contained two counts, one alleging that between certain dates named plaintiff furnished 188 boxes of asphalt mixture and laid the same on streets of Santa Barbara at defendant's request, that defendant promised to pay plaintiff therefor $2.25 per box, amounting to $423 in all, and the second count alleging that between the same dates such material was furnished, and that the same and the labor of laying it was reasonably worth $2.25 a box, amounting to $423 in all, findings of a promise to pay and also of the reasonable value of the goods and labor were not so inconsistent as to warrant a reversal of a judgment for plaintiff.

Day & Day, for appellant. W. P. Butcher and C. A. Storke, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The record presented upon this appeal is somewhat confusing. It appears therefrom that on February 17, 1909, the plaintiff filed its complaint containing two counts, the first thereof alleging that between certain dates named plaintiff furnished 188 boxes of asphalt mixture and laid the same on the streets of Santa Barbara at defendant's instance and request; that defendant promised to pay plaintiff therefor the sum of $2.25 per box, amounting to $423 in all. In the second count it is alleged that between the same dates such material was furnished and that the same, and the labor of laying the same on the streets, was reasonably worth $2.25 per box, amounting to $423 in all. To this complaint a demurrer was interposed. It seems that on March 15th the demurrer was sustained by the court, and in the same order defendant was given 10 days to answer. A minute entry, however, appears in the record to the effect that, upon the same date of the rendering of the decision upon the demurrer, plaintiff was permitted to amend its complaint by inserting the words, "to the defendant," in an appropriate place, so that the complaint read that between the dates named the plaintiff furnished to the defendant the articles; and the same correction appears in the second count.

We think it may be said it appears from the record that this amendment was permitted and made after the order was made sustaining the demurrer, and that thereafter the complaint as amended was before the court. No demurrer was interposed to the complaint as amended, and an answer was duly filed, which was a denial that the goods and merchandise were furnished to defendant, and denies a promise to pay therefor. Thereafter an attempt was made to file another amendment to the complaint, the sufficiency of which as a count in debt is open to question. The cause proceeded to trial, however, upon the issues as presented, and the court found that plaintiff did furnish and lay on the streets at defendant's instance and request the goods and merchandise, and defendant promised to pay for the same the sum of $2.25 a box; further, that between the dates named plaintiff furnished, at defendant's instance and request, the articles; and that the articles furnished and the labor of laying the same were reasonably worth $2.25 a box; further, that the matters set out in the third cause of action were true. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $423 and costs. Motion for new trial was filed, which was denied, and from the judgment and order denying a new trial defendant appeals.

We think the first and second counts as amended each state a cause of action. It is obvious that these counts each relate to the same matter, and are an attempt to declare upon a liability growing out of the same transaction for the identical goods sold. The findings are to the effect that the goods and merchandise were laid on the streets at the request of defendant, and that defendant promised to pay the sum of $423 therefor, and also that the articles furnished and the work and labor thereof were reasonably worth $423. We do not regard the finding of a promise to pay and the finding of the reasonable value of the goods to be so inconsistent as to warrant a reversal. Neither would the finding on the attempted count in debt justify a reversal, assuming it to be not in proper form. The finding of a promise to pay is sufficient to support the judgment, regardless of the finding as to the value, and the finding that the materials and the labor of laying the same were reasonably worth the amount which the defendant originally promised to pay for the materials alone is not in conflict with the first finding. Neither is the third finding in conflict with the first or second. There being one finding sufficient to support the judgment, and the others not being in conflict may be treated as surplusage. If one promises and agrees to pay a fixed sum for articles furnished him by another, he cannot avoid liability, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation, because it may appear that the articles were not worth in a crude state the sum agreed to be paid, but were only of such value with the labor of placing them in position. In addition to this, there is no denial of the value of the materials furnished. The only issues presented were as to the actual furnishing and the promise to pay, as to both of which matters the court found against appellant.

Appellant insists, further, that the evidence is not sufficient to support the findings. An examination of the record, however, discloses that there was some evidence which warranted the court in finding that the goods were furnished at the request of defendant under a promise to pay therefor a fixed sum, and we cannot, therefore, interfere with the findings of the court in that regard.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; E. W. Wilson, Judge.

Henry L. Ford and Adam Thompson, for appellant. J. H. G. Weaver, for respondent.

HART, J. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the third amended complaint without leave to amend, and rendered and caused to be entered judgment against plaintiff and in favor of defendant for her costs. The demurrer was both general and special, the latter challenging the court's jurisdiction of the "subject-matter of said action, or of the subject of said action." The appeal is from the judgment so rendered and entered. The action grows out of a transfer of a certain piece of real property situated in the city of Eureka, Humboldt county, by the plaintiff to the defendant.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff on the 31st day of March, 1905, was the owner in fee of a piece or lot of land in said city of Eureka, the same being 120 feet in length and an equal number of feet in width; that situated on said land were two dwelling houses; that on said day he conveyed to the defendant a portion of said land, the land so conveyed being 60 feet in width by 120 feet in length, and upon which one of said dwelling houses was situated; that plaintiff retained the remaining portion of said land (58 feet by 120 feet in dimensions), on which the other dwelling house was situated, and where, with his family, he intended to and did reside after the date of the transfer of a portion of said land to defendant, and that on the land so retained by him there also resided, during some of the time mentioned in the complaint, certain tenants or parties to whom he had leased said premises. It is further alleged that on the portion of the land sold to defendant there were and had been for a long time prior to the date of the sale and execution of the conveyance of said land to defendant, "a water well, a structure containing a water tank, and a windmill and pump connected therewith, used for the purpose of filling said tank with water from said well, which said water is particularly clear, pure, and healthful and containing superior qualities for cooking, washing, and drinking; that water from said tank was at all said times used to supply both said dwelling houses and premises upon which they were situated with water, and said strip 58 feet wide off of the north part of said land (the part retained by plaintiff) was and is supplied with water from said tank by a service pipe running from said land comprising the strip 62 feet off the south part of said land; * * *" that said portion of said land retained and owned by plaintiff "never has had at any time of the times herein mentioned, nor has it now, a well thereon or provided with any other means of obtaining water thereon, or supplying water for said dwelling house thereon except as above set forth." It is averred that, as a part of the consideration for the sale and conveyance to the defendant of the land on which said well is situated, the plaintiff expressly reserved in the deed of conveyance the right to use for domestic purposes, and to that end have carried to his land by means of a pipe connected therewith water pumped from said well; that by virtue of the terms of said reservation water pumped into the tank situated near said well and on the said premises of defendant "has been used in said dwelling house of plaintiff when required, and he has paid for all water used by him for said dwelling house up to March 1st, 1906"; that on said last mentioned date "she, said defendant, without cause or excuse, against the will of plaintiff, shut off the water from flowing in said pipe from said tank to his said dwelling house, and ever since has and now prevents the flow of water from her said tank to his said dwelling house, and plaintiff is informed and believes and alleges that defendant has threatened to keep said water shut off permanently from said dwelling house and not to allow the use of it again therein." It is further alleged that the plaintiff on March 2, 1906, and on March 3, 1906, tendered to defendant the sum of 50 cents as payment in advance for the use of said water for said month of March; said amount being the sum stipulated in the said reservation for which the plaintiff was to have the use of said water. Plaintiff alleges that he "has been put to great cost, all to his great damage, in the sum of $25," by reason of defendant's conduct in turning the water from the pipe leading to his premises, and further declares that pecuniary compensation alone would not constitute an adequate remedy in view of the rights to which he claims to be entitled under the terms of the reservation contained in the deed executed by him to defendant.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The relief demanded by the plaintiff in the prayer of the complaint is, first, for a preliminary, mandatory injunction requiring defendant to remove any obstruction to the flow of water from the tank into the pipe leading to plaintiff's dwelling house; and, secondly, for a permanent injunction compelling defendant to perpetually refrain from obstructing plaintiff's use of said water, and for the damages alleged.

The deed from plaintiff to the defendant is made a part of the complaint, and the reservation therein contained, and on which this controversy hinges, reads as follows: "Reserving, however, to the parties of the first part, the right to use the water from above mentioned property for their dwelling house adjoining said property on the north, provided that said parties of the first part shall pay to the said party of the second part the sum of fifty cents per month as rent for said water so long as said first parties continue to use the same." The demurrer was properly sustained on both the grounds upon which it was urged. Manifestly the alleged "reservation" contained in the deed amounts only to a personal contract by the terms of which the defendant agreed to sell and furnish the plaintiff with water for use for domestic purposes, and is not, in our opinion, a contract that would be specifically enforced. There is no claim, and obviously none could be successfully maintained, that, so far as the use of the water is concerned, the "reservation" is a covenant running with the land. There is nothing in its language which even remotely indicates that it was intended to bind the land. The plaintiff granted to the defendant the fee without restrictions, qualifications, conditions, or exceptions; and, as stated, the alleged reservation constitutes only a personal agreement between the parties which could just as well have been evidenced by some writing de hors and independent of the deed.

The allegations of the complaint, as well as the prayer, called for a restoration of the flow of the water from the tank into the pipe, thence to plaintiff's premises, and for a decree permanently enjoining defendant from obstructing the flow of said water through said pipe. Thus necessarily the defendant would not only be required to perpetually maintain the well and the pump and the other apparatus used for pumping the water, but would be compelled to keep the same in such order as to cause water from the well to be pumped into the tank, and thus supply the plaintiff, so far as the plant maintained intact could do so, with water necessary for his purposes as contemplated by the "reservation." The effect of the decree, if framed in accordance with the tenor of the averments and prayer of the complaint, would, in other words, be to compel the performance of personal services which cannot be done. Section 3390, Civ. Code. If, for example, the pumping machinery should be destroyed or in any manner become impaired so that it could not pump water into the tank, the defendant would be required to rehabilitate or repair the machinery so that she could furnish plaintiff with water or otherwise incur the penalty consequent upon a violation of the injunction. Of course, it is well understood that injunction will not lie to prevent the breach of a contract which would not be specifically enforced.

Plaintiff had available to him adequate compensatory relief. It may be that the complaint sufficiently states a cause of action for damages for a breach of the contract to stand against the attack of a general demurrer, and if so, and had the damages claimed and alleged been such in amount as to give the superior court jurisdiction of the action, the demurrer should and would perhaps have been overruled. But the sum in which the plaintiff alleges that he has suffered damage by the act of the defendant does not obviously amount to enough to invest said court with jurisdiction of the action.

PEOPLE v. LOOMER. (Cr. 158.)

1. JURY (§ 70*) — IMPANELMENT — JURORS DRAWN FOR DIFFERENT DEPARTMENTS OF THE SAME COURT.

Where the superior court of a county was divided into several departments, and on a trial of accused in one of the departments after five men had been selected from the panel of jurors for that department the clerk drew from the trial jury box of that department four additional names of veniremen, which exhausted the jury summoned to serve in that department, the court was authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 248, to order the attendance of the trial jury panel summoned for service in another department, and from it complete the jury.

Fred Loomer was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry H. Roser, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. By information the defendant was charged with the crime of murder. Upon trial therefor he was convicted of murder in the second degree, and by judgment of the court sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The case was tried in department 12 of the superior court of Los Angeles county. It appears that, after five men had been selected from the panel of jurors summoned to serve in this department and sworn to act as jurors in the trial of the case, the clerk then drew from the trial jury box of department 12 four additional names of veniremen, which exhausted the panel of jurors summoned to serve in said department. Thereupon the court made an order requiring the attendance in department 12 of the trial jury panel summoned for service in department 11 of the court, and from this panel the clerk proceeded to draw the names of three jurors, who, together with the four last drawn from the jury box of department 12, were duly sworn to answer questions touching their qualifications as jurors in the case. This proceeding seems to have been in strict accord with the provisions of section 248, Code Civ. Proc., which provides as to counties having two or more judges of the superior court that, "when a panel of jurors is in attendance for service before one or more of the judges, whether impaneled for common use or not, the whole or any number of jurors from such panel may be required to attend and serve in the trial of cases, or to complete a panel, or jury, before any other of the judges." The jury was incomplete, there being only 9 men in the jury box and the panel of department 12 was exhausted. Defendant was entitled to have the box full before exercising his peremptory challenges. Clearly the action of the court was without error.

Appellant claims the evidence adduced at the trial was insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury, in that it shows that in self-defense defendant was justified in killing deceased. The circumstances surrounding the killing were as follows: Defendant and his father were tenants of certain lands adjoining which deceased was as a tenant of the same owner farming a tract of land. A controversy between the parties arose over their respective rights to a piece of land, the right to farm which was claimed by both defendant's father and deceased. The latter, it seems, had put in a crop of corn on the portion of the property involved in the dispute, and defendant's father claimed to be entitled to one-third of the crop as rental. This was denied by deceased. At the time of the killing of deceased he was engaged with a corn knife or sickle cutting corn which stood in stalk, when defendant, accompanied by his father, went to the place where deceased was so engaged, and, according to defendant's evidence, an altercation ensued in which all three took part. Appellant's defense was based upon justifiable homicide; his contention being that deceased did or was about to attack him and his father with the corn knife with which he was engaged in work, and, believing that both he and his father were in imminent danger of great bodily harm at the hands of the deceased from such attack, he in self-defense drew a revolver which he had upon his person and shot deceased, with the result that death ensued almost immediately thereafter. As usual in such cases, the evidence is conflicting. No good purpose could be subserved by repeating it here. Suffice it to say that the testimony adduced on the part of the people tends in some degree to prove the guilt of defendant. While the jury might properly have reached a different conclusion, nevertheless, under the circumstances here presented, it is not within the province of this court to disturb the verdict upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support it. People v. Fitzgerald, 138 Cal. 39, 70 Pac. 1014.

There was no error in the ruling of the court denying defendant's motion to exhibit his unclad body to the jury for the purpose of showing that he was physically deformed, in that one leg was considerably shorter than the other and the limb much smaller in circumference. So far as such facts were material, he had the benefit of his own and his physician's full and uncontradicted testimony touching the matter. At most, such an exhibition would have afforded merely cumulative evidence of facts concerning which there was no dispute. In no event were the substantial rights of defendant prejudiced by the ruling.

The defendant requested the court to give instructions covering upwards of 30 pages of the transcript, nearly all of which were refused. Appellant insists that such refusal as to a number of the instructions constituted error. We have carefully examined each and every one of the alleged erroneous rulings, and, with two exceptions hereafter considered, find that appellant's contention in this regard merits no discussion other than to say that where such requested instructions correctly stated the law we find them, in substance, embodied in the instructions given, which, taken as a whole, are not only full and complete, but well calculated to protect and guard the defendant in securing a fair and impartial consideration of his rights at the hands of the jury.

It is claimed the court erred in instructing the jury that "previous threats or acts of hostility of the deceased toward the defendant, however violent they may have been, are not of themselves sufficient to justify the defendant in slaying the deceased. To excuse him, or justify him, he must have acted under an honest belief that it was necessary at the time to take the life of the deceased, in order to save his own, or himself from great bodily injury, and it must appear that there was reasonable cause to excite this apprehension on his part," as well as in the giving of other instructions predicated upon the hostile acts of deceased towards defendant without any reference being made therein to his father. His contention is that "the language of all these instructions should have been made to apply to the father as well, and that threats or menaces made by deceased against the father or defendant were of avail to defendant, if at the time of the killing his parent was actually assailed, or defendant had sufficient evidence to convince a reasonable person, at that time, that his parent was in imminent danger of great bodily injury, or of losing his life." There was some evidence tending to prove threats and acts of hostility on the part of deceased toward the father of defendant, who accompanied him, and that in shooting deceased defendant did so in defense of his father whom he had reason to believe was about to be attacked by deceased. Conceding that under the evidence an instruction in effect as now suggested by appellant would have been proper, nevertheless, it was his duty to have requested it, if he deemed the evidence sufficient to warrant the same. The instruction above quoted as given was, under the evidence, a proper one. The court at defendant's request gave an instruction upon justifiable homicide in the language of section 197, Pen. Code. Defendant did not ask further elaboration of the provision of said section, nor the additional instructions which he now suggests should have been given. It was his duty to request them, if he deemed them necessary or proper. Not having done so, his complaint that the court failed to so instruct cannot now be entertained. In the case of People v. Matthai, 135 Cal. 446, 67 Pac. 696, the court in discussing a like question says: "The court charged upon justifiable homicide in the language of the Code. If the defendant desired an elaboration of the principles there expressed, he should have proposed his instructions to that end." To the same effect is People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 482, 24 Pac. 32; People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 346, 86 Pac. 671.

Defendant requested the court to give an instruction to the jury as follows: "In criminal cases the law requires the concurrence of 12 minds in the conclusion of guilt. Before a verdict of guilty can be legally rendered, each member of the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant. Therefore, if any one of the jurors, after having considered all of the evidence and having consulted with his fellow jurors, should entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, as charged in the information, he should not, under his oath, consent to a verdict of 'guilty.' Each juror should act upon his own individual judgment upon the facts of the case, and he is in duty bound not to surrender his own convictions, if he entertains a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, merely because the other jurors entertain no doubt as to his guilt." With reference to a similar instruction, the Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Beatty in the case of People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 495, 55 Pac. 585, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50, says: "This is a correct statement of the duty of a juror, and should have been given. If any juror needed an instruction upon this point, it was harmful to refuse it. If no juror needed the instruction, it would have been harmless to give it." In a concurring opinion in the case of People v. Howard, 143 Cal. 323, 76 Pac. 1118, the Chief Justice repeats the above quoted language.

The instruction, for the reasons stated in the Dole Case, was a proper one, and should have been given. Conceding, however, that the court erred in refusing to give it, we are nevertheless of the opinion that under the circumstances of this case the error was one which did not prejudice the substantial rights of defendant, and, therefore, under the provisions of section 1258, Pen. Code, it should be disregarded. The jury were fully instructed as to what constituted a reasonable doubt, and that in case of a reasonable doubt as to defendant's guilt he was entitled to acquittal; "that the law raises the presumption of innocence, which attends the defendant throughout his trial, and which goes with the jury into the jury room"; that it was the duty of the jury to "consider the testimony in the light of that presumption of innocence, and that presumption must prevail to acquit the defendant, unless the state has by sufficient evidence established the guilt of the defendant to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt"; that it was the duty of the prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the truth of every material allegation in the information; that "nothing is to be presumed or taken by implication against the defendant"; that "the law presumes him to be innocent of the crime with which he is charged"; "that this case is to be determined from the evidence adduced at the trial, and from the instructions of the court, and no outside influence or statement of alleged facts, whether agreeing with the facts proved at the trial or not, is proper matter for the jury's consideration, and any such must be entirely laid aside by you in your consideration of this case." And again: "The burden of proof is upon the prosecutor. All the presumptions of law, independent of evidence, are in favor of innocence, and every person is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty." There were other instructions of like import, all calculated to impress upon each juror to whom such instructions were addressed the duty which devolved upon him, that in reaching a verdict he should be guided by the evidence and instructions of the court. In addition to this, it appears that the jury upon bringing in its verdict was polled, and each individual juror asked if the verdict rendered was his verdict, to which each member of the jury responded in the affirmative. Section 604, Code Civ. Proc., provides that "an oath must be administered to the jurors, in substance, that they and each of them will well and truly try the matter in issue between ———, the plaintiff, and ———, defendant, and a true verdict render according to the evidence." We cannot assume that any member of the jury rendered his verdict in violation of such oath and the instructions of the court. As said by Justice Shaw in his concurring opinion in People v. Perry, 144 Cal. 756, 78 Pac. 287: "An exception which involves nothing more important than the failure of the court to protect the defendant against the very remote contingency that some juror may so misunderstand or disregard his oath and the other instructions, or the equally remote contingency that such a juror would be prevented from so doing by an instruction such as that here involved, does not, in my opinion, affect the substantial rights of the defendant."

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order are, therefore, affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GORDON. (Cr. 244.)

1. Indictment and Information (§ 140*)—Presumptions—Preliminary Proceedings.

On motion to quash, an information is presumed to have been founded on the commitment as made by the examining magistrate, in the absence of a contrary showing.

2. Forgery (§ 26*)—Information—Sufficiency.

An information for forging a sight draft, which was set out, at a specified time and place, charging that there was no such person as the drawer "then and there in existence," was sufficient; the quoted words not being indefinite.

3. Jury (§ 131*)—Impaneling—Acquaintance with Third Persons.

4. JURY (§ 131*) — COMPETENCY — NEWSPAPER REPORTS.

In a prosecution involving a prior conviction, examination bringing out that a juror remembered reading something about a convict getting acquainted with the warden's wife is insufficient to show that accused was the convict referred to and did not make the examination erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

5. FORGERY (§ 37*)—EVIDENCE—FORGED INSTRUMENT.

In a trial for forging a sight draft, the draft was admissible without showing that it had been placed in a bank for collection.

6. FORGERY (§ 13*)—DRAFTS—NECESSITY FOR ATTEMPTING COLLECTION.

To convict of forging a draft, it was not necessary to have the draft sent through a bank for collection.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 491*)—EVIDENCE—COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING.

In a trial for forging a draft purporting to have been signed by H. C. W. for the purpose of comparison and showing its physical appearance, it was not error to admit a letter purporting to have been written by W. C. W., an acquaintance of accused, canceling an order for a set of books given witness, on which order accused received a commission from witness for introducing W., where witness testified that he compared the signatures on the letter and the order, and that they appeared to be the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1080; Dec. Dig. § 491.*]

8. FORGERY (§ 44*)—PROOF REQUIRED.

To convict of forging a draft signed by a fictitious person, it was not necessary to prove that there was no such person in existence at the time the writing was signed; it being sufficient to show to a common certainty that there was no such person in the vicinity of and connected with the particular acts charged in the place and county where jurisdiction accrued.

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—HARMLESS ERROR —MISTAKES IN INITIALS.

A mistake in the initials of a person in an instruction or other part of the record is not reversible error, where it is not misleading.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

W. F. Gordon was convicted of forgery, and he appeals from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. Affirmed.

Burton J. Wyman, for appellant. Attorney General Webb and F. L. Berry, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the People.

COOPER, P. J. The defendant was found guilty of uttering and passing a fictitious instrument in writing for the payment of money and sentenced to a term of three years in the state prison. He prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The information states that the defendant is accused of feloniously uttering and passing on the 20th day of May, 1909, at the city and county of San Francisco, a fictitious instrument in writing for the payment of money, with intent to defraud one Aaron Jacobs, which fictitious instrument in writing is stated to have been "then and there in the words and figures following, to wit: 'San Francisco, Cal. May 20th, 1909. $25.00. At sight pay to the order of W. F. Gordon twenty-five no/100 dollars value received, and charge the same to account of H. C. Watson. To Geo. W. Harrington, No. 212 Fifth street, San Diego, Cal. H. C. Watson. No protest. Tear this off before presenting.' Indorsed as follows: 'W. F. Gordon.'" The information further charges a prior conviction of a felony, to wit, embezzlement, by a judgment of the superior court given and made on or about the 31st day of December, 1900. Defendant made a motion to set aside the information upon the grounds that prior to the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate for the prior offense charged in the information, and that he was committed under the name of William F. Gordon, while the information charges him under the name of W. F. Gordon.

His first contention is that the court erred in denying his motion. If there were otherwise any merit in the motion, it is sufficient to say that counsel has failed to call our attention to any evidence in the record as to the commitment made by the magistrate or its contents, or even the name under which the defendant was committed by the magistrate, and upon inspection we have failed to find any such evidence. We must therefore presume in favor of the record that the district attorney performed his duty; that the information is founded upon the commitment as made by the magistrate. Not only is this so as matter of law, but we find by the record that when the information was read to the defendant he admitted his true name to be W. F. Gordon, and before sentence the district attorney withdrew the charge of a prior conviction.

The information is said to be so fatal that the demurrer to it should have been sustained. The argument is made that after the first charging part of the information, and, after setting forth a copy of the instrument, it states that "whereas in truth and in fact there was no such individual as H. C. Watson then or there in existence," and it is contended that the words "then or there" are indefinite and may have different meanings. The criticism is highly hypercritical. The information charges in the portion preceding the quoted clause that the instrument was false and fictitious. The statement that there was no such person "then" in existence is very comprehensive, and certainly if there was no such person in existence on the 20th day of May, 1909, there was no such person "there" in the city and county of San Francisco. The information was sufficient to enable the defendant or any person of common understanding to know what was intended, and it sets forth the acts charged with such degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment upon conviction.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

There was no error committed by the court in allowing the district attorney to ask of prospective jurors the questions pointed out in appellant's brief as to the jurors being personally acquainted with certain persons therein named. The juror Lemmon was asked by the district attorney if he knew one Mr. Tompkins who used to be the warden at San Quentin, and also if he knew a man named Dan Sullivan, who was in some way connected with the county clerk's office. The juror replied that he did not know either of them. The juror Blanchfield, in answer to a question by the district attorney, said he knew Dan Sullivan. The principal complaint is made as to the examination of the juror Rulfs. In answer to a question by the district attorney in direct examination Rulfs testified that he did not know Dan Sullivan, but that he did know one A. Jacobs. In cross-examination of the juror by defendant's counsel, it was shown that the juror had read some account of the matter in the newspapers; that he remembered "about a prisoner over there getting acquainted with the warden's wife, something like that; that is all I remember about it." This is said by defendant's counsel to have reference to the fact that the defendant had before been in San Quentin for a prior offense. It is sufficient to say that we cannot determine from the record what prisoner the juror referred to. We cannot presume that the reference was to this defendant; and, even if the answer raised a suspicion that the prisoner referred to was the defendant, the matter was elicited in answer to questions asked by defendant's own counsel in cross-examination. There was no motion to strike out, and the juror further stated that he was not in any way prejudiced by what he had read.

The admission of the written instrument in evidence without showing that it had been placed in a bank for collection was not error, nor was it necessary to have the draft sent through a bank for collection. If the draft was false and fictitious as alleged in the information, it would not have been paid and would have been returned by the bank. Hence it was not necessary to do a vain and useless thing.

It is stated that the court committed error of the most prejudicial character in admitting in evidence over defendant's objection a document marked "People's Exhibit B." It appears that the exhibit was a letter, and was offered and admitted in evidence merely for the purpose of the "physical appearance of the paper and the handwriting" and evidently for the purpose of comparison. Prior to the time the letter was offered one Riggs had been called as a witness for the prosecution, and testified that about April 10th of 1909 the defendant came to his place of business with a man claiming to be W. C. Watson, whom defendant introduced to the witness as W. C. Watson; that the person purporting to be W. C. Watson signed a written order to the witness for an encyclopedia that the witness appears to have been agent for, and that the order was signed in the presence of the witness "W. C. Watson, 103 Natoma street." The witness Riggs was further examined and identified a paper marked "People's Exhibit A" (which appears to be the instrument described in the information). The witness testified that he received the letter—"Exhibit B"—by mail on the 12th day of April, 1909; that it had been in his possession ever since. The letter—"Exhibit B"—was a request to Riggs not to deliver the encyclopedia, as the writer of the letter would not receive it, and was signed "W. C. Watson." The witness further testified that he compared the signature of the letter with the signature on the written order that he saw signed in the defendant's presence by the man purporting to be W. C. Watson, and that they appeared to be the same. Now the only object of admitting the letter in evidence on the testimony of Riggs was for the purpose of the physical appearance of the letter and the handwriting for comparison. The court did not err in admitting it for the purposes named. The facts preceding it, to wit, that the defendant had gone with the party W. C. Watson to the place of business of Riggs and introduced him to Riggs, and that an order was then signed by said party W. C. Watson for an encyclopedia on which defendant received a commission from Riggs, that the said Watson never took or paid for the encyclopedia, tend at least in some degree to show guilty knowledge on the part of defendant. The witness Riggs, having seen the purported Watson sign his name to the order for the encyclopedia, and having received in due course of mail a letter countermanding the order so signed "W. C. Watson," stated that he had compared the signature to the letter with the signature to the order, and that they appeared very much alike. The Code provides (Code Civ. Proc. § 1943): "The handwriting of a person may be proved by any one who believes it to be his and who has seen him write or has seen writings purporting to be his on which he has acted or been charged, and who has thus acquired a knowledge of his handwriting." The witness Riggs had seen the man who claimed to be W. C. Watson write, and had acted upon the writing so made by the man purporting to be said W. C. Watson, and the effect of his testimony is that he believed the letter to be in the same handwriting. While the evidence was not as convincing as in many cases, we cannot say as matter of law that it was not sufficient to prove to the satisfaction of the trial judge that the letter was written by the same man who wrote the order for the encyclopedia.

It is claimed that the court erred in refusing the defendant's requested instruction as follows: "The nonexistence of the individual H. C. Watson mentioned in the information, like all the other essential elements which go to make the offense for which this defendant is being tried, is one of the material issues involved in the case. The nonexistence of the said H. C. Watson must be proved by the prosecution beyond and to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, and if there be any reasonable doubt in your minds as to whether or not there was in existence anywhere in the world such an individual as H. C. Watson on the 20th day of May, 1909, you must resolve that doubt in favor of the defendant and find a verdict of not guilty." The instruction was properly refused. The prosecution certainly was not required to prove, nor were the jury required to believe, beyond a reasonable doubt, that there was no such person in the world as H. C. Watson at the time the writing was signed. It was only necessary to show to a common certainty that there was no such person in existence in the vicinity of and connected with the particular acts charged in the place and county where jurisdiction accrued. People v. Eppinger, 105 Cal. 36, 38 Pac. 538; People v. Terrill, 133 Cal. 120, 65 Pac. 303. If the proposition contended for in the instruction be the law, it would be impossible in any case to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that there was no such particular person in the world.

The instruction of the court as to evidence covering another transaction between defendant and H. C. Watson and the witness Riggs was evidently an inadvertence as to the use of the initials "H. C." instead of "W. C." This is plain from what follows, wherein the jury are told that that was offered as "tending to show a connection between the defendant and said H. C. Watson whom the people claim to be the maker of the draft in question." The jury evidently understood that the court referred to the transaction where the order for the encyclopedia was signed by the man purporting to be "W. C. Watson." We do not think the court intended to lead the jury to believe, nor could the jury have believed from the language used by the court, that the court was charging them as a matter of fact that the writer of the draft was the same W. C. Watson referred to by Riggs as giving the order for the encyclopedia.

We have examined the instructions as a whole, and we think that they fairly and fully instructed the jury as to the questions of law bearing upon the issues before them. It is not for imaginary errors, or errors in regard to getting one initial wrong in an instruction, or in some other part of the record, that the court will reverse a case that appears to have been fairly tried; and, in regard to other errors which are claimed to have occurred in rulings on testimony, we have examined them, and we do not find any of sufficient importance to justify a reversal of the case.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by J. H. Ramboz against Charles Stansbury and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Scarborough & Bowen, for appellants. Percy R. Wilson (Constan Jensen, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. On July 12, 1906, the defendants made and delivered to the Consolidated Lumber Company, a corporation, their certain negotiable promissory note for $13,500, payable to its order on or before January 1, 1908. To secure the payment thereof they deposited in pledge with the Consolidated Lumber Company 250 shares of the capital stock of the Western Lumber & Mill Company. Plaintiff sues as the indorsee of an intermediate indorsee of the note to foreclose the lien upon the stock so pledged to secure the payment of the note. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal therefrom upon bill of exceptions. The answer admitted the execution of the note, but denied the indorsement and transfer thereof to plaintiff. The court found that on May 1, 1907, the Consolidated Lumber Company, payee in said note, did, in the ordinary course of business, duly indorse, transfer, and deliver the same to the Merchants' National Bank of Los Angeles, which received it in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, paying therefor $13,500; that at the same time the Consolidated Lumber Company transferred and delivered to said bank the stock so pledged to secure the payment thereof; that prior to the institution of this action the bank indorsed the note and transferred the same, together with said stock so pledged to secure the payment thereof, to plaintiff herein. Appellants attack these findings, assigning as grounds therefor that they are unsupported by the evidence.

It is conceded that the note was transferred to plaintiff by the bank merely for the purpose of collection. The question presented is whether the note was assigned to the bank by a valid indorsement thereof. The indorsement is sufficient in form, and on behalf of the Consolidated Lumber Company is signed by the vice president and secretary. Nevertheless, appellants insist that, in the absence of the corporate seal, a resolution of the board of directors authorizing the indorsement for and on behalf of the corporation was a prerequisite essential to a valid transfer of the note to the bank. There is no merit in this contention. Possession of the note, indorsed in due form, together with uncontradicted evidence that on behalf of the Consolidated Lumber Company it was, in the absence of the president, indorsed by the secretary and the vice president, the latter of whom was also general manager and as such had full control of the business of the corporation, which on May 1, 1907, received from the bank $13,500 as the proceeds of the sale and transfer, and that it was the custom of the company to sell its notes to banks, was sufficient to show that the indorsement and transfer to the bank was made in the usual course of business. From these facts the necessary authority will be inferred, notwithstanding the absence of the corporate seal and the fact that evidence of the adoption of a formal resolution is wanting. Mr. Thompson in his work on Corporations, vol. 4, § 5741, says: "The presumption (of right acting) extends to dealings in negotiable securities other than to the act of issuing them. Under its operation, an assignment by a corporation of a note held by it is presumed to be valid until the contrary appears. Here again it is assumed that the corporation has a general power to assign such instruments, and the force of the presumption is that its officers exercised the power rightly in the particular instance, or in the ordinary course of its business." In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the holder of the note under the indorsement made will be presumed to be the owner thereof. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 11, 15. Indeed, the general rule appears to be that, in the absence of mala fides, which is not claimed here, plaintiff's prima facie title by reason of possession is not subject to rebuttal so long as the maker is protected from further claim by the payment of the judgment. Dyer v. Sebrell, 135 Cal. 597, 67 Pac. 1036; Ellicott v. Martin, 6 Md. 509, 61 Am. Dec. 327; Marbourg v. Lloyd, 21 Kan. 545; Mitchell v. Deeds, 49 Ill. 416, 95 Am. Dec. 621; Hawkins v. Bank, 150 Ind. 117, 49 N. E. 957.

Appellants also contend that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding to the effect that the stock pledged as security for the payment of the note was transferred to the bank. No evidence was offered upon the subject; none was necessary. The indorsement and transfer of the note carried with it the collateral pledged as security for the payment thereof. Civ. Code, § 1084; Duncan v. Hawn, 104 Cal. 10, 37 Pac. 626. Plaintiff's right to the collaterals pledged was not dependent upon the actual delivery thereof. His interest therein was by virtue of being the holder of the note, and if the payee of the note after transferring the same retained the collaterals, his holding was as trustee for the bank. "Where a note is secured by collaterals and the pledgee assigns the note, the fact that he does not deliver the collaterals to the assignee does not deprive the latter of his interest under or title to them, because the pledgee, after selling the note, holds the collaterals as agent or trustee for his assignee." Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, vol. 22, p. 879. Conceding that the transfer of the note was not sufficient evidence of the transfer of the collateral, nevertheless, the finding, if unsupported by the evidence, is harmless.

The courts refused to permit defendant Nofziger to offer evidence in support of a counterclaim filed with his answer, wherein it was alleged the note was given in settlement of a sum appearing to be due from him in a certain transaction had with the Consolidated Lumber Company, but through mistake and inadvertence the amount specified therein was $2,700 in excess of the sum actually due. There was no prejudicial error in the ruling. Conceding the facts alleged in the pleading to be sufficient to constitute a counterclaim against the Consolidated Lumber Company, nevertheless, defendant could not avail himself of such defense in this action as against plaintiff, for the reason that the note having been transferred to the bank before maturity for full value, it was necessary in order to constitute a counterclaim against plaintiff to allege additional facts showing that the bank took the note with notice of existing equities. It is not alleged that plaintiff or the bank had notice of the facts set up in the counterclaim, nor are any facts alleged therein showing want of good faith on the part of the bank in the purchase of the note. "The general rule is that absence of consideration or a failure of consideration is available as a defense in a suit by an assignee of the instrument only by specially pleading the same and showing by additional allegations why the instrument is subject in his hands to the defense, as, for instance, that the assignee is a holder with notice." Encyc. of Plead. & Prac. vol. 14, p. 641. In the absence of an allegation that the bank had notice of the facts set up in the pleading at the time the note was transferred to it, a counterclaim based upon a partial failure of consideration constituted no defense to the action, and, hence, no evidence was admissible in support thereof. Hancock and Mills v. Hale, 17 Fla. 808; Malsch v. Heller (Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 384; Gee v. Saunders, 66 Tex. 333, 1 S. W. 272.

After the evidence was closed, the court, without notice to defendants, permitted plaintiff to amend his complaint to conform to the evidence introduced upon the trial, it being stipulated that the allegations of the amendment should be deemed denied. Sections 469, 470, Code Civ. Proc. There was no abuse of discretion on the part of the court in allowing the amendment. Upon the trial evidence had been offered as to the subject-matter of the allegations contained therein. Under the circumstances, it would have been idle to have required notice thereof to defendants. Maionchi v. Nicholini, 1 Cal. App. 690, 82 Pac. 1052; San Joaquin Valley Bank v. Dodge, 125 Cal. 77, 57 Pac. 687. Moreover, it clearly appears that in no event, conceding the alleged error, were the substantial rights of defendants prejudiced by the ruling.

The judgment is affirmed.

D. I. NOFZIGER LUMBER CO. et al. v. SOLOMON et al. (Civ. 813.)

1. Mechanics' Liens (§ 104*)—Contracts to Prevent Liens—Requisites—Retention of Money.

Retention of 20 per cent. of the contract price of a building is not substantial compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, requiring retention of 25 per cent. in order to defeat attachment of mechanics' liens; and under a written contract providing for insufficient retention the owner cannot show an actual retention of the required amount, if it was not revealed to the lien claimants.

2. Mechanics' Liens (§ 154*)—Verification—Purpose.

The purpose for requiring verification of mechanics' lien claims is to show good faith in filing them and prima facie support for the purpose of giving notice, and not to prove the lien on attempt to enforce it.

4. Evidence (§ 325*)—Claims as Evidence—"Public Record."

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Consolidated actions by the D. I. Nofziger Lumber Company and others against A. Solomon and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. L. Horton, for appellants. Scarborough & Bowen, John F. Poole, and Schweitzer & Hutton, for respondents.

TAGGART, J. Consolidated action to foreclose mechanics' liens. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant owners appeal from judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial.

The record on appeal is made up in accordance with a stipulation "that no point is made on this appeal as to any pleading, nor as to any papers in the judgment roll, in said actions, except as herein mentioned," and consists of the findings and judgment and a bill of exceptions. The questions presented for consideration are: (1) Was the clause in the contract which provides for the retention of $500, instead of $625, as the final payment, the whole contract price being $2,500, a substantial compliance with the provisions of section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "that at least twenty-five per cent. of the whole contract price shall be made payable at least thirty-five days after the final completion of the contract"? and (2) Were the original liens filed by each of the lien claimants, upon the face of which appeared a verification in the ordinary form, entitled to be introduced in evidence, without further proof that the claims were verified?

There are earlier cases which in principle, perhaps, support the argument of appellants that the contract shows a substantial compliance with the statute. These declarations were due to the failure of the courts to recognize the change wrought in the law relating to mechanics' liens by the adoption of the Constitution of 1879. There was no special provision in the Constitution of 1849, or the amendments thereto, for a mechanics' lien law. The law was therefore entirely the creature of statute, and it was during this period that our present lien law was enacted. Being continued in force so far as consistent with the provisions of the Constitution of 1879, by the express terms of section 1 of article 22 of that instrument, the courts accepted it as the means provided by the Legislature in response to the constitutional mandate that "the Legislature shall provide, by law, for the speedy and efficient enforcement of such liens," no new procedure having been provided. Germania, etc., v. Wagner, 61 Cal. 349. The phraseology of the law, which in all of its provisions implied that the lien was of legislative creation, was not revised to meet the change caused by the adoption of section 15 of article 20 of the Constitution of 1879, and was and still is, grammatically at least, out of harmony with the view that the right of lien is due to the provision of the Constitution that "mechanics, materialmen, artisans and laborers of every class shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished material, for the value of such labor done and material furnished; and the Legislature shall provide, by law, for the speedy and efficient enforcement of such liens."

The recognition of the constitutional origin of the right and the true relation of the statute is much clearer in the later cases, it being said of the clause here under consideration, by Justice Henshaw in Hampton v. Christensen, 148 Cal. 729, at page 737, 84 Pac. 200, at page 203: "Every provision of the laws which the Legislature may enact must be subordinate to and in consonance with this constitutional provision. It will be noted that, in framing these laws, primarily designed for the protection of materialmen and laborers, the Legislature has seen fit to reserve for the use of these lien claimants but one of the payments. After providing that no payment shall be made until the commencement of the work, it sets aside a fund amounting to 25 per cent. of the contract price, to be held for 35 days after the completion of the building, and this fund, in case of a valid contract, is practically the only money available to meet the demands of lien claimants. Whatever may be said of other payments, this amount of money cannot lawfully be depleted or reduced to the injury of any such claimant. If it could be, it would be setting at naught the constitutional provision granting a lien for the full value of the labor done or material furnished." See, also, Stimson Mill Co. v. Nolan, 5 Cal. App. 754, 91 Pac. 262; Goldtree v. San Diego, 8 Cal. App. 505, 97 Pac. 216; L. A. Pressed Brick Co. v. Higgins, 8 Cal. App. 514, 97 Pac. 414, 420. Considered in this light the statutory provisions as to the terms, form and recording of the contract become in effect a means provided whereby the owner may place some limit upon the liability of his property to be entirely taken to satisfy the constitutional lien. As said in the Hampton-Christensen Case, the law accords the owner ample opportunity to protect himself by providing in the contract for as large a reserved payment as is necessary for every emergency. The Legislature has certainly gone as far in the protection of the owner as can well be expected, when it declares that 25 per cent. of the contract price is a sufficient reservation to cover the full value of the labor done and the material furnished, for which the Constitution provides a lien.

This construction of section 1184 is in accord with the decision of the Supreme Court in Burnett v. Glas, 154 Cal. 249, 97 Pac. 423, which answers the first question adversely to appellants' contention. In that case, like in the case at bar, the amount provided to be retained by the contract was only 20 per cent. of the whole contract price, and the Supreme Court says: "There was also a substantial departure from the provisions of section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure. * * * It has always been recognized by this court, in line with the express declaration of this section, that where there is a substantial departure in the contract from the provisions as to the times of payment and the reservation of at least 25 per cent. of the contract price for at least 35 days after completion of the building, the property is subject to liens in favor of those doing labor or furnishing materials to the same extent that it would have been had there been no contract, and the labor and materials had been furnished at the personal instance and request of the owners."

The request of appellants to be permitted to show that they actually retained the 25 per cent., notwithstanding the terms of the contract were not in accordance with the provisions of section 1184, was properly denied. They did not offer to show that the lien claimants had any knowledge of this, or how this could be made available to the lien claimants against the rights of the other party to the contract, if the contract, as they contend, is valid. Upon an issue made by them the court found that the failure to provide the proper amount in the contract was not due to a mistake of law. Section 1184 provides that by the terms of the contract 25 per cent. of the whole contract price shall be made payable, etc., and an unrevealed intention to retain or the actual retention of 25 per cent. is not a compliance with the section. Evidence of the retention of the full amount without such a provision in the contract was, therefore, immaterial.

It is not clear how the second point made by appellants is before us on the record. The bill of exceptions in the case of the plaintiff Nofziger Lumber Company reads: "Evidence was offered on behalf of the plaintiff * * * to prove the contract under which they furnished materials to the defendant J. B. Cook as contractor, and having proved their said contract with the said defendant contractor, and that they had furnished the materials thereunder, on June 18, 1908, the said plaintiff, by and through one of its attorneys, Mr. Scarborough, offered in evidence its original claim of lien. No evidence other than the lien itself was offered or introduced as to the signatures of the parties or verification thereof. Said offer was objected to by defendants" upon the grounds "that said claim of lien is incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial and no foundation laid." The concluding portion of the lien is given, showing the value of materials furnished and balance due and the name of the claimant corporation signed thereto, "By S. T. Davison." The verification is in the usual form by Davison as the vice president of the company.

That the purpose of the verification is not to prove the lien when it is sought to enforce it in the court may be conceded. The statement filed with the recorder which is required to be verified is but a notice by the claimant that he intends to avail himself of his right to a lien in the particular case. The verification of the claim by his own oath or that of some other person is required as an evidence of good faith and a prima facie support to his claim for the purpose of giving such notice only. The introduction of this claim in evidence is not to prove its contents, but to establish that notice has been given as required by law. It is entitled to admission when it is shown that it complies with the statutory requirements. If the signature and verification were sufficient to entitle it to be filed with the recorder, and it was so filed, it became a public record and thereafter became entitled to be received in evidence under the rules governing the admission of private writings which may become public records by recording under the statute. Code Civ. Proc. § 1894. The objection that "no foundation was laid" for its introduction might cover the absence of evidence in the record that the lien was recorded, but no point is made of this. When an objection is made that sufficient foundation has not been laid for the introduction of a writing or other evidence, the particulars wherein the foundation is insufficient should be specified. If the objection were limited to the grounds implied by the statement in the bill of exceptions that "no evidence other than the lien itself was offered or introduced as to the signatures of the parties or verification thereof," it was properly overruled. No proof of the genuineness of the signatures to either the claim or the verification is a necessary preliminary to the admission in evidence of a lien properly verified and filed. The offer of the plaintiff was to prove the contract and the furnishing of materials thereunder. In the absence of any objection, this seems to include proof of the value of the materials as specified in the contract. The record as to the other judgment lien plaintiffs is substantially the same as the record in the Nofziger Case.

No error appearing in the record, the judgment and order are affirmed.

Action by Emma L. Sheer against F. J. Hoyt and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from a judgment denying defendants a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Campbell & Moore, for appellants. Cryer & Tuttle, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Action to rescind contract to purchase stock in corporation organized to manufacture mining machinery and operate same on a royalty; also to procure return of real property conveyed in part payment. Defendants by way of counterclaim seek to recover balance of purchase price of stock evidenced by writing in form of a promissory note payable on demand after such stock shall reach a salable value of 50 cents per share. Judgment was for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment and an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The trial court found, in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, that plaintiff made a contract with the defendant F. J. Hoyt to purchase 20,000 shares of the stock of the Hoyt Mining Machinery Company for $5,000; that she conveyed the lot of land mentioned above to A. M. Hoyt, wife of said F. J. Hoyt, which conveyance was accepted as the first payment on said stock, and gave her note for $3,000, in the form above stated, to F. J. Hoyt for the deferred payment. The court also found the deed was so made to A. M. Hoyt at the direction and for the benefit of F. J. Hoyt; that to induce plaintiff to purchase said stock and to make such conveyance F. J. Hoyt represented to her that the "Hoyt Ball Amalgamator" (which was practically the sole asset of the corporation whose stock she was buying) was a machine that would effectually and economically abstract and collect from gold-bearing dirt and gravel the finest particles of gold, to wit, flour gold; that said machine had passed the experimental stage and was a perfected machine; that nothing remained to be done by said corporation but to manufacture and market its machines; that these representations were the material inducements which led plaintiff to purchase the said stock; that they were false and untrue; that she relied and acted upon them and had no knowledge herself of mining machinery. It is contended in support of this appeal that these findings are unsupported by the evidence and that the complaint fails to state a cause of action.

The complaint is sufficient against the attacks made upon it. An allegation which states that misrepresentations were made as to the character of the assets of a corporation, and the mechanical fitness and productive capacity of the machine which constitutes its sole means of income, must be regarded as alleging something more than a mere opinion as to the value of an invention, or the market value of the stock of the corporation. The representations made were not statements of what the machine in question might be expected to do, but of things which it had done and was capable of doing. Matters which might otherwise be only expressions of opinion, when stated as accomplished facts by one of the parties to a contract and accepted and relied upon by the other as such may, and often do, become the basis of actions for fraudulent misrepresentations. Johnson v. Withers, 9 Cal. App. 52, 98 Pac. 42; Pomeroy on Equity Juris. (3d Ed.) § 878, p. 1562. The conveyance of the title to the real property to Mrs. Hoyt does not entitle her to any of the rights of a bona fide purchaser for value, or justify her in retaining the property obtained from plaintiff, if it were obtained by means of the fraudulent misrepresentations found by the court to have been made by her husband. The finding of the court that this conveyance was made for the benefit of F. J. Hoyt has support in the circumstances of the case and the evidence in the record. If the court had found the statement of F. J. Hoyt, when on the stand—"I think I used Mrs. Hoyt's stock in making the transaction; that was how it happened to be made to Mrs. Hoyt."—to be true, and accepted this as showing that the stock which was sold belonged to Mrs. Hoyt, it must also have reached the conclusion that she was bound by her husband's acts and representations made in effecting the sale. Authorities considering the rights of purchasers in good faith from vendees obtaining title to real property by fraudulent representations have no application here. Mrs. Hoyt is not a purchaser from the vendee. She is either the vendee or holds title for the benefit of the vendee. The court found her to be the latter, and there is evidence to sustain that finding. The answer admits that the conveyance was made to her by virtue of the transactions connected with the sale of the stock, and pursuant to the agreement of plaintiff to convey the property to F. J. Hoyt, and, other than in the above-quoted statement, it nowhere appears that there was any consideration moving from her for such conveyance. This issue as here made was not specially presented at the trial, the parties apparently resting principally upon the pleadings in this respect.

The finding that the representations of F. J. Hoyt were untrue is sustained by the testimony of the witness Higby. This witness testified, not only that the machine was not as represented, but that Hoyt himself had admitted this to be the case. He also testified, without objection, to an effort of Hoyt to induce him to join in furthering other sales based upon an improved machine. In speaking of the improved machine Hoyt said: "This is a good looking machine. It has got lots of wheels and lots of screws. It will sell, won't it?" As an inducement to the witness to join in this venture, Hoyt said to him: "We want to make some money, don't we?" If the new and improved machine was open to the comment made by Hoyt, it might well be inferred that the unimproved one failed to justify the statements made by him to plaintiff in regard to it. This manner of speaking of the improved machine and the conversation of Hoyt in this connection gave color to all of the projects to sell stock based upon the value of his inventions.

Appellant's other assignment of insufficiency of the evidence to support a finding of the court, to wit, that plaintiff was induced to enter into the contract by the representations of Hoyt, is equally unsupported by the record. The evidence abundantly shows that the moving inducement to plaintiff was that defendant was the inventor and the corporation the owner of a perfected machine which it had been demonstrated would successfully take out the fine flour gold from the dirt and the gravel, and that this machine had advanced beyond the experimental stage. These statements were untrue, and plaintiff had neither knowledge, experience, nor independent advice by which to determine their truth or falsity when she purchased the stock. That she saw the machine in Los Angeles is in no way inconsistent with this, and does not show, as appellants contend, that she was fully acquainted with the condition of the company and its affairs at the time she bought. The financial condition of the corporation was not the inducement presented to her when solicited to purchase the stock. It was the ability of the machine, which the corporation owned, to do certain work that gave the value to the shares of stock purchased, and as to this she relied upon Hoyt's representations.

We see no prejudicial error in the court's sustaining the objection of plaintiff to the question propounded by defendants to the witness Deck. This witness, who was called on behalf of defendants, had testified in his direct examination that the machine was defective in certain respects. Notwithstanding this, defendants asked him whether or not, considering the principle on which the machine was constructed, he considered the machine a perfect one when he first saw it. The court sustained an objection to this question, which is assigned as error. The representation to the plaintiff was that it was a perfected machine as a matter of practical demonstration, and not that it was theoretically perfect, although mechanically a failure. The answer called for covered no issue in the case and the ruling of the court was correct.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record, the judgment and order are affirmed.

1. STATUTES (§ 90*)—SUBJECT TO GENERAL LAWS—MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS—WHAT CITIES ARE EXCEPTED.

Under Const. art. 11, § 6, as amended in 1896, providing that cities and towns shall not be created by special laws, but shall be subject to and controlled by general laws, but two classes of municipal corporations are relieved from the control of general law in municipal affairs, those cities organized by special legislative charter prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1879, and cities operating under a "freeholder's charter," but other cities organized under the municipal corporations act, are subject to general laws even in municipal affairs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 98–100; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

2. COURTS (§ 472*)—CONFERRING JURISDICTION —EXCLUSIVE JURISDICTION IS NOT TO BE INFERRED.

Where jurisdiction is conferred upon a court or a body to exercise judicial fuctions, exclusive jurisdiction is not to be inferred, except where the language is so plain as to show the legislative intent in that regard.

3. ELECTIONS (§ 275*)—ELECTION CONTESTS—COMMON COUNCIL—CONCURRENT JURISDICTION WITH SUPERIOR COURT.

The jurisdiction given common councils of cities of the sixth class organized under the municipal corporations act to determine election contests is not an exclusive jurisdiction, but is concurrent with that of the superior court.

John H. Dawson against the Superior Court of the County of Kings, State of California, and John G. Covert, as judge thereof. On application for writ of prohibition. Writ denied.

Maurice E. Power, Dixon L. Phillips, and J. L. C. Irwin, for petitioner. H. Scott Jacobs and Choynski & Humphreys, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This application as presented is based upon the theory, first, that cities organized under the municipal corporations act are not subordinate to general law with reference to municipal affairs; and, second, that the general municipal corporations act, which by its terms confers jurisdiction upon the city councils of the respective cities organized thereunder to hear and determine election contests, is the exclusive jurisdiction in that regard. With neither of these propositions do we agree.

Our Supreme Court in Ex parte Helm, 143 Cal. 556, 77 Pac. 453, has construed section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution of this state, as amended in 1896, to the effect that but two classes of municipal corporations are relieved from the control of general law in municipal affairs, these being those cities organized by special legislative charter prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1879, and cities operating under what is denominated a freeholder's charter, that other cities organized and operated under the municipal corporations act are subject and subordinate to general laws even in municipal affairs. As to the jurisdiction of the common council to hear and determine election contests, we are of opinion that it is but a jurisdiction concurrent with the superior court conferred by the Constitution and laws of the state. A long line of decisions tends to establish the proposition that where jurisdiction is conferred upon a court or a body to exercise judicial functions exclusive jurisdiction is not to be inferred, and is only to be so regarded where the language is so plain as to show the legislative intent in that regard. We see nothing in the municipal corporations act which confers upon common councils of cities of the sixth class organized thereunder authority to hear and determine election contests as in any sense conferring exclusive jurisdiction.

(Supreme Court of California. June 23, 1910.)

COURTS (§ 207*)—APPELLATE COURTS—ORIGINAL JURISDICTION—WRIT OF PROHIBITION.

Where an application for writ of prohibition is denied by the District Court of Appeal on the merits, the Supreme Court will not thereafter entertain an application for the writ, since under the Constitution the district court has concurrent jurisdiction with the Supreme Court in such cases, and hence that decision would be a bar to the application; the only way of obtaining the intervention of the Supreme Court being by a transfer of the cause to the Supreme Court for reconsideration.

In Banc. Petition in the Supreme Court by John H. Dawson against the Superior Court of the County of Kings for a writ of prohibition. Writ denied.

Dixon L. Phillips, J. L. C. Irwin, Maurice E. Power, and Robert W. Miller, for petitioner. H. Scott Jacobs and Choynski & Humphreys, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It appears in this case that an application for a writ of prohibition against the respondent was made to the District Court of Appeal of the Second District on May 23, 1910, that an alternative writ was issued therein, and that on June 13, 1910, the said district court gave judgment denying the application on its merits (110 Pac. 479). Under the Constitution the district court has concurrent jurisdiction with the Supreme Court in original proceedings of this character. A judgment by that court is therefore an adjudication of the matters set forth in the petition. If this court should entertain a distinct application of the same character, the petitioner would be met by an answer alleging the former adjudication in the district court, and that adjudication would be a bar. In such cases, if the applicant desires the intervention of this court in the matter, the only effectual method of obtaining it is by application for a transfer of the case to this court for a reconsideration and decision. If the district court had decided the case without an adjudication upon the merits, perhaps its judgment would not be a bar, but petitioner's application shows that the adjudication of that court was a decision upon the merits.

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1910.)

1. Elections (§ 126*) — Primary Election Law — Misconduct of Officers — Correction—Courts—Jurisdiction.

St. 1909, c. 405, § 27, provides that, when it appears by affidavit to the Supreme Court or District Court of Appeal or superior court of a proper county that an error has occurred or is about to occur in the placing of any name on an official primary election ballot, that any error has been or is about to be committed in printing such ballot, or that any wrongful act has been or is about to be done by any primary election officer, or that any neglect of duty has occurred or is about to occur, such court shall order the person charged forthwith to correct the error or show cause. Held, that such section conferred concurrent jurisdiction on such courts to correct by a summary proceeding any misconduct of the officers charged with the duty of carrying out the provisions of the law, but that it was essential that the act objected to constituted a violation of the duty enjoined or a refusal to perform such duty.

2. Elections (§ 126*)—Primary Election—Nomination by Petition—Competency of Signers.

Under the primary election law (St. 1909, c. 405, § 4), providing that, where nominations are by petition, the county clerk or register shall compare the signatures with the registry list and disregard any name appearing on such paper which is not on the court register in his office, a county clerk is under no duty to compare signers of different petitions for the same office to see that a signer of one petition has not subsequently signed another, and is for that reason disqualified under the provision forbidding each signer of a nomination paper to sign another for the same office.

3. Elections (§ 126*)—Primary Elections—Nominating Petitions—Validity.

Under the primary election law (St. 1909, c. 405), providing for nominations by petition, and forbidding each signer of a nomination paper to sign another for the same office, but providing only a penalty for violation of its provisions, a nomination petition was not invalid so as to deprive the candidate of his right to have his name entered on the official primary ballot by reason of the fact that so many signers of his petition had also signed another petition for the same office, so that their rejection would leave less than the required number of petitioners to sustain his petition.

In Bank. Application by Henry M. McDonald for a writ of mandamus against Charles F. Curry, Secretary of State, and others. Petition denied.

Sidney M. Van Wyck, Jr., for petitioner.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an application based upon the provisions of section 27 of the recently enacted primary nomination law. St. 1909, p. 691. The prayer of the petition is for an order directed to the defendants Curry and Keyes requiring them and each of them to desist from placing the name of defendant Martin Bekins upon the official primary ballot as candidate for the Democratic nomination for state senator from the Thirty-Eighth senatorial district. The allegations of the petition show that the petitioner, McDonald, possesses all the qualifications entitling him to hold said office, and that he is a candidate for said nomination; that on July 14th he filed with defendant Keyes, as county clerk, certain petitions nominating him as such candidate, and that said Keyes on the same day certified that of the names signed to said petitions 460 were names of voters properly registered at the date of signing; and that they constituted more than the requisite 3 per cent. of the Democratic vote cast at the last presidential election. It is further shown that said Martin Bekins is also a candidate for the same nomination, and that on July 12th he filed petitions nominating him as such candidate; that on July 14th said Keyes certified that the number of names signed to said petitions was only 154 registered voters, but that they were more than 3 per cent. of the Democratic vote in said district at said last election. Both of these certificates, together with the nominating petitions, were forwarded to and duly filed in the office of the Secretary of State. It is alleged that of the 154 electors whose names are signed to the Bekins petitions 96 were disqualified by reason of the fact that they had previously signed for this petitioner, and consequently that said Bekins had only 58 qualified signers where 130 were necessary to entitle him to a place on the primary ballot. Upon these grounds, the petitioner lodged with the defendant, Curry, a protest against the filing of the Bekins petitions, but his protest was disregarded, and said defendant is about to issue a certificate to the effect that said Bekins has filed in his office a regular and proper nominating petition, etc. And it is alleged that the defendant Keyes threatens to, and will, unless restrained, place the name of Martin Bekins on the Democratic primary ticket as a candidate for the Democratic nomination for state senator from the Thirty-Eighth district, thereby involving the petitioner—the only legitimate candidate—in a costly and unnecessary contest for a nomination.

Section 27 of said act (St. 1909, p. 709) reads as follows: "Whenever it shall be made to appear by affidavit to the Supreme Court or District Court of Appeal or superior court of the proper county that an error or omission has occurred or is about to occur in the placing of any name on an official primary election ballot, that any error has been or is about to be committed in printing such ballot, or that any wrongful act has been or is about to be done by any judge or clerk of a primary election, county clerk, registrar of voters in any city and county, canvassing board or any member thereof, or other person charged with any duty concerning the primary election, or that any neglect of duty has occurred or is about to occur, such court shall order the officer or person charged with such error, wrong or neglect to forthwith correct the error, desist from the wrongful act or perform the duty, or forthwith show cause why he should not do so. Any person who shall fail to obey the order of such court shall be cited forthwith to show cause why he shall not be adjudged in contempt of court."

It will be seen that by this section a very ample concurrent jurisdiction has been conferred upon this court, the District Courts of Appeal, and the superior courts to correct by a summary proceeding any misconduct of the officers charged with the duty of carrying out the provisions of the law, and the first question to be considered is whether the Secretary of State or the county clerk has done anything contrary to law or omitted to do anything that the law enjoins upon him as a duty, or whether he is intending or threatening to do what the law forbids. We cannot see that either of the two officers has done or neglected to do anything that the law enjoins on the one hand, or forbids on the other. Assuming the truth of all that is alleged in the petition, they have simply observed the statutory requirements. It is true that "each signer of a nomination paper" is forbidden to sign another for the same office, but it is no part of the duty of the county clerk or registrar to compare the signatures to the different nomination petitions for a particular office to see whether the same person has signed more than one. All he is required to do is to compare the nomination papers with the registry list, and all the discretion conferred upon him is to "disregard any name appearing upon such paper or papers which is not on the great register in his office." If the papers answer this test, he is required in case of a state or congressional or district or legislative office to forward them promptly to the Secretary of State, with his certificate to that effect. St. 1909, § 4, p. 694. If, instead of doing this, he should assume to purge a set of nomination papers by throwing out those petitions signed by electors disqualified by reason of the fact that they had first signed for another candidate, he would be usurping a power, and neglecting a duty at the same time. No such duty being imposed, it cannot be imported into the law upon the ground that the Legislature must have so intended. And, besides, there are various considerations upon which the Legislature may have omitted ex industria any provision for visiting upon candidates the faults of electors. No great harm is done if a candidate who has in good faith secured the signatures of a sufficient number of electors to entitle him to a place on the primary ballot should be allowed that advantage notwithstanding the fact that enough of his signers were disqualified by signing for other candidates to deprive him, if their petitions were disregarded, of the requisite percentage of his party vote. The principal reason for limiting as the statute intends to limit the number of candidates whose names are to be printed on the ballot is to prevent the appearance of so many names as to make it confusing to the voters or too unwieldy for use, and it could rarely, if ever, happen that either result would be brought about by the violation on the part of electors of the inhibition against signing more than once for the same office. Aside from the inconvenience to be apprehended from a contingency which, in view of the penal consequences of a violation of the law, is so remote, every consideration of policy and justice is in favor of having printed on the ballot the names of all candidates who have in good faith complied with the conditions upon which the privilege depends. If the names of disqualified electors are signed to an essential number of their papers, they have no means of discovering the defect until too late to remedy it.

Whatever the clerk or registrar may be able to discover by a comparison of the several papers after they have been filed, the candidate has no means of discovering such defects except by comparing his petition with the register of voters, and, if by that test it is sufficient, it is scarcely just that he should be excluded from a place on the ballot by reason of a latent defect in his nomination papers wholly due to the misconduct, or possibly to the deliberate fraud, of the very electors whose previous petitions are to be counted for his competitor. And, if it is not just to the candidate that he should pay the penalty of a fault not his own, it is equally certain that no public policy requires its infliction. With his name on the primary ballot he only competes on perfectly fair and equal terms with others who are in the same advantageous position. If he is defeated, no harm is done. If he is nominated, it proves that he is the candidate having the largest following in his party, and that by his nomination the purpose of the law has been accomplished, when the purpose and policy of the law might have been subverted by the omission of his name from the official ballot.

Whether upon these or other considerations the Legislature may have deliberately omitted to provide any other safeguard than the penal clauses of the statute against the minor and improbable inconvenience of having here and there an extra name printed on the ballot, or whether the omission was due to oversight, the result is the same. Under the law the Secretary of State and the several county clerks and registrars are invested with merely ministerial functions, and their duties in respect to the preparation of the official ballots to be used at the primary election are exactly prescribed. They are only obeying the law in placing the name of Bekins on the ballot, and they cannot be commanded to do otherwise. No harm to the public and no wrong to any individual results from this conclusion—freedom of choice on the part of the electors is enlarged instead of being curtailed, and the inconvenience involved, if any, is trifling.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1910.)

1. ACCOUNT STATED (§ 6*)—DUTY TO ACCOUNT—COMPLAINT.

Where, after an indebtedness, for which certain property had been pledged in trust for the creditor bank, had been running for a considerable time, plaintiff received from the trustee, who was the bank's cashier, a statement that there was then due the bank $6,000, whereupon plaintiff executed his note for that amount, received a reconveyance of certain land which had been conveyed to the trustee as security and deposited certain other securities in place thereof, such transaction constituted a settlement of account between the parties as of the date thereof, precluding plaintiff, in the absence of fraud, from thereafter maintaining a bill for an accounting as to prior transactions connected with the indebtedness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. §§ 30–40; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. TRUSTS (§§ 17, 18*)—PAROL TRUSTS—DUTY OF TRUSTEE.

Where plaintiff conveyed certain land to the cashier of a bank by an absolute deed subject to a parol trust that the same should be held as security for plaintiff's indebtedness to the bank, and that the land should be sold by the trustee and the proceeds applied on the debt, the trust was void for want of writing required by Civ. Code, § 852, in the absence of facts raising an implied or constructive trust, and hence the trustee was under no obligation to plaintiff to prevent a sale of the land for taxes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Dec. Dig. §§ 17, 18.*]

3. TRUSTS (§ 261*)—DEFAULT OF TRUSTEE—BILL.

Where a complaint against a trustee of certain land for failure to prevent a sale of the land for taxes, did not aver that the title was lost by the trustee's failure to pay the taxes and did not allege a divestiture of title as plaintiff would have been required to do if he had been seeking to establish a title in himself on the proceedings to forfeit title for nonpayment of taxes, it was fatally defective.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

4. TAXATION (§ 809*)—TAX TITLE—PLEADING.

Whenever a tax title is specially alleged in a pleading, every fact should be averred which is required to show that each of the statutory requirements have been complied with.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 809.*]

5. TRUSTS (§ 261*)—TRUSTEE—LOSS BY TRUSTEE'S NEGLIGENCE.

Where plaintiff conveyed to an alleged trustee as security for loans a contract for the purchase of state school lands, and claimed that the trustee was negligent in permitting a foreclosure of the contract by the state for failure to pay installments of the price as they matured, a complaint alleging the recovery of a judgment of forfeiture by the state, but failing to show the date of the judgment or to contain any averment that at the time the land was reconveyed to plaintiff by the trustee the judgment of foreclosure had become final, was demurrable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

6. FRAUD (§ 44*)—DECEIT—COMPLAINT—LOSS.

Where plaintiff conveyed certain land to a bank cashier as security for a debt to the bank, and thereafter accepted a reconveyance in exchange for a deposit of other securities, on the alleged representation that the title reconveyed was the same as that conveyed to the cashier by plaintiff, a complaint for fraud in that the title to part of the land had been lost because of nonpayment of taxes, and that the balance had been forfeited by the state, failing to show that the title had been actually lost in such proceedings, was demurrable.

7. PLEADING (§ 49*) — PLEDGE — SALE BY PLEDGEE—THEORY OF COMPLAINT.

Where a pledgor of certain corporate stock as security for a debt sued for the alleged conversion thereof, but the complaint did not clearly show whether plaintiff relied on a sale of the stock for less than its real value, or on a pretended sale thereof by the pledgee to itself, the complaint was demurrable under Code Civ. Proc. § 426, requiring that the complaint shall contain a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Joseph M. Kinley against E. Thelen and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants after the sustaining of a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hammack, Noyes & Hammack, for appellant. Haines & Haines and Max Thelen, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Demurrers interposed by defendants to plaintiff's second amended complaint, as amended, were sustained, and, leave to further amend not being asked, judgment was given in favor of defendants. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The complaint in question, which is somewhat voluminous, may be summarized as follows. The defendant People's State Bank of National City is a banking corporation doing business in San Diego county, and the defendant Thelen a director of said bank and its cashier and general managing officer. From 1891 to 1906 plaintiff was the owner and holder of 60 shares of the capital stock of the bank and a depositor therein. He was the owner in fee of certain lands, to wit, "320 acres in Uvalde county, Texas, in the Jonathan Golden survey made in 1848," which land he is unable to describe more definitely; of an interest in a described 80-acre tract of land in San Diego county, holding a certificate of purchase thereof from the state of California and having made partial payment thereon; and also of four other tracts of land (undescribed) in San Diego county, aggregating 310 acres. About the year 1892 it was agreed between plaintiff and the defendant bank that the bank should from time to time make loans to plaintiff upon the security of said 60 shares of stock and certain notes and demands owned by plaintiff, as well as the real property above mentioned. It was agreed by plaintiff, Thelen, and the bank that Thelen was to be a trustee of both the bank and plaintiff, and the personal property was to be received by him as such trustee, and deeds of the real property should be executed to him as such trustee, but be absolute in form. It was further agreed that Thelen should, as occasion might offer, sell said real estate and apply the proceeds to the payment of plaintiff's indebtedness, and that any sums collected on the notes and demands due the plaintiff should be applied in the same way. It was also agreed that out of the funds so received by Thelen as trustee he should pay the taxes on all said lands and the deferred payments on the 80-acre tract of land in San Diego. Said agreement was made on the part of said bank by Thelen as its cashier and general managing officer, and the said bank in pursuance of said agreement made the loans as set out. The agreement on the part of the bank to loan said sums and of Thelen to act as trustee, and of the plaintiff to deliver said collaterals and to receive said sums, were in parol. Thereupon the plaintiff executed and delivered to Thelen conveyances of all the real estate referred to, and plaintiff also delivered to Thelen the notes and demands aforesaid duly indorsed and transferred so as to enable him to collect the same. At the time of making said deeds and turning over said notes and demands plaintiff made a statement in writing addressed to Thelen as cashier of said bank, stating, in substance, that plaintiff turned over said deeds and said notes and accounts as collateral in conformity with the agreement aforesaid. With the exception of said written memorandum the agreement with Thelen and the bank was in parol.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Thereupon the said bank turned over to plaintiff a large sum of money which plaintiff alleges on information and belief to have been about $6,000, and at the same time plaintiff executed and delivered to the bank a note for the sum received by him. Under the agreement divers sums were collected by Thelen on said notes, accounts, and claims, and from time to time certain of the real estate was sold by him as such trustee, with plaintiff's consent, until all of the tracts comprising the undescribed 310 acres in San Diego county were sold, and the proceeds received by Thelen for the bank. Plaintiff is unable to state the amounts so received from collections and sales, nor the amounts applied on his indebtedness. Said collections by Thelen and the bank continued for many years until about 1905, plaintiff's indebtedness varying in amount from time to time and credits thereon being made, and new notes being given from time to time "representing the changed accounts of said indebtedness from plaintiff to the bank."

The complaint contains allegations to the effect that plaintiff removed from San Diego to San Francisco in 1904 taking with him his papers and books of account, all of which were destroyed by fire in 1906, for which reason plaintiff is unable to give the details of his indebtedness to the bank, but alleges, on information and belief, that the loans made to him at various times amounted in the aggregate to $12,000, upon which credits had been made for collections and sales, until in March, 1905, there was due from plaintiff to the bank the sum of about $4,800. It is averred that the proceeds of the sales of the 310 acres in San Diego county were properly accounted for by the trustee and the bank, as were the sums collected on the notes and accounts transferred to Thelen.

About March, 1903, Thelen, "trustee, cashier, and managing officer as aforesaid, and in his capacity as trustee, and as cashier and managing officer of said bank," informed the plaintiff that he had not been able to sell the Texas land nor the 80 acres of San Diego land, and that he still held the title to the same as conveyed to him by the plaintiff, and requested plaintiff to take a conveyance of said tracts and to place other securities in their place with the bank and the said trustee. The plaintiff, believing and relying upon such statement, took a quitclaim deed from Thelen conveying said tracts to him (the plaintiff), and delivered to Thelen as such trustee 10 bonds of the Mexican Anthracite Coal Company, a corporation, of the value of $5,000, to be held by such trustee as security for the indebtedness then unpaid. The plaintiff also executed his renewal note for $6,000, the amount of his remaining indebtedness, as represented by Thelen. At the time the two said tracts of land were so deeded to plaintiff, Thelen, as such trustee, cashier, and general managing officer, represented to plaintiff that the title thereto was still vested in said Thelen, and that by such new conveyance plaintiff was being reinvested with the same title he had held before deeding the lands to Thelen, and plaintiff accepted and received said deed in reliance upon said representations.

The plaintiff, however, avers the fact to be that, while said Texas land had been held by Thelen as trustee, Thelen and the bank "had failed and neglected to pay the state and county taxes thereon due the county of Uvalde and the state of Texas, and that on account of said neglect and failure the state of Texas had, by virtue of and under its revenue laws, caused the same to be sold for several years' delinquent taxes, which said defendant failed and neglected to pay as aforesaid; and the said defendant failing and neglecting to pay said taxes, or to redeem said land from said sales, tax deeds had been made and delivered by the proper officers of the state of Texas to the purchasers at such tax sales, and title to the land irrevocably passed under such tax sales and tax deeds and the plaintiff and said defendant had been finally divested of all interest and title in and to said Texas land." It is alleged, upon information and belief, that the taxes were assessed and levied upon said lands in the years between 1894 and 1900, and that said taxes were unpaid and became delinquent, and the land was thereupon, in the year 1899, sold by the tax collector of Uvalde county, Tex., for such delinquent taxes, and that no redemption was made, whereupon a deed was issued to the purchaser at such sale, all of which was long prior to the reconveyance by Thelen to plaintiff, and all of which was well known to said bank and said Thelen at the time of said reconveyance, and was not known to plaintiff. It is alleged that said Texas land was at all the times mentioned in the complaint of the value of $6,400.

It is further averred, upon information and belief: That while the 80 acres of San Diego land was held by Thelen as trustee the said bank and Thelen failed and neglected to pay each year the state and county taxes due thereon, and failed to make the payments accrued and accruing to the state of California on said land according to the terms of said certificate of purchase. The sum of $120, it is averred, was due on said land at the time of the conveyance by plaintiff to Thelen as trustee. After said conveyance certain payments became due and delinquent upon said contract of purchase, and Thelen as such trustee, although having full knowledge of the maturing of said payments, failed and neglected to make any of said payments, and by reason thereof the contract became delinquent and subject to foreclosure. "That afterwards, by an action in the superior court of San Diego county against the said land and against the said Thelen as trustee and as the owner and holder of said land, the interest of the said Thelen and of the plaintiff was foreclosed and sold, and the title reverted and revested in the state of California. That the foreclosure was by the usual suit in equity provided by law in such cases. That the complaint was duly filed and the summons issued and served upon the said Thelen, and he having failed to answer or plead to such complaint, such proceedings were had that a decree of foreclosure was made and entered by said court. That said land was sold at a judicial sale according to the decree of said foreclosure and was bid in by the state," whereupon the title became entirely divested from the plaintiff and the defendants and completely vested in the state of California.

The complaint alleges that the land was a part of the school lands of the state, and the foreclosure was in the manner provided by law for the foreclosure of delinquent contracts for the sale of school lands, and that the facts of such foreclosure were well known to the defendant and not known to plaintiff. The plaintiff had no knowledge or information that the title to said Texas land and San Diego land had been divested and lost until April, 1905, and he avers that it was well known to Thelen and the bank at the time of the reconveyance to plaintiff that plaintiff had no knowledge of said titles having been so lost and divested.

It is averred that all times the trustee had in his possession moneys arising from the sales of lands and from collections of notes and accounts sufficient to have made payments of installments and taxes on said San Diego land as they matured, and that at the time the Texas lands were sold for taxes and until tax deeds were made they had funds in hand from such collections and sales sufficient to have paid such taxes and to have redeemed from such sales. The plaintiff's interest in the San Diego land foreclosed was, at the time of the foreclosure, of the value of $800.

After the execution of the deeds of reconveyance to plaintiff there remained in the hands of the trustee the said 10 bonds of the Mexican Anthracite Coal Company and 60 shares of the capital stock of the People's State Bank, which Thelen held as collateral security for the payment of the notes made by plaintiff to the bank for $6,000 or thereabouts. At the same time and at all times up to March 8, 1908, Thelen, as such cashier, trustee, and managing officer, was empowered and authorized by plaintiff to sell said 60 shares for not less than $9,000. About April, 1906, Thelen and the bank sold and turned over to one E. D. Webster the said 60 shares of stock for the pretended sum of $6,000, and said shares were canceled and a new certificate issued in lieu thereof to said Webster. Plaintiff avers that all of said acts were done with the intent to wrongfully divest the plaintiff of his said stock, and plaintiff avers that said directors and said trustees had full knowledge that said stock had a much larger value than $6,000, but, notwithstanding this, Thelen and the bank reported to plaintiff that they had sold said shares for $6,000 and credited plaintiff with this sum only on his indebtedness. The pretended sale, plaintiff avers on information and belief, was not in good faith to said Webster, but was in fact for the benefit of said bank, and the said shares became the property of said bank. At the time the shares were pledged and delivered to the trustee the certificate for the same was in plaintiff's name and was indorsed by him in blank and the officers of the bank transferred said certificate to Webster, as plaintiff is informed and believes, and divested plaintiff of the title thereto. At the time of said transfer the stock was of the value of $10,000. It is alleged that the bank, and Thelen, as trustee, still hold the said 10 bonds of the said Mexican Anthracite Coal Company and also certain notes executed by plaintiff although the plaintiff is not indebted to the defendant bank in any sum. After the discovery by plaintiff of the foregoing facts he made demand on the bank and Thelen as trustee to return the shares of bank stock or pay him the difference between $6,000 and the real value of the shares, and to return to him the 10 bonds of the Mexican Anthracite Coal Company or the value thereof, and to deliver to him the same title to the Texas land and the San Diego land which he had conveyed to Thelen, or to pay him the value thereof, and that a full accounting be had to plaintiff of the said trusteeship and of all the property received thereunder; that the defendants refused to do this or any of the things so demanded. The prayer is for an accounting of such trusteeship, that any balance be delivered and returned to plaintiff, that it be adjudged that the bank is chargeable with the full value of the bank stock, that the bonds of the Mexican Anthracite Coal Company or their value be returned to plaintiff, that the lands be restored to plaintiff with the same title which he conveyed by the trustee or that said trustee and bank account to plaintiff therefor, that any balance due plaintiff be paid, and in case any sum is found to be due the bank from plaintiff that said sum be ascertained and a proper decree be rendered in relation thereto. The defendants filed separate demurrers. Each of the demurrers stated the general ground of want of facts, and in addition specified a number of particular objections. Some of the more important of these will be mentioned in the course of the discussion.

The complaint contains a mass of averments having no substantial relation to any cause of action that appears. Indeed, it is difficult to extract from the extended narration of the pleading a definite idea of the cause of action which plaintiff intended to set up. The consideration of the various points may be clarified if, adopting the suggestion of one of the respondents, we first undertake to ascertain what causes of action are not stated. In the first place, the complaint does not show grounds for an accounting. While the plaintiff alleges at some length his ignorance of the various items of debit and credit arising during the earlier years of the transactions, it appears that in March, 1903, Thelen represented to plaintiff that his indebtedness was $6,000, and that plaintiff gave his note for such sum. At the same time the lands unsold were reconveyed to plaintiff, and he turned over the 10 bonds of the Mexican Anthracite Coal Company. These bonds, with the 60 shares of bank stock, remained in Thelen's hands as security, and, apparently, as the sole security, for the $6,000 note. Indeed, the plaintiff expressly avers that the trust was properly executed so far as the 310 acres of San Diego land and the notes and accounts were concerned. There is no averment that any part of the indebtedness represented by the $6,000 note has ever been paid. There appears, therefor, to be no occasion for an accounting. Plaintiff's debt was, in 1903, fixed by the agreement of the parties, and certain security for that debt was then given, or had theretofore been given. Whatever uncertainty may have existed, regarding the earlier dealings of the parties, all doubts were resolved by the giving of the last note. This transaction constituted a settlement of account between the parties and the plaintiff, after acquiescing in that settlement, will not, in the absence of a charge of fraud or mistake, be permitted to reopen questions which were then closed. No such charge is made. Furthermore, there is no allegation that the statement of Thelen concerning the amount of plaintiff's indebtedness was not, in fact, entirely correct. Nor does there appear to be any occasion for an accounting with respect to the bank's dealings with the security following the giving of the $6,000 note. The amount of damage sustained by reason of the wrongful sale of the bank stock is not unknown to plaintiff. He alleges that the shares were worth $10,000 and that they were sold for $6,000. If this sale was unauthorized, the damage was $4,000.

Again, if the intent of the pleader was to seek redress for the violation of the trustee's obligation to make the deferred payments on the San Diego school land, and to pay taxes on this and the Texas land, the complaint does not state a cause of action in this behalf. These lands were conveyed to Thelen by a deed absolute. The agreements of Thelen and the bank were, it is expressly averred, in parol. The only writing was one signed by the plaintiff. But no express trust in relation to real property is valid unless created or declared "(1) by a written instrument subscribed by the trustee, or by his agent thereto authorized by writing"; or "(2) by the instrument under which the trustee claims the estate affected." Civ. Code, § 852. The mere conveyance of the land imposed upon the defendants no duty to make payments of taxes or other claims against the land. The foundation of that duty was the agreement of trust. Such agreement, being in parol, is not enforceable in the absence of a statement of facts giving rise to an implied or constructive trust. Barr v. O'Donnell, 76 Cal. 469, 18 Pac. 429, 9 Am. St. Rep. 242; Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 525, 21 Pac. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162; Hasshagen v. Hasshagen, 80 Cal. 514, 22 Pac. 294; Babcock v. Chase, 111 Cal. 351, 43 Pac. 1105; Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 58 Pac. 543. A further objection to the complaint, viewing it as one based on the failure of the defendants to protect plaintiff's title in the San Diego school lands and the Texas land, is the want of sufficient averments that the title was lost by want of payment. No injury accrued to plaintiff unless the title was divested in consequence of Thelen's neglect. It was necessary, therefore, for plaintiff to show such divestiture as fully as he would have been required to do if he had been seeking to establish in himself a title resting upon the proceedings to forfeit title for nonpayment of taxes or other dues. "Whenever a tax title is specially set forth in a pleading, it is necessary that every fact should be averred which is requisite to show that each of the statutory provisions has been complied with." Russell v. Mann, 22 Cal. 131. See, also, Himmelman v. Danos, 35 Cal. 441; Perine v. Forbush, 97 Cal. 305, 309, 32 Pac. 226. So far as the tax sales are concerned the complaint states no facts, but only conclusions of law, purporting to show the validity of the proceedings, which, as plaintiff claims, took away the title to the lands. With respect to the foreclosure of the San Diego lands at the suit of the state, the recovery of a judgment is alleged, but its date is not given, nor is there any averment that it has or had at the time of the reconveyance, become final. (This objection is made a ground of special demurrer by one of the defendants.)

The failure to properly show a loss of title furnishes, further, an answer to the claim that the complaint sets forth a cause of action for damages for the fraud committed in representing to plaintiff that the title to the Texas and San Diego lands held by Thelen was the title which had been conveyed to him. An essential part of such action is an averment of the falsity of the representation relied upon.

The only causes of action alleged, if any, are, then, one for the recovery from Thelen of the 10 bonds of the Mexican Anthracite Coal Company, held as security for a debt which has been paid, and one for damages for the wrongful sale of the 60 shares of bank stock. The latter is stated in a confused way, leaving it doubtful whether the plaintiff relies upon a sale to Webster for a sum less than the real value, or upon a pretended sale to the bank itself. The demurrers, which specify a great many objections, point out this defect. In addition, the demurrers are directed to a number of other grounds of criticism of the complaint. It will not be necessary to discuss these in detail. The analysis already made will sufficiently show that there is an almost hopeless jumble of allegations of facts, many of which are immaterial to any cause of action stated, with conclusions of law. The demurrers were clear and direct in pointing the attention of court and counsel to the uncertainties, misjoinders of causes of action, and other defects in the pleading. The complaint required radical amendment before it could conform to the Code requirement that it should contain "a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action, in ordinary and concise language." Code Civ. Proc. § 426. The original complaint had already been followed by a first and a second amended complaint, and the second had itself been amended. It appears that leave to further amend was not asked. Under these circumstances, we are satisfied that the court below was justified in sustaining the demurrers, and, having sustained them, in ordering judgment in favor of the defendants.

The judgment is affirmed.

WALNUT IRR. DIST. v. BURKE et al.

(L. A. 2,526.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 1, 1910.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 162*)—JUDGMENT—SATISFACTION IN PART—RIGHT TO APPEAL.

In general, if a party to a judgment accepts payment or satisfaction of a part thereof which is favorable to him, and that part is such that the part adverse to him cannot be reversed without affecting the part satisfied, and requiring a reversal of that part also, the party so accepting satisfaction is estopped to appeal from those parts of the judgment which are adverse.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 162*)—JUDGMENT—SATISFACTION IN PART—RIGHT TO APPEAL.

Where a party to a judgment accepts satisfaction of a portion thereof which is favorable to him, he is not thereby estopped to appeal from the adverse portion in order to increase the amount of the recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 988; Dec. Dig. § 162.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 162*)—JUDGMENT—SATISFACTION IN PART—RIGHT TO APPEAL.

Where defendants recovered a judgment for costs, their acceptance of a payment of the costs did not estop them from appealing from so much of the judgment as was adverse to them; it appearing that a reversal on such appeal would not necessitate a new trial, but only a modification of the judgment, eliminating erroneous conditions to which defendants objected.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Geo. H. Hutton, Judge.

See, also, 110 Pac. 518.

Edw. L. Payne, for appellants. Stephens & Stephens, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is a motion by the plaintiff to dismiss the defendants' appeal from the judgment.

The controversy involved in the case is the respective rights of the plaintiff and defendants in the use of certain water diverted from the San Gabriel river. The judgment of the court below is that each party is entitled to a certain portion of the water, to be used in a certain manner at specified times, and that each be enjoined from interfering with the use of the water to which the other is entitled. It is also adjudged that the defendants recover of the plaintiff their costs laid out in the action. After the decision was filed, the defendants filed a memorandum of their costs. Before the judgment was drawn or entered, the plaintiff paid and the defendants accepted the amount of the costs as stated in said memorandum. The defendants have appealed from the judgment "and from each and every part, and the whole thereof." The ground of the plaintiff's motion to dismiss the appeal is that by the acceptance of payment of the costs awarded to them by the judgment the defendants are estopped and barred from prosecuting an appeal from the whole, or any part of the judgment, of which the judgment for costs is a part.

There is no doubt that the general rule is that if a party to a judgment accepts payment or satisfaction of a part thereof which is favorable to him, and that part is of such a character that the part adverse to him cannot be reversed without affecting the part which is in his favor and requiring the reversal of that part also, the party so accepting the fruits of a part of the judgment in his favor is estopped from prosecuting an appeal from those parts which are against him. Turner v. Markham, 152 Cal. 246, 92 Pac. 485, and cases there cited.

The following statement of the rule, taken from Baylies on New Trials, p. 18, sec. 7, has been approved by this court: "If all the provisions of a judgment are connected and dependent, so that a part cannot be reversed without a reversal of the whole, a party cannot proceed to enforce such portions of the judgment as are in his favor, and appeal from the part which is against him. In such case the right to proceed on the judgment and enjoy its fruits, and the right to appeal, are not concurrent, but wholly inconsistent, and an election to assert one right is a waiver and renunciation of the other." Storke v. Storke, 132 Cal. 353, 64 Pac. 578. This suggests that there may be exceptions. As to these the court, in San Bernardino Co. v. Riverside Co., 135 Cal. 620, 67 Pac. 1048, says: "A limitation to this rule exists where a reversal of the judgment or order cannot affect the right of the party to the benefit which he has secured thereby; as, for example, where there is no controversy as to his right for the amount for which the judgment was given, but he claims that he was entitled to a greater amount. In such a case he is not precluded from an appeal, even though he has received the amount awarded to him." In 2 Cyc. 653, one of the exceptions is thus stated: "So an appellant, by the collection of a judgment in his favor, will not be estopped from appealing for the purpose of modifying the judgment so as to increase the amount of his recovery—as where the judgment allows a counterclaim, makes a deduction for usurious interest, for the value of improvements, or disallows certain items of account,"—citing New Rochelle, etc., Co. v. Van Benschoten, 47 App. Div. 477, 62 N. Y. Supp. 398; Monnet v. Merz (Super.) 17 N. Y. Supp. 380; Beals v. Lewis, 43 Ohio St. 222, 1 N. E. 641; Clay v. Miller, 7 Ky. 461, and Bryam v. Polk Co., 76 Iowa, 75, 40 N. W. 102. These cases support the text. See, also, Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 8, 2 Sup. Ct. 25, 27 L. Ed. 346; Knapp v. Brown, 45 N. Y. 210.

The appeal in this case is from the whole of the judgment. If the judgment should be reversed for a new trial, the judgment for the costs which defendants have received would be vacated, and their ultimate right thereto would depend upon the result of the new trial. The appeal, in that event, would directly affect their right to that which they have accepted, they would be estopped from prosecuting it, and the court would necessarily refuse such relief or dismiss the appeal. But this would not be true, if the relief which the defendants seek by their appeal can be given by a modification of the judgment, eliminating therefrom the part which was erroneously adjudged against them, leaving the remainder in force. A reversal for that purpose would not require a new trial nor affect their right to the costs already received. No injustice would thereby be done to the plaintiff. It will have paid that which it should have paid, and no more. Under the rules above stated there would be no estoppel, and the appeal may be retained, unless upon an examination of the merits it appears that a new trial must be ordered. The appeal has been submitted in department on the merits. The matter will there be determined upon the principles here stated.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is referred to the court in department, to be there further considered and decided.

Where the owner of an irrigation water right in the use of water from a common dam and ditch was entitled to water to irrigate 60 acres of a certain tract, he was entitled to use such right to irrigate a similar quantity of other land pursuant to such right, involving a mere change of the place of use, and no injury to any other person interested in the water.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Geo. H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by the Walnut Irrigation District against J. H. Burke and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 110 Pac. 517.

Edw. L. Payne, for appellants. Stephens & Stephens, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the defendants from the judgment. The principal points urged for a reversal are that certain findings are not supported by the evidence and are not within the issues, and that certain parts of the judgment are not justified by the evidence.

Prior to 1882 a number of landowners in the San Gabriel valley had severally acquired rights to divert water from the San Gabriel river and use the same upon their respective tracts of land for irrigation and domestic purposes. Among them the defendant J. H. Burke owned 190 acres, known as the "Barton place," and had the right to enough water for 60 acres thereof. In that year they made a written agreement under which they thereafter diverted the water and conducted it to their respective tracts of land by means of a common dam and ditch, operated by a zanjero or superintendent at common expense. The aggregate area of land thus watered was 1,204 acres, and each owner was entitled to a proportion of the common water equal to his proportionate part of the land entitled to water. The total quantity of water to which all were entitled was never definitely fixed, except that it was an amount sufficient for 1,204 acres, but each was entitled to a share of the water sufficient for a fixed number of acres, being a proportion of the whole equal to the proportion that area bore to the whole area. Burke also owned another tract of 75 acres, known as the "Stockton place." About the year 1889, he began using his share of the common water upon the Stockton place, and thereafter he continued using it upon either place, as he chose, and acquired the right to do so; taking, however, no more water than before, but merely to that extent, changing the place of its use. As this caused no injury to any other person then interested in the water, he had a right to make the change. Southern C. I. Co. v. Wilshire, 144 Cal. 72, 77 Pac. 767, and cases there cited; Southside I. Co. v. Burson, 147 Cal. 410, 81 Pac. 1107. In 1899 he conveyed the Stockton place to the defendant Osborn Burke, with the right to receive and use thereon all the water of the 60-acre right that was not used on the Barton place. In 1902 the owners of these water rights and ditch organized a corporation, the Standifer Ditch Company, to act as an agency for the management and control of the ditch and the diversion and distribution of the water among the landowners, according to their respective rights. The water rights were not conveyed to the corporation, but it was given, and has ever since exercised, the control and management thereof. The defendants still retain the rights thus acquired. After the entry of the judgment in the court below J. H. Burke died, and his executors have been substituted as defendants in his place.

In making the diversion and distribution of water under these rights, it generally happened that the amount turned in at the dam would not all be used, and sometimes more was taken than was necessary. The Barton place was at the lower terminus of the common ditch. The surplus and unused water was sometimes turned into a wasteway conducting it back to the river channel, and sometimes sold to other landowners below Burke's land. The Walnut Irrigation District, plaintiff herein, was organized under the irrigation district statute with a view of using such surplus. It acquired the right to all this surplus water and also an interest as tenant in common with the Standifer Ditch Company, in the headworks and dam on the San Gabriel river at the head of the Standifer ditch, and in the main ditch leading therefrom to the upper boundary of the Barton place. It also acquired the right to the use of the ditch of Burke through his lands, (though not, so far as appears, the fee therein), subject to Burke's right to use it for his 60-acre water right, and, with Burke's consent, enlarged it, and uses it to carry this surplus water to the lands served with water by the district. The Stockton place is within the limits of the district.

Differences arose between the plaintiff and the defendants in relation to the right of the defendants to use the water of the 60-acre water right from the Standifer ditch upon the Stockton place, the defendants asserting the right, the plaintiff denying it. The plaintiff's claim is that, if any of the water is used on the Stockton place, it is to be considered as part of the surplus water belonging to the district, and must be accounted for as such and the district rates paid therefor. It does not claim any part of the water belonging to the 60-acre water right of Burke that may be used on the Barton place. That is conceded to Burke, but it asserts that, when such water passes below the Barton place, it immediately becomes "surplus" water and belongs to the district. The object of this action is to obtain a judgment to that effect, and to enjoin the use of water of the 60-acre water right on the Stockton place. Osborn Burke has a right in common with others owning land therein to receive water from the district for use upon 25 acres of the Stockton place. This is alleged, admitted, and adjudged. No question arises concerning it upon this appeal. The complaint also asks further that, if the court should find that defendants have a right in the water in excess of the rights conceded to them, then that the judgment shall so regulate the use under such right that its exercise shall not interfere with the rights of the plaintiff.

The pleadings, findings, and judgment state and declare the rights of the respective parties, as above stated, the findings and judgment being in favor of the defendants upon the points in controversy, as aforesaid. The evidence fully sustains the findings and judgment, in these respects. There is no conflict on the subject. So far as these rights are thus defined and declared, the defendants are content. The findings and judgment proceed further, however, to impose certain limitations and restrictions upon the manner in which the defendants shall take and use the water constituting this 60-acre water right. The defendants claim that in this they are without foundation, either in the pleadings, the evidence, or the law. We are of the opinion that the defendants' position is correct.

It is conceded that the 60-acre water right of the defendants is paramount and superior to the rights of the plaintiff. The latter confessedly extend only to the surplus remaining after the defendants' said right is supplied. As the defendants' right was acquired long before that of the plaintiff to the surplus accrued, or ever the plaintiff came into being, it follows that it was and is free from any burdens, easements, servitudes, or limitations in favor of the plaintiff. Where the owner of a paramount right to water is so situated that, without substantial injury to himself, he may use it in such a manner as to cause no injury, or little injury, to one having a subordinate and inferior right thereto, or, on the other hand, can make the same use of it with the same benefit to himself, but in a different manner and so as to cause needless injury to the owner of the inferior right, a court of equity may, in an action for that purpose, upon proper allegations of fact, give judgment imposing upon the paramount owner reasonable regulations for the use of the right, so as to prevent unnecessary injury to the inferior right. The complaint in this action contains no allegations upon which to base such relief. It concedes to the defendants the first right to the water, except in the particular above stated, and as to that the evidence and findings show that the defendants had the right to use the water on the Stockton place, as fully as they claimed. The lawful use of such first right will necessarily interfere with the use and exercise of the secondary right. It is not alleged that the defendants have made, or threaten to make, any unlawful or improper use of the disputed right which the court finds they possessed, or that the use of it as proposed will cause needless injury to the plaintiff, or that there is any different manner of use which would be equally beneficial to defendants and less injurious to the plaintiff.

The court made its findings and judgment defining the rights and customs of the Standifer Ditch Company in making distribution of the water under its control, requiring the defendant Osborn Burke to give to plaintiff 12 hours' previous notice before turning the water to the Stockton place, declaring that the defendants, even when water is abundant, shall not receive a "turn" of water, under their 60-acre water right, oftener than once every 12 days; that said right of the defendants is subject to the condition that its use shall not materially interfere with the running of water belonging to the plaintiff; and that they have no right, title, or interest in any of the water except as stated in the decree.

The custom of the Standifer Ditch Company and its stockholders in distributing and using the water belonging to the paramount right is a matter of their own discretion and convenience, and, unless a change would unduly injure subordinate rights, it may be changed at their pleasure. It is not alleged that such change is proposed, or that a different method would affect the substantial rights of the plaintiff. There was no occasion for this provision in the judgment. The provision as to notice has nothing in the evidence or pleadings to support it. The testimony shows that the Standifer ditch water is sometimes delivered oftener than once in 12 days, and there is nothing to show that the right as originally acquired was limited to runs or turns at 12-day intervals, or that the plaintiff had ever secured the right to impose such a burden or restriction upon the use of the Standifer ditch water by the defendants, or any other of the persons concerned in the Standifer water rights. These provisions were improperly inserted in the judgment, and should be stricken out. The defendants do not complain of the general clause of the decree purporting to enjoin them from in any manner interfering with the distribution of the water to which the plaintiff was declared therein to be entitled. There was, however, nothing to justify such an injunction. The only interference which it is alleged the defendants threatened, or had exercised, against the plaintiff, was no more than was necessarily involved in the exercise of the superior right of the defendants to use water of the 60-acre water right upon the Stockton place. This they had a lawful right to do. No injunction was called for to prevent an injury which has not been inflicted and is not threatened.

It is not necessary to order a new trial of the action. There was no substantial conflict in the evidence as to the facts really in issue, and there is nothing indicating that different evidence could be produced, or throwing doubt upon the facts above stated. Such of the findings as were properly made under the issues were fully proven, and they sufficiently declare the facts upon which the rights of the parties depend. The unnecessary findings may be disregarded and a new judgment may be framed, omitting the objectionable parts, as herein indicated. The seventh and twelfth paragraphs of the judgment should be omitted and the eighth and thirteenth changed so as to leave out all the restrictions upon the defendants as to the times of using the water, the manner of such use, and the requirements concerning notice to plaintiff. There are other particulars in the way of detail, which should be changed so far as necessary to make them consistent with what we have said herein.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in accordance with this opinion. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied for the reasons given in the opinion thereon by the court in bank.

EIDINGER v. SIGWART. (Civ. 687.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 977*)—TRIAL COURT —DISCRETION—NEW TRIAL.

Where there are stated in the notice of motion for a new trial several grounds upon which the court could reasonably, in the exercise of a sound discretion, grant a new trial, its order doing so will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3860–3865; Dec. Dig. § 977.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 131*) — MOTION—SPECIFICATION OF ERRORS—REQUISITES.

Where one of the grounds of a motion for a new trial was the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, the specification in the bill of exceptions that the plaintiff "has introduced evidence to prove," etc.. and "that the testimony of the plaintiff himself shows," etc., and that the evidence "shows that August Eidinger contributed," etc., although not in the negative form, yet was sufficient to show wherein the moving party claimed the evidence to be insufficient, so that the motion could be granted.

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 131*)—MOTION—REQUISITES.

If the specification in the bill on a motion for a new trial is sufficient to enable the opposing counsel to determine what evidence should be put in the statement, and the judge to strike out redundant and useless matter, it is enough to enable the motion to be sustained.

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 449*)—ACTION — ALLEGATIONS AND PROOF — VARIANCE.

Where, in a suit against an executor to recover for services rendered deceased, the claim in the complaint was based upon a quantum meruit, while the proof showed an express contract, this was a fatal variance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 449.*]

5. NEW TRIAL (§ 70*)—DISCRETIONARY POWERS OF THE COURT—EVIDENCE.

In a suit against an executor to recover for services rendered deceased, evidence on the issue whether decedent ever agreed to pay plaintiff for his services held to be such that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting a new trial after verdict for plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 142, 143; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 979*)—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—NEW TRIAL.

The granting or denying of a new trial on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence rests so fully in the discretion of the trial court that its action is conclusive upon the Supreme Court, unless it appears that there has been an abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3871–3873; Dec. Dig. § 979.*]

7. NEW TRIAL (§ 72*)—GROUNDS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the evidence is conflicting, the trial court is authorized to review it, and if, in its opinion, the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, it is its duty to grant a new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by Emil A. Eidinger against Joseph A. Sigwart, as executor of August Eidinger, deceased. There was verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

William F. Bray (Francis J. Heney and Charles W. Cobb, of counsel), for appellant. Abe Darlington, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal from the order granting the defendant a new trial.

The action was for the recovery of compensation for alleged personal services rendered by the plaintiff for the defendant's intestate during the lifetime of the latter.

The complaint alleges and the evidence shows that the deceased in the month of December, 1905, was stricken with paralysis, and that he continued to suffer from that malady until the date of his death on the 29th day of July, 1908. It is averred that the plaintiff, "at the special instance and request of the deceased," performed "work, labor, and services in nursing, tending and waiting upon" deceased from the time he was taken ill until his death; "that said labor, work, and services so performed in nursing, tending, and waiting upon said August Eidinger were and are reasonably worth the sum of $5 per day for each and every day thereof; and that 730 days of said labor, work, and services were performed and rendered to the said August Eidinger within two years next preceding the commencement of this action." Plaintiff presented his claim in due form to the executor of the will of the deceased, and the same was by said executor rejected and disallowed. The cause was tried by a jury and verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,825. Immediately after the return and recordation of the verdict, and on the same day, judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for the amount awarded by the jury. Within due time the defendant moved for a new trial on the grounds that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, that said verdict is against law and "errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by said defendant." As stated, the court granted this motion.

From the evidence it appears that the deceased, who was a widower and without a family, resided at Placerville, in El Dorado county, where he owned several pieces of real estate. Plaintiff was a nephew of the deceased, and the testimony shows that a couple of years prior to the time the deceased was stricken with paralysis the plaintiff's mother, Mrs. Wilhelmina Eidinger, also a sister-in-law of deceased, and her daughter, came to his home and took up their residence with him; that Mrs. Eidinger "kept the house" for the deceased from that time until his death; that the deceased, a few months before he was stricken with paralysis, gave to Mrs. Wilhelmina Eidinger real estate and personal property of the aggregate value, approximately, of $5,000. Mrs. Eidinger testified that she and her daughter, Augusta, went to the house of the deceased in the year 1903 for the purpose of "keeping house" for him; that the deceased said that he would give his property "to whoever would come up and take care of him and he carried out this proposition by giving me the deed." (By his will the deceased also gave to her one-fourth of all the estate of which he was seised at the time of his death.) Mrs. Eidinger further testified that she and her daughter and the wife of the plaintiff "helped to take care of deceased and were very faithful; * * * that their efforts were all combined to care for the deceased."

Upon the question of the employment of plaintiff by the deceased, Mrs. Eidinger testified that her daughter, at the request of the deceased, "wrote to plaintiff offering him $2.50 per day to come up and take care of him; that plaintiff replied that he could not come right away; that deceased then dictated another letter to him, offering him $3 per day, and plaintiff replied that he would come right away, and he did come on December 10, 1905; that the other nurse, Mr. Hirsch, stayed only four days after the arrival of plaintiff." The plaintiff testified that the deceased, during his lifetime, paid him (plaintiff) the sum of $3, which amount constituted all that he had received on his claim for services rendered the deceased. On cross-examination he admitted that he expected, "when I found out I was not going to get any pay," that he would be provided for or compensated for his services in the will of deceased, but that, having been entirely overlooked by the deceased in his will, he therefore presented his claim against the estate. There was some other testimony introduced by plaintiff showing that he performed certain services as a nurse for deceased. By cross-examination of some of plaintiff's witnesses, it was established that the deceased during the several years of his illness maintained and supported plaintiff and his wife, as well as his mother, Wilhelmina Eidinger, and his sister, Miss Augusta Eidinger. It was also shown through the testimony of Mrs. Minnie Eidinger, wife of plaintiff, that the bills paid by the deceased for the maintenance of his household, during the period of his sickness, amounted to something over $3,000, said money having been received by him during that period from time to time from various sources of income available to him.

For the defense, the witness Maginness, who was then engaged in the business of buying and selling grain, testified that the plaintiff worked for him "off and on for about a year during 1907 and 1908 at unloading cars, and that he unloaded from one to three cars a week, taking two and a half or three hours to unload a car. Sometimes he got a car a week and sometimes two or three. In the fall he had as high as three in one week, generally about one or two; the average being about one car a week with occasionally an increase."

Joseph A. Sigwart, executor of the will of the deceased, testified that he had known the deceased for 35 years, and that his acquaintance with him was intimate; that plaintiff never had talked to him about his claim, nor asked him (witness) about it; but that he did hear plaintiff say, after the death of the testator, that "he had something coming to him," but that plaintiff never came to the office of the witness to talk about or discuss any claim he might have against the estate. Sigwart testified that the deceased "was very punctual in the matter of paying his bills," and, without objection, further testified that some six or eight months before he died he asked deceased if he had money with which to pay his bills, to which deceased replied, "Yes; I got money." Witness then asked deceased if he had "paid everything." He answered: "I pay everything as I go along."

The foregoing, which represents a fair synopsis of the testimony received at the trial, is a sufficient statement of the evidence for the purposes of the consideration and disposition of the questions involved in this appeal.

It will be observed that the plaintiff pleads and relies upon a quantum meruit. At the close of his case the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that there was a variance between the allegations of the complaint and the proof, in that, while the former, as stated, disclosed an implied contract, the latter established an express contract. This motion was denied. It does not appear from the record whether the trial court granted the motion for a new trial on one only of the several grounds set out in the notice of motion or upon all of them. But where there is stated in the notice any one ground of several upon which the court could reasonably, in the exercise of a sound discretion, grant a new trial, the order will not be disturbed.

It is, however, preliminarily objected that "the specifications of insufficiency of the evidence in the bill of exceptions in this case are wholly improper and insufficient in form and precluded the lower court from examining the evidence." There are but three specifications of the kind referred to, and they are not in the negative form, which is always to be preferred, but state that the plaintiff "has introduced evidence to prove," etc., and "that the testimony of the plaintiff himself shows," etc., and that the evidence "shows that August Eidinger contributed," etc.

The objection is addressed to form rather than substance. It is readily ascertainable from the specifications wherein the moving party claims that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, and this is all that should be required in this respect in a bill of exceptions or statement on motion for a new trial where the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict is one of the grounds of the motion. The opposing counsel could certainly have experienced no difficulty in determining what additional evidence, if there is any in the record upon the points to which the specifications refer, should be inserted in the statement. Speaking on this subject, the Supreme Court, in the case of American Type, etc., Co. v. Packer, 130 Cal. 461, 62 Pac. 744, says: "If the specification is sufficient to enable the opposing counsel to determine what evidence should be put in the statement, and the judge to strike out redundant and useless matter, it is enough. The statute in this matter is not primarily for this court, but for the trial court. That court should not hear the motion unless the statement contains such specifications. Upon that subject, the trial judge, who tried the case, has a decided advantage over this court in determining whether the specifications are sufficient." It is further declared in that opinion that such a specification "is in the nature of a notice, the sufficiency of which should be tested by inquiring whether the opposite party is injured by defects. It is not even regarded with the strictness with which an error of the court must be. If error at all, it is committed by a party and in a manner in which great liberality should be exercised by courts. Whenever there is a reasonably successful effort to state 'the particulars,' and they are such as may have been sufficient to inform the opposing counsel and the court of the grounds, and the trial court has entertained and passed upon the motion, in my opinion this court ought not to refuse to consider the case on appeal."

In disposing of an objection similar to the one here, and referring to a number of cases cited by counsel in support of said objection, and particularly to the case of De Molera v. Martin, 120 Cal. 548, 52 Pac. 825, the Supreme Court, in Drathman v. Cohen, 139 Cal. 313, 73 Pac. 182, has this to say: "If the decision in that case were followed, perhaps the specifications here in question would be declared insufficient; but experience has proven that the rule there laid down was too strict, and that it has been productive of evil and not good. Perhaps some of the other cases cited may also tend to establish the same rule. But latterly the court has been more liberal in such matters, and the rule now followed is stated in American etc. Co. v. Packer, 130 Cal. 459, 62 Pac. 744." See, also, on this question, Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672, 72 Pac. 142; Holmes v. Hoppe, 140 Cal. 212, 73 Pac. 1002; Bell v. Staacke, 141 Cal. 186, 74 Pac. 774; Jones v. Goldtree Bros. Co., 142 Cal. 383, 77 Pac. 939; Southern Pacific Co. v. Lipman, 148 Cal. 480, 83 Pac. 445.

It is but the statement of an elementary proposition to say that the plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the cause of action set out in his complaint, and not upon some other which may be developed by the proof. Mondran v. Goux, 51 Cal. 151; Evans v. Bailey, 66 Cal. 112, 4 Pac. 1089; Reed v. Norton, 99 Cal. 617, 34 Pac. 333; Shenandoah etc., Co. v. Morgan, 106 Cal. 409, 39 Pac. 802; Elmore v. Elmore, 114 Cal. 516, 46 Pac. 458; Davis v. Pac. Tel., etc., Co., 127 Cal. 312, 57 Pac. 764, 59 Pac. 698; Schirmer v. Drexler, 134 Cal. 134, 66 Pac. 180. That there is a clear technical variance between the contract declared upon and the one proved there is no ground for possible doubt. The complaint, as seen, declares upon an implied contract or a quantum meruit. The only testimony in the record showing or tending to show a contract was that given by the plaintiff's mother, Mrs. Wilhelmina Eidinger, and her testimony shows that the deceased dictated a letter to plaintiff, agreeing to pay him at the rate of $3 per day for his services as a nurse to wait upon and care for the deceased, and that plaintiff replied that "he would come right away"; that plaintiff did on December 10, 1905, go to the home of deceased, and remained with and served him as a nurse until his death. It is thus to be observed that, if there was any contract at all, it was an express contract. The terms were fixed and definite. Deceased offered plaintiff a certain wage if he would "come up and take care of him"— that is, take care of him during his illness.

But whether, in view of the fact that there is some testimony in the record from which the conclusion may reasonably follow that the alleged services of plaintiff were reasonably worth the sum of three dollars per day, this variance might be held to be fatal, or of such vital and material importance as to have entitled the defendant to a favorable ruling on his motion for a nonsuit, is a matter which it is not necessary to decide here. The fact of the variance, however, whether sufficient to have warranted the granting of the motion for a nonsuit or not, when considered with certain other testimony, possesses some importance in the determination of the question whether the court below abused its discretion in its order granting a new trial upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and, presumably, judging from the record before us, that was one of the grounds, if not the principal one, upon which the order was made.

That the trial court was justified in granting a new trial on said ground we think appears reasonably clear even from the record here.

The plaintiff declared upon a quantum meruit. If the proof disclosed any contract at all, it was, as seen, an express contract. The plaintiff himself testified that he expected to be provided for in the will of the deceased—that is, giving his testimony a construction the most favorable to him, he expected his compensation to be attended to by the deceased in his will, but, the matter having been thus neglected by the deceased, he presented his claim against the estate. The testimony shows that deceased was very punctual in the payment of his debts and the extinguishment of his obligations; that he had ample means at his command during his illness to pay all bills incurred in the maintenance of his household affairs; that he paid plaintiff the sum of $3 only during the whole period of plaintiff's engagement with him; that plaintiff occasionally worked at other employment for another party; that deceased asked Mrs. Wilhelmina Eidinger, mother of plaintiff, to come to his home and "keep house" for and take care of him, and that "he would give his property to whoever would come up and take care of him," and that "he carried out this proposition by giving witness the deed," and, in addition, some personal property, and, besides, giving her by will one-fourth of the residue of his estate. This testimony, excluding from consideration the testimony of Sigwart, which, although going in without objection, might be regarded as incompetent because involving self-serving declarations, to the effect that deceased, just before his death, said to him that he had paid all his bills—that he paid "everything as I go along"—is sufficient to inspire distrust in the justness of plaintiff's claim or grave doubt whether the plaintiff was in reality ever employed for any purpose by deceased. Why did not deceased pay plaintiff more than the sum of $3 during the long period of his alleged service to deceased? Why did plaintiff occasionally work for another party during that period? Why, if he had an understanding with deceased that he was to render services as a nurse, did plaintiff expect that the payment of his compensation would be postponed until after the death of deceased and said compensation arranged for in the will of deceased? If deceased employed plaintiff to take care of him, why did he also employ plaintiff's mother to do like service and promise to give her in return all his property and why did he give her the bulk of it? If plaintiff was employed under an express contract as to compensation, why did he present a claim to the executor based upon an implied contract for greater compensation than that agreed upon and then plead the latter in his action against the estate? These are questions which would naturally suggest themselves and which no doubt occurred to and influenced the mind of the trial judge in the consideration and decision of the motion for a new trial. In any event, the evidence as it appears before us is such that we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in granting the order for a new trial.

"The granting or denying a new trial on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence," says the Supreme Court, in Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 413, 35 Pac. 1024, "rests so fully in the discretion of the trial court that its action is conclusive upon this court, unless it appears that there has been an abuse of discretion." In Warner v. Thomas, etc., Works, 105 Cal. 411, 38 Pac. 960, it is likewise held that it is settled law in California that a motion for a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, with whose decision thereon interference is unwarranted unless there clearly appears an abuse of such discretion. And it is further declared in that opinion that, "when the evidence is conflicting, the trial court is authorized to review it, and if, in its opinion, the verdict is against the weight of evidence, it is its duty to grant a new trial." See, also, Bjorman v. Fort Bragg R. R. Co., 92 Cal. 500, 28 Pac. 591; Cole v. Wilcox, 99 Cal. 549, 34 Pac. 114; Bledsoe v. De Crow, 132 Cal. 312, 64 Pac. 397.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HECK. (Cr. 237.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1182*)—APPEAL—FAILURE TO PROSECUTE—AFFIRMANCE.

Where, after a conviction for passing a fictitious check, defendant appealed, but failed to apprise the appellate court of his grounds for appeal, either by an oral argument or by the brief, the court would not search the record for reversible errors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3203–3214; Dec. Dig. § 1182.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

James J. Van Hovenberg, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was charged with the crime of passing a fictitious check. Upon the trial he was convicted, and this is his appeal from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The case was upon the calendar for oral argument May 9, 1910, at which time no one appeared for the defendant; but, upon the suggestion of the Attorney General that it had been agreed between the Attorney General and the counsel for the defendant that the defendant might have 15 days in which to file a brief, such time was given. He did not file any brief within the time allowed, nor has any extension of time been asked or granted. The case was therefore submitted for the decision of this court.

As we have not been apprised, either by an oral argument or by any brief, of the grounds upon which appellant claims that either the judgment or order should be reversed, we do not feel called upon to search the record for error which possibly might justify a reversal of either the judgment or the order.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BOERO. (Cr. 252.)

1. RAPE (§ 52*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

2. RAPE (§ 40*)—PREVIOUS INTERCOURSE.

On prosecution for rape, especially statutory rape, previous intercourse between the same parties may be proven, as showing disposition, and thus corroborating the evidence of the substantial charge.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1110*)—APPEAL—RECORD—SUGGESTION OF DIMINUTION—CORRECTION.

The objection that the judgment in the record does not show the term of imprisonment, but only that it is for "20," is removed on a suggestion of diminution of the record; the original entry by the clerk having omitted the word "years" after "20," and on due notice and hearing the entry having been corrected to read "20 years."

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 995*)—RECORD—SHOWING DEFENDANT'S PRESENCE AT TRIAL.

It is not necessary that the judgment roll show defendant was present during the trial on a certain afternoon, it is enough that it does not show he was absent, all intendments being in support of the judgment, and defendant being required to show error, none being presumed.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1105*)—APPEAL—REPORTER'S TRANSCRIPT—AUTHENTICATION.

Not only should the reporter's transcript be sworn to by him as required by Pen. Code, § 1247, but before it is transmitted to the appellate court it should be authenticated by the trial judge, in accordance with section 1247a.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William S. Wells, Judge.

Ernest Boero was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

D. C. Dutton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HALL, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape for having had sexual intercourse with a girl under 16 years of age, and appealed from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is first urged that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. It is not claimed that the girl did not give evidence that fully supported the charge, but it is claimed apparently that the evidence was in itself unreasonable, because it appears that the act was committed in the presence and with the approval of the wife of the defendant. But in addition to the evidence of the girl, the testimony of the landlady of the house was to the effect that she found the girl in the room of defendant and his wife on the occasion in question after defendant and his wife had gone to bed. Medical testimony was also given tending to show that the girl had had sexual relations with some one near to the time of the alleged offense. It was for the jury to determine as to the truth of the testimony in the first instance. The judge of the trial court, who also heard and saw the witnesses, has approved the verdict. We cannot say that as a matter of law the verdict is not supported by the evidence. People v. Moore, 155 Cal. 237, 100 Pac. 688.

The court did not err in permitting evidence of other acts of intercourse between defendant and the prosecutrix, occurring before the act relied upon for a conviction. In prosecutions for adultery, incest, and rape (especially when committed by consent upon persons under the age of consent), other acts of sexual intercourse between the same persons may be proven as showing an adulterous disposition, and thus corroborating the evidence of the substantive charge. People v. Stratton, 141 Cal. 604, 75 Pac. 166; People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 621, 76 Pac. 500; People v. Castro, 133 Cal. 12, 65 Pac. 13; Lefforge v. State, 129 Ind. 551, 29 N. E. 34; State v. Markins, 95 Ind. 464, 48 Am. Rep. 733; State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 202, 24 Am. Rep. 124; Thayer v. Thayer, 101 Mass. 111, 100 Am. Dec. 110; People v. Cease, 80 Mich. 576, 45 N. W. 585; Proper v. State, 85 Wis. 615, 55 N. W. 1035; People v. O'Sullivan, 104 N. Y. 481, 10 N. E. 880, 58 Am. Rep. 530; State v. Parish, 104 N. C. 679, 10 S. E. 457; Ramey v. State, 127 Ind. 243, 26 N. E. 818; State v. Hilberg, 22 Utah, 27, 61 Pac. 215.

There is some conflict in the authorities as to the right to give evidence of acts of sexual intercourse occurring after the act upon which the indictment is based; but in this case the evidence objected to related to acts occurring before the act selected as the offense, and was well within the rule allowing evidence of this character. The language upon this subject, found in People v. Ah Lean, 7 Cal. App. 628, 95 Pac. 380, was evidently inadvertently used, as no authorities were cited upon the question to this court.

The objection that the judgment in the record does not show whether the imprisonment is for 20 years, months, or days has been removed upon suggestion of a diminution of the record. The original entry by the clerk omitted the word "years" after the figure "20." After due notice and hearing the entry was corrected to read "20 years." People v. O'Brien, 4 Cal. App. 723, 89 Pac. 438.

It is also contended that the judgment roll does not show that defendant was present during the trial on the afternoon of February 17, 1910. It does not show that he was not present, and all intendments are in support of the judgment. In other words, the appellant must show error; it will not be presumed. People v. Douglass, 100 Cal. 4, 34 Pac. 490; People v. Russell, 156 Cal. 450, 105 Pac. 416; People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 444, 50 Pac. 675.

The evidence as to the alibi relied on by defendant simply raises a conflict with the evidence for the prosecution. In such a case the verdict of the jury is conclusive on this court.

This disposes of all the points presented by appellant, and we have considered them as though the entire record was properly before us. The reporter's transcript, however, is not indorsed or authenticated by the trial judge as required by section 1247a of the Penal Code. Not only should the reporter's transcript be sworn to by him, as required by section 1247, Pen. Code, but before it is transmitted to this court it should be authenticated by the trial judge in accordance with section 1247a, Pen. Code.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

2. DRAINS (§ 83*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—SUPPLEMENTAL ASSESSMENTS—NEW WORK—PLANS OR STATEMENT OF WORK.

Under Pol. Code, § 3454, providing that the trustees of a reclamation district must prepare original plans, and thereafter at any time in its discretion modify them or adopt supplemental plans, section 3455 providing that the trustees must report such original plans of its work, and every new, supplemental, or additional plan, together with estimates of the cost of the works necessary for the reclamation in pursuance of any such plan or plans, and section 3459 providing that if the original assessment is insufficient for the complete reclamation, or if further assessments are required to provide for the protection, maintenance, and repair of the reclamation works, the trustees must present to the county supervisors "a statement of the work * * * to be done," and its estimated cost, and the supervisors must direct commissioners to assess the amount of such estimated cost on the lands in the district, though new work, not in the scope or design of plans already adopted and reported, may be provided for in an assessment proceeding under section 3459, the "statement of the work * * * to be done," as regards such new work, must be as clear and definite as in the case of original plans.

3. DRAINS (§ 83*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—SUPPLEMENTAL ASSESSMENTS—NEW WORK—STATEMENT OF WORK.

The "statement of the work to * * * be done, and its estimated cost," required by Pol. Code, § 3459, to be presented by the trustees of a reclamation district in supplementary assessment proceedings to the county supervisors, is insufficient as to new work not in the scope of plans already adopted and reported, being simply "to * * * raise the levees," with an estimated cost of a lump sum for doing that and repairing the old work on the levees, and "drainage ditches to be dug throughout the district and pumping plants to be installed," with an estimated cost of another amount.

4. DRAINS (§ 83*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—SUPPLEMENTAL ASSESSMENT—VALIDITY.

A supplemental assessment for a reclamation district is invalid in the absence of a plan of new work not in the scope of a plan already adopted and reported, or of a statement showing in some detail and with some degree of certainty the extent, character, and general location thereof.

5. DRAINS (§ 85*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICT—INVALID ASSESSMENT—APPLICATION OF PAYMENT ON SUBSEQUENT ASSESSMENT.

Pol. Code, § 3466½, providing that where an assessment for reclamation purposes on the lands embraced in a reclamation district is adjudged invalid, and any landowner has before such adjudication paid the amount assessed, in such assessment, against his land the amount so paid by him shall be credited to his land on any subsequent assessment on the lands of the district has no application where there is a mere adjudication of the invalidity of the assessment as to the land of one, because of a mistake in the assessment list in the name of the owner; this not rendering the assessment invalid as to the others, who alone paid their assessment.

J. A. Plummer, Geo. F. McNoble, and John E. Budd, for appellants. Aug. E. Muenter and Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action under section 3493½, Pol. Code, to determine the validity of an assessment levied for the purposes of Reclamation District No. 17 on lands within the district within one year prior to the filing of the complaint. Judgment was given for plaintiff confirming the assessment, and defendants, who are landowners within the district, appeal from such judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Reclamation District No. 17 was organized prior to January 1, 1873, and has ever since been prosecuting the object for which it was created. It is claimed by plaintiff that the assessment in question is one of those supplemental or additional assessments provided for by section 3459, Pol. Code. It is there provided that "if the original assessment is insufficient to provide for the complete reclamation of the lands of the district, or if further assessments are from time to time required to provide for the protection, maintenance and repair of the reclamation works, the trustees must present to the board of supervisors of the county in which the district is situated, * * * a statement of the work done or to be done, and its estimated cost, and such board must make an order directing the commissioners who made the original assessment, or other commissioners, to be named in such order, to assess the amount of such estimated cost as a charge upon the lands within the district, which assessment must be made and collected in the same manner as the original assessment." Under other sections, it is the duty of three commissioners to be appointed by the board of supervisors to view and assess upon the land of the district "a charge proportionate to the whole expense and to the benefits which will result from such works," and to make and file with the county treasurer a list of the charges against each tract. Pol. Code, §§ 3456, 3460, 3461. This list constitutes the assessment list. The taxpayer is given no opportunity to contest this assessment before the commissioners or the board of supervisors, and, of course, has the right to urge any objection going to the validity of the assessment against his land in an action brought for the enforcement of the same, or in an action like the one before us, one given by the Legislature to provide a method by which all objections to the assessment may be conclusively determined after such notice and hearing as the property owners are of right entitled to. The assessment list involved in this case was filed with the county treasurer of San Joaquin county on August 29, 1907. The assessment was for the sum of $113,014.07. The statement presented to the board of supervisors by the trustees of the reclamation district upon which this assessment was based showed that $27,514.07 thereof was for the purpose of reimbursing certain landowners of the district on account of payments theretofore made by them on a previous assessment alleged to have been adjudged void. Section 3466½, Pol. Code. We shall refer to this portion of the assessment hereafter. Six thousand dollars was for work actually done in "the protection, maintenance and repairs of said reclamation works which said works consist of strengthening the levees, watching the same during high water and protecting them as far as possible against washouts and breaks," and for which work the district was legally liable. The "statement" of the work to be done and its estimated cost was as follows: (a) "To extend the head levee for about three-fourths miles and raise the present head levee on an average of two feet, the estimated costs of same is $5,500." (b) "To close the breaks of the levee near and under what is called the Corral-Hollow bridge, the estimated costs of which is $2,500." (c) "To close the two breaks of the levee on the river, at the lower end of the district, the estimated costs of which is $10,000." (d) "To repair and raise the levees along the San Joaquin river and French Camp slough, the estimated costs of which is $33,000." (e) "To cause drainage ditches to be dug throughout the district and pumping plants to be installed, the estimated costs of which are $25,000." (f) "To defray costs of incidentals for engineering work, expenses of superintending and the costs of calling the assessments now proposed to be made, estimated at $3,500."

It is claimed that the adoption and reporting of plans for the new work to be done was a prerequisite to a valid assessment, and that the foregoing statement as to such work was utterly insufficient in detail to constitute such a plan or any basis for the portions of the assessment based thereon. It is obvious, and there is no pretense to the contrary, that a large portion of the work to be done consists of new work not embraced in the original plans for the reclamation of the lands of the district. There is no denial of the claim of defendants that the only suggestion as to any of such work, so far as plan or statement is concerned, is that to be found in the "statement" we have already set forth. Such new work is (a) "to extend the head levee for about ¾ miles and raise the present head levee on an average of two feet," cost $5,500, (d) "to * * * raise the levees along the San Joaquin river and French Camp slough," which is combined in the statement with "repairs" of such levees, the aggregate cost of repairing and raising being estimated at $33,000, and (e) "to cause drainage ditches to be dug throughout the district and pumping plants to be installed," at a cost of $25,000. It seems clear to us that the law contemplates the adoption by the trustees of a clear and definite plan of all new work not embraced in the original and other previous plans already filed before any assessment is levied therefor, so that all concerned, including the landowners who pay the tax, may have means of ascertaining the specific purposes of the assessment, the real value of the proposed work, and the benefit that will be derived therefrom. By section 3454, Pol. Code, it is provided that the board of trustees must prepare original plans, and "thereafter, at any time, in its discretion, modify or change such original plan or plans, or adopt new, supplemental, or additional plan or plans," when in its judgment the same shall become necessary. By section 3455, Pol. Code, it is provided that the trustees must report such original plan or plans of its work "and every such new, supplemental, or additional plan, if any, together with estimates of the cost of the works necessary for the reclamation of the lands of the district in pursuance of any such plan or plans." These provisions appear to be mandatory as to all new work not included in the scope or design of the plans already adopted and reported, and it could not have been contemplated that the effect of section 3459, Pol. Code, would be to remove this safeguard simply because the assessment including such new work was a supplemental assessment instead of the original. There could be no reason for such a distinction. It may well be that such new work may be provided for in an assessment proceeding inaugurated under section 3459, Pol. Code, but, if so, it seems clear to us that the "statement of the work * * * to be done" made by the trustees to the supervisors must be as clear and definite as in the case of original plans. We cannot doubt that it was intended that the landowner should have such notice as would thus be afforded, and it is upon such a definite statement or plan that the assessment is based. See Reclamation Dist. v. Sels, 117 Cal. 166, 49 Pac. 131. We may assume that the statement of the first item of proposed new work, viz., the extension of the head levee for about ¾ miles and the raising of the present head levee on an average of two feet is sufficient, though probably not as clear and definite as it might be made. But we do not see how this can be held as to the item of raising the levees along the San Joaquin river and French Camp slough, which, including also the "repair" of said levees, amounts to the large sum of $33,000, without any designation of the amount proposed to be used for raising the levees. There was absolutely nothing in the statement from which any one could draw an inference as to the extent to which the trustees were to raise these levees, if, indeed, they had come to any conclusion upon that point themselves, which does not appear. It does appear that the landowners by resolution adopted May 4, 1907, had authorized and directed the trustees to formulate a plan for the reclamation and protection of the lands, including their drainage, and to employ necessary engineers and chain men to furnish the proper plan and estimate of cost, but nothing appears to have been done by the trustees under this resolution other than the presentation of the statement under discussion. So far as the particular point we are discussing is concerned, we have the mere statement of the trustees that they propose "to * * * raise the levees," and that the estimated cost thereof is some undesignated portion of $33,000.

This in our judgment is utterly insufficient to give to the landowners the notice which the law contemplates they should have, and insufficient to serve as a basis for the assessment in so far as such proposed work is concerned. The item of "drainage ditches to be dug throughout the district and pumping plants to be installed," at an estimated cost of $25,000, is likewise insufficient. There is no statement from which an inference can be drawn as to the character or amount of ditch work to be done, its estimated cost, or the location of any proposed ditches. All these matters are apparently left for future determination by the trustees. Nor is there anything from which one can know how many pumping plants are proposed or their estimated cost. We have simply an aggregate estimate of $25,000 stated to be needed for drainage ditches to be dug and pumping plants to be installed. In such a matter as a proposed system of drainage ditches we think the law clearly contemplates a plan showing in some detail and with some degree of certainty the extent and character of the proposed work, and the general location of the proposed ditches. In Reclamation Dist. v. Sels, supra, the plans and report held sufficient contained "not alone a general and comprehensive, but also a detailed statement of the character and amount of ditch work to be done, with estimates of the cost thereof, and also of the cost of the proposed pumping plant." Unless we are to hold that the plans and statement of work to be done, with the estimates of cost, are matters in no way affecting the validity of assessments based thereon, which we do not feel warranted in doing, we are satisfied that the assessment here involved must be adjudged invalid because of the absence of sufficient support in plan or statement of work to be done for any assessment for the two items we have discussed.

As stated before, the assessment included $27,514.07 to reimburse certain landowners under section 3466½, Pol. Code. That section enacted March 2, 1899, provides: "In all cases in which an assessment shall have been levied since October first, eighteen hundred and ninety-six, or shall hereafter be levied, for reclamation purposes, upon the lands embraced within any reclamation district, and the assessment shall have thereafter been or shall be adjudged invalid, by any court of competent jurisdiction, and any land owner of the district shall have paid the amount assessed, in said assessment, against land belonging to him, before said assessment shall have been or shall be so adjudged invalid, the amount so paid by said land owner, together with the legal interest thereon from the date of its payment, shall be credited, by the treasurer of the county in which said land is situated, to the tract of land on which the same was paid, and shall be applied upon any assessment thereafter levied on the lands of the district, to the payment, pro tanto, of the amount therein assessed against said tract of land." The uncontradicted facts in regard to this item are as follows: On October 5, 1897, a statement showing the necessity for an assessment of $20,000 was presented by the trustees to the board of supervisors. Commissioners were appointed to make the assessment upon the lands of the district, with the result that on November 11, 1897, the assessment list was filed with the county treasurer. So far as appears, the only defect in these proceedings was that a small tract of land containing some 69 acres belonging to one William S. Moss was assessed to one Mary B. Odell, the statute requiring the list to contain "the names of the owners of each tract, if known, and if unknown, that fact" (section 3461, Pol. Code), and not then providing, as it now does, that no mistake in the name of the owner or supposed owner shall render the assessment invalid. Between November 11, 1897, and March 26, 1900, certain landowners of the district paid their assessments in amounts aggregating $16,641.95. On March 5, 1900, the reclamation district brought an action against said Mary B. Odell to foreclose the lien of said assessment and prosecuted the same to a judgment in its favor. This judgment was never satisfied. On February 17, 1905, the successor in interest of said William S. Moss instituted an action in the superior court of San Joaquin county against the reclamation district to have the lien of said assessment and said judgment declared to be invalid against said property because the assessment had not been made to the true owner of the property. The trial court found the facts as to the assessment to be as alleged, and decreed that the reclamation district had no lien on the property under said assessment or judgment. It was further shown that several actions had been begun to collect from different landowners the amounts due from them on this assessment, but the result of said actions was not shown. It was further shown that no action was ever brought under section 3493½, Pol. Code, to have the validity of the assessment determined. The amounts paid on the assessment aggregated, as has been said, $16,641.95, leaving $3,358.05 unpaid. To provide for such credits to the landowners who had paid their assessments as are specified in section 3466½, Pol. Code, the amount of $27,514.07 was included in this assessment, being the $16,641.95 paid together with $10,872.12 interest.

Learned counsel for plaintiff make no reply to the claim of defendants that the facts shown make it apparent that the case is not one within the provisions of section 3466½, Pol. Code. It appears to us that the claim is well based. While there probably would be nothing inequitable in any proceeding the result of which would be to simply compel landowners who did not join in paying for necessary work done for the district to now pay their share for that work with interest, we must find the authority for any such proceeding in the statute, and, if the authority is not so conferred, it cannot be held to exist. In this case the previous assessment was not adjudged invalid as to work upon any ground that affected its validity as to the other landowners; in other words, there has never been any adjudication of its invalidity as to any land except that of Moss, and the adjudication as to him was simply that the assessment was not valid against his land because of a mistake in the assessment list in the name of the owner, a matter that apparently could have been corrected by the commissioners even "after the lists shall have been filed with the treasurer of the county." Section 3460, Pol. Code. We do not understand that this renders the assessment invalid as to the other landowners, or that any of them could have successfully resisted the payment of their assessments because of this mistake. The whole object and scheme of section 3466½, Pol. Code, was to provide for the reimbursement of those who may have paid the amounts assessed against their lands where such lands were not liable therefor because of the invalidity of the assessments against them prior to a determination of such invalidity. The showing here was that the lands upon which the amounts were paid were legally liable therefor, and that there has been no judgment of invalidity affecting the same. The amount of $27,514.07, for the purpose of reimbursement was therefore improperly included in the assessment.

In view of what we have said, the assessment must be held invalid, and it would serve no useful purpose to consider any other point made by defendants.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.

PEOPLE v. LUIS. (Cr. 1,579.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 11, 1910.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 520*)—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS—VOLUNTARY CHARACTER—INDUCEMENT.

An extrajudicial confession by accused to a third person is not objectionable because it was induced by the advice of such third person to the effect that it would probably be better for accused to tell the truth; the confession having been given in the absence of any officer or person in authority, and not under circumstances leading accused to suppose that it was given with the sanction of any such person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1166, 1175–1184; Dec. Dig. § 520.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 519*) — EXTRAJUDICIAL CONFESSIONS—VOLUNTARY CHARACTER.

That accused secretly hoped that the effect of making a complete extrajudicial statement confessing his guilt would lighten his punishment and make it easier for him was insufficient to render the confession inadmissible, if the hope was not improperly induced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1163–1174; Dec. Dig. § 519.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 547*)—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS — PROOF—REPORTER'S TRANSCRIPT.

Where a reporter who did not understand Chinese attended the taking of the confession of accused through interpreters, and took down in shorthand the questions asked in English by the district attorney, and the answers as translated into English, and the statement as taken down by the reporter was not read to accused, nor subscribed by him, nor acknowledged in any way to be a correct statement of what he said, the confession could not be proved by the reporter nor by the transcript of his notes.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 547*)—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS—PROOF.

Where accused was examined through interpreters by the district attorney, and confessed the killing in such examination, and there was no competent written evidence thereof, the interpreters who heard and understood the whole statement and remembered the substance thereof could testify as to what they remembered, though they could not remember everything that was said.

5. Homicide (§ 354*)—First-Degree Murder—Nature of Punishment—Evidence.

In a prosecution of a Chinese person for first degree murder, evidence that in the Chinese mind a Chinese woman amounted to very little, and that the taking of her life was not in their estimation a very serious matter, was inadmissible as bearing on the punishment to be inflicted under Pen. Code, § 190, providing that the jury shall determine in its discretion whether punishment for murder in the first degree shall be death or life imprisonment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 354.*]

6. Criminal Law (§ 479*) — Evidence — Experts—Opportunity to Acquire Knowledge.

Where a physician with three years' experience in China testified that a part of her medical course had been to judge the mental character of a human being from his general appearance, and that she had seen accused in the courtroom, and had glanced at him once when he was going upstairs to the courtroom, a question whether in her opinion accused possessed the average amount of human intellect, to prove solely from defendant's exterior appearance that he was a person of feebler mind than that of the average intellect under the prevailing conditions was properly excluded on the theory that the witness had not been shown to have sufficient opportunity to acquire knowledge concerning defendant's mind as would qualify her to testify.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1067, 1068; Dec. Dig. § 479.*]

7. Criminal Law (§ 538*) — Confessions — Evidence—Weight and Credibility.

The fact that accused testified in his own behalf solely as to the circumstances under which certain alleged confessions were made, and preliminary to their introduction in evidence, to show that they were not freely and voluntarily made, did not prevent the jury from considering its credibility in reviewing the evidence in accordance with all the facts and circumstances in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1227–1229; Dec. Dig. § 538.*]

8. Criminal Law (§ 1171*)—Appeal—Harmless Error—Misconduct of District Attorney.

The jury after submission requested that the testimony of accused be read to them, when the district attorney, addressing the court, stated that such testimony was not a part of defendant's case, "that he did not take the stand in his own behalf or give any testimony on his own behalf." On objection to the statement, the judge instructed the jury not to pay any attention to what was said between the court and counsel in the discussion and ordered the evidence of defendant read. Held, that the district attorney's statement, while objectionable, was not prejudicial to accused.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Willie Luis was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas Rhodes, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. On October 19, 1909, an information was presented and filed in the superior court of San Luis Obispo county, charging the defendant with the crime of murder in the killing of one Gon Ying Luis, a Chinese woman. Having entered his plea of not guilty, defendant was tried, and on November 24, 1909, the jury returned its verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, and on November 29, 1909, he was adjudged to suffer the death penalty, his motion for a new trial having been denied. On the same day he duly took an appeal to this court from the judgment and order denying a new trial.

1. It is not claimed by counsel for defendant that the evidence was not legally sufficient to support the conclusion of the jury, and, in view of evidence given as to confessions made by defendant, such a claim could not be sustained. That the deceased was foully murdered as she lay asleep in her bed on the morning of September 30, 1909, is shown beyond the possibility of doubt, but it must be conceded that in the absence of the evidence of extrajudicial confessions by defendant, which was given exclusively by Chinese witnesses, the evidence tending to show that defendant was the person who killed deceased was exceedingly slight. Indeed, such evidence pointed with as much certainty to another as the sole perpetrator of the murder as it did to defendant. But, taking the evidence of the confessions as true, the case against the defendant was complete. The question of the truth of that evidence was one solely for the jury and the trial judge on motion for a new trial. Their conclusion is not surprising in view of the fact that defendant went upon the witness stand and admitted the making of a confession, and the further fact that there was not on the part of the defense any denial or attempt at denial of the evidence of the other witnesses as to what he said in that confession.

2. There is no support in the record for the claim that the trial court erred in concluding that the extrajudicial statements of defendant as to the commission by him of this crime were free and voluntary, made without any improper inducement or coercion. One of these alleged statements was testified to by Laine May Luis, a daughter of deceased and half-sister of defendant, as having been made to her by the defendant while confined in the county jail. She testified that she asked defendant if he did kill her mother, and that he answered that he did. As to this conversation between defendant and Laine May Luis, the showing was entirely satisfactory that there was no improper inducement. The other statement was a more formal affair. The defendant, in the presence of the sheriff, district attorney, and several other persons, including some Chinese, and within the walls of the county jail, made his statement by answering questions asked him by the district attorney. Before the introduction of evidence of this statement, evidence was introduced to the effect that, before the making thereof, no promise was made to defendant by any one, no inducement held out to him, no threat made against him, and that defendant was told by the district attorney that he need not answer any questions, and that any answers he might give would be used against him. The nearest thing to an inducement of any kind testified to at all was that testified to by Wong Bick Yue, namely, that he had told defendant in the jail, no other person being present, in response to a question by defendant as to what was the best thing for him to do, that, if he committed this crime, he thought the best thing for him to do was to confess. This was from half an hour to an hour prior to the making of the statement, and the defendant then asked the witness to send for the district attorney. The defendant, a man about 40 years of age, was a witness for the purpose of showing the reason why he made the statement. He testified that he made it because he wished to ask the court to give him a lighter punishment, and that he thought it would be better and easier for him if he made it. He further testified that no one told him that it would be bad for him to make the statement or what the effect of such a statement would be, and, further, that no one told him that it would have any effect in any way if he made the statement. The evidence given was clearly sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial court in admitting evidence as to the statement itself. There was nothing to indicate that the advice of Wong Bick Yue was given under such circumstances as to lead accused to suppose that it was given with the sanction of a person in authority (see 1 Elliott on Evidence, § 282), and it amounted, according to the evidence, to no more than the expression of opinion on the part of a third person in no way connected with the public authorities that in his judgment it would be better to tell the truth, whatever the truth might be. The evidence of Wong Bick Yue on this was that he said: "If you did it, the best thing is to confess, I think." Mr. Elliott, in his work on Evidence, says that the rule of exclusion should not be extended to mere admonition or advice to speak the truth, where the language and circumstances are not such that they should be construed as an inducement to a confession of guilt. Volume 1, § 279. See, also, 1 Wigmore on Evidence, § 832. In People v. Barric, 49 Cal. 342, cited by defendant, the advice that "it would be better for him (defendant) to make a full disclosure" was assumed to have been given by the sheriff of the county, and this advice was given under such circumstances as were held to make it an improper inducement. We are aware of no case holding that a confession should be excluded merely because it was induced by the advice of a third person to the effect simply that it would probably be better to tell the truth, given in the absence of any officer or person in authority, and not given under such circumstances as to lead the accused to suppose it was given with the sanction of any such person. The mere fact that the accused secretly hoped that the effect of making a complete statement showing his guilt would be to lighten his punishment and make it better and easier for him could not operate to render the statement inadmissible if that hope was not improperly induced. It is manifest that the statement may be free and voluntary notwithstanding the existence of such a hope. The evidence here was sufficient to sustain a conclusion of absolute want of improper inducement. It was likewise sufficient to sustain the conclusion that defendant was fully advised by the district attorney of his rights, and that anything he might say would be used against him, and that he fully understood this. We do not mean to imply that this was necessarily essential to render the statement a free and voluntary one, but what we have said is a sufficient answer to the claim of counsel that the accused should have such an understanding of the matter.

3. Objection was made to the method used in proving the statements made by the defendant on the occasion last referred to. Among those present was Mr. A. B. Green, a shorthand reporter. The examination of the defendant was had solely through interpreters. Green took in shorthand the questions asked by the district attorney and the answers thereto as they came in English from the interpreters. It may be assumed that these shorthand notes were subsequently transcribed into longhand, and that such transcription was placed in the possession of the district attorney. There was no pretense, however, that the statement as taken down by Green was ever read to the defendant, or that he subscribed the same or in any way acknowledged it to be a correct statement of what had been said. Green, of course, did not act on this occasion in any official capacity. These being the circumstances, the Chinese interpreters, who were present throughout the proceedings, were allowed to testify to what questions were asked the defendant and what answers he gave thereto. This was the only evidence offered on the trial as to what the defendant said on that occasion; neither the transcribed statement made by the reporter being offered in evidence, nor the reporter being called upon to testify as to what was said. The district attorney was apparently of the opinion that the reporter, who did not understand the Chinese language, could not testify to what was said through the interpreters, notwithstanding that the correctness of the translations was sufficiently established. His conclusion in this regard is apparently supported by the decisions in this state. See People v. John, 137 Cal. 220, 69 Pac. 1063, and cases cited therein. While the interpreters testified at great length as to the conversation between the district attorney and defendant, which they interpreted, and heard everything that was said in that conversation, naturally enough they did not pretend that they could remember every question asked or every answer returned. They did, however, remember the substance of the conversation, testifying in effect that defendant said that he killed Gon Ying Luis with a pistol found in the watercloset where he had put it; that she was asleep when he killed her; that he took certain tin boxes from her room and subsequently buried them in the garden where they were found; and that he did the shooting after his father had left the house, and testifying further to many other details of the crime as stated by defendant. The district attorney repeatedly offered to stipulate that the transcription of the reporter showing the whole conversation should be read in evidence or that the reporter should be allowed to testify as to the conversation, using his transcription as a memorandum, but this was declined by defendant. There was no error in the rulings of the court in this matter. The transcription of the reporter was, of course, not admissible. It had not been subscribed by the defendant or acknowledged by him in any way as being his statement, and therefore was not his writing, and did not constitute a written confession. The reporter himself occupied, as has been said, the position of a mere bystander at the hearing (People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 131, 32 Pac. 880), and both his notes and his transcription thereof constituted simply, in effect, private memoranda (Estate of Benton, 131 Cal. 472, 480, 63 Pac. 775). There was thus no competent written evidence of the confession. Parol evidence of the statement of defendant was, of course, admissible. Such evidence could properly be given by any person hearing it made by the defendant and understanding what he said. Under the doctrine of People v. John, supra, this was the only way in which it could be proved. The cases cited by counsel for defendant are not in point for the reason that they refer to cases where a writing has been so executed or acknowledged by the accused as to make it his own written document. For instance, in State v. Haworth, 24 Utah, 398, 68 Pac. 155, 159, the rule applied was the rule stated in 1 Roscoe, Cr. Ev. (8th Ed.) 90, as follows: "If the confession is taken down in writing and signed by the prisoner, or its truth acknowledged by parol, or if it be written by him, then it is put in as an ordinary document and read by the officer of the court." It is only where it has been so made the writing of the accused that he can claim that rules applicable in the case of a written confession are applicable. The mere fact that the witnesses could not remember word for word the whole conversation between the district attorney and defendant was not a sufficient ground for the exclusion of their evidence of what they did remember. It is true, of course, that a confession should be construed as an entirety and that it is the right of the accused if any part of a confession made by him is introduced in evidence to have the whole of what he has said admitted. But this rule does not prevent the substance or part of the confession that the witness heard and remembers being admitted in a proper case. See 1 Elliott on Ev. § 295, note. This does not mean that the hearing of such a mere scrap of a conversation as is insufficient to give the hearer an intelligible understanding of what was said is sufficient (People v. Irwin, 77 Cal. 506, 20 Pac. 56), or that where, by reason of his inability to understand the language of the accused the witness understood "only an occasional word," he can testify as to the few words he thought he understood (People v. Gelabert, 39 Cal. 663), or that where the witness shows that he fails to remember a portion of the words of the accused used to qualify his statement or that was essential to an understanding of the part given, he can testify to the words he did hear and remember (People v. Tarbox, 115 Cal. 64, 46 Pac. 896), but simply that where the witness heard and understood the whole statement, and it satisfactorily appears that he remembers the substance thereof, he is competent to testify as to what he does remember, even though he cannot remember everything that was said. This is as far as it is necessary to go in this case, and it is unnecessary to discuss the decisions just cited. It is said in the case last cited that "it is well settled that the witness may testify to a part of an entire conversation, if he heard only a part, and such part appears to be complete and intelligible." If anything said in People v. Keith, 50 Cal. 137, may be construed as opposed to our conclusion, it is opposed to the later statement of the court, just quoted, and is not in our judgment correct. It may be added that there was no claim on the trial that the interpreters did not fully and truthfully testify as to all material parts of defendant's statement.

4. Counsel for defendant urges that the court erred in excluding certain evidence as to the mental condition of the defendant, not amounting to evidence of insanity or idiocy, offered for two purposes: (a) To enable the jury to intelligently exercise the discretion confided to them of determining whether the defendant, if found guilty of murder in the first degree, should suffer death or imprisonment in the state prison for life (Pen. Code, § 190); and (b) to enable the jury to determine the intent or lack of intent of the defendant in committing this homicide. Section 190, Pen. Code, makes death the punishment for murder in the first degree, but gives the jury the power, in its discretion, to substitute life imprison-

The evidence offered upon this matter was very meager. One branch of it consisted of a question asked a witness as follows: "What estimation or value is placed on the life of a female in China, if you know?" The object apparently was to show that in the Chinese mind a Chinese woman amounted to very little, and that the taking of the life of such a woman was not in defendant's estimation a very serious matter. This evidence could not, of course, assist in the determination of the question of the intent, deliberation, and premeditation essential to constitute murder in the first degree. And if we assume that a defendant in a murder case is entitled to introduce evidence not material or admissible on the question of his guilt or the degree of his offense, solely for the purpose of assisting the jury in the exercise of the discretion confided to it by section 190, Pen. Code, we are satisfied that the proposed evidence was not competent for that purpose. Whatever evidence may be so introduced, certainly evidence of the opinion of the murderer as to the value or importance of the life of the party murdered by him can play no legitimate part in his favor. The other branch of the proposed testimony consisted of certain questions addressed to Mrs. Helgesen, a physician who had practiced medicine in China for about three years. She said it had been a part of her medical course to judge of the mental character of a human being from his general appearance. She had seen the defendant in the courtroom, and had glanced at him once when he was going up the stairs to the courtroom. She was asked to state whether, judging from his appearance, he was "possessed of the average amount of human intellect." Counsel for defendant stated that it was not proposed to show "insanity or anything of that sort," but simply that it was proposed to show by an opinion based solely on defendant's "exterior appearance" "that he is a person with a feebler mind than that of the average intellect of the prevailing conditions." The court sustained the objection of the district attorney to the question. There was no error in this ruling. Even if this be conceded to be a proper subject for expert testimony, the trial court was amply warranted in concluding that the witness had not been shown to have had sufficient opportunity to acquire such knowledge concerning the defendant's mind as would qualify her to answer the question asked her and this ground of objection was substantially included in the objection made by the district attorney.

5. Prejudicial misconduct on the part of the district attorney is alleged. The defendant was examined as a witness solely as to the circumstances under which the confession was made and preliminary to its introduction in evidence, for the purpose of showing that it was not freely and voluntarily made, and therefore should not be admitted in evidence, and he did not otherwise testify on the trial. After the jury had retired to deliberate, they were again brought into court upon request, and, through their foreman, stated that the reason for their request was that they desired to have the evidence given by defendant read to them. The district attorney, while not formally objecting to the reading of this evidence, apparently considered it incumbent on him to call the attention of the court to the fact that such evidence was addressed only to the question of the admission of the confession, and in a discussion between counsel and court that ensued said to the court: "In other words, that was not part of the defendant's case. He did not take the stand in his own behalf or give any testimony on his own behalf." Defendant's counsel excepting to this language, the judge at once fully instructed the jury, in effect, that they must not pay any attention to what was said between court and counsel in the discussion that was being had, and must not consider anything so said as evidence. He then very properly ordered the evidence of the defendant read to the jury, and it was read. The jury then retired for further deliberation.

The view of the district attorney that the jury were not entitled to consider the evidence of defendant for any purpose simply because it referred exclusively to the circumstances under which the confession was made was erroneous. The rule is the same as in the matter of dying declarations, stated by Mr. Greenleaf and quoted therefrom in People v. Thomson, 145 Cal. 724, 79 Pac. 435, as follows: "But after the evidence is admitted, its credibility is entirely within the province of the jury, who, of course, are at liberty to weigh all the circumstances under which the declarations were made, including those already proved to the judge, and to give the testimony only such credit as, upon the whole, they may think it deserves." The trial court adopted this view, and consequently ordered the evidence read to the jury.

The statement of the district attorney to the court quoted above was, of course, not a proper statement to make in the presence and hearing of the jury. As long as our law relative to a defendant's failure to testify remains as it is, district attorneys cannot be too careful in the matter of refraining from commenting in any way within the hearing of the jury upon such a failure or neglect on the part of a defendant to testify. The statement was, however, clearly enough one made solely to the court, not intended by the district attorney to influence the jury in any way. That it was not to be considered by them for any purpose they were clearly instructed by the court. In view of these instructions, and in view of the further fact that the extent of the evidence given by defendant was very clearly brought to their attention by the evidence itself, read to the jury without objection of any kind being made by the defendant, it is manifest that the mere statement of fact by the district attorney cannot be held to have been prejudicial.

The foregoing are all the points made by counsel for defendant. We have nevertheless examined the whole record, and find nothing therein to suggest that the defendant did not have a fair and impartial trial. The proceedings were apparently devoid of even technical error on the part of the learned trial judge.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Ex parte MULHOLLAND. (Cr. 143.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 6, 1910.)

Habeas Corpus (§ 44*)—Appellate Court—Original Issuance.

Where the order of a superior court showed that an appeal from a judgment of the justice court convicting one of violating a certain statute was dismissed for want of jurisdiction of the appeal, so that the validity of the statute, the real matter in issue, was never before the court, the appellate court would not originally issue a writ of habeas corpus upon defendant's petition therefor, averring that the matter was fully determined by the lower court, under rule 22 (78 Pac. xi), providing that the application for the writ shall first be made to the lower court, unless such circumstances are set forth in the application for the writ as the appellate court may deem sufficient to warrant the original issuance thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

W. A. Gett, for petitioner. Eugene S. Wachhorst, Dist. Atty., for the County.

PER CURIAM. In the above-entitled matter it appears that petitioner was convicted in the justice's court of Sacramento township, Sacramento county, for violating the act of the Legislature approved March 6, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 140), prohibiting the mooring and anchoring of house boats in rivers and streams of this state, within certain limits.

It is averred in the petition for the writ that "the said matter came on for hearing before the superior court of the county of Sacramento, state of California, and after consideration by the same the said judgment of the said justice court was by the said superior court * * * upheld and affirmed." It appears that no application or petition has been filed by the petitioner for a writ of habeas corpus in the said superior court. It appears also from the order of said court that, when said appeal came on to be heard in said court, the appeal was dismissed on the ground "that there is no statement on motion for a new trial settled and filed by or with the justice of the peace or filed with this court as required by law, and * * * this court has absolutely no jurisdiction of this appeal." There was therefore no hearing upon the merits and the real question at issue was not before the court, namely, the validity of the act called in question.

Rule 22 (78 Pac. xi), provides that the application for the writ shall first be made to the lower court, unless circumstances are set forth in the application, such as the appellate court may deem sufficient to warrant the issuing of the writ originally from the appellate court.

The only fact here shown in the petition on which the writ is asked for originally by this court is that the matter was fully heard and determined by the lower court and the validity of the act of the Legislature passed upon. The order of the lower court shows this not to be the fact.

The writ is denied.

PEARSON v. HENDRICK et al. (Civ. 821.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 5, 1910.)

1. WORK AND LABOR (§ 28*)—VALUE OF SERVICES—EVIDENCE.

In an action for services rendered, evidence held to show that the value of the services was a certain amount a day, though plaintiff himself based his opinion of the value of the services upon a percentage basis.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

2. ESTOPPEL (§ 88*)—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—ADMISSIONS.

The presentation of a bill for services rendered of a smaller amount than subsequently claimed would not preclude a recovery for the fair value of such services.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Purington & Adair, for appellants. Miguel Estudillo, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was to recover the value of certain work and labor performed and expenses incurred as a civil engineer on behalf of and to the defendants at their special instance and request, the reasonable value of which was alleged to have been $5,518.55, and a balance unpaid of $2,605.95. The answer denied the performance of the services or their value, and alleged that such services as were performed were under a special contract through which the sum should not exceed $2,500. Trial was had by the court, findings and judgment in favor of plaintiff, from which judgment, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal.

The specifications of error all relate to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. An examination of the record discloses that there is evidence tending to show that plaintiff rendered services as engineer to defendants at their request for a period of 200 days; that the fair value of such services in the locality was and is $15 per day; that there was no agreement limiting the cost of the work; that no payment had been made on account of these services; and that all the payments made were on account of expenses incident to the employment. These things being established, it is of no particular materiality that plaintiff himself should have based his opinion of the value of the services upon a percentage basis. Ignoring the plaintiff's testimony entirely as to the value of the services, it is established by independent evidence. It is true that it is disclosed in the record that, when plaintiff first presented his bill, it was for a smaller amount. This, however, would not preclude plaintiff from asserting a claim for the fair value of the services. Lackmann v. Kearney, 142 Cal. 115, 75 Pac. 668, and authorities cited. In our opinion the findings have ample support, and the judgment and order should not be disturbed.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. GRIDER. (Cr. 157.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1134*)—REVIEW—ORDER REFUSING NEW TRIAL.

Under Pen. Code, § 1259, permitting a review of all rulings, orders, etc., on accused's appeal from a judgment of conviction, all matters in the record including an order refusing a new trial can be reviewed if properly presented.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2997; Dec. Dig. § 1134.*]

2. LARCENY (§ 55*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to warrant a finding that accused obtained, with intent to convert to his own use, the ring he is charged to have stolen.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

3. LARCENY (§ 62*)—EVIDENCE.

On a trial for stealing a ring which accused obtained from the owner for use in a trade, the owner's declarations that "the worst of the whole thing" was that she had to give up the ring, and that she said she would only part with it for use in the trade, and that, if it was not necessary to so use it, the ring would be returned to her, and that she did not want to use it, are consistent with larceny by accused, and do not show that the owner parted with title through false pretenses, nor that accused came lawfully into possession as the owner's agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

4. LARCENY (§ 1*)—"FALSE PRETENSES" DISTINGUISHED.

Larceny and false pretenses are distinguishable, in that in larceny the owner does not intend to part with his property to accused, though he may intend to part with possession; while in false pretenses he does intend to part with his title.

5. LARCENY (§ 1*) — "EMBEZZLEMENT" DISTINGUISHED.

Larceny and embezzlement are distinguishable, in that in larceny possession of the property may be obtained by fraud, while it cannot be so obtained in embezzlement.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2350–2358; vol. 8, p. 7649.]

6. LARCENY (§ 75*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a larceny trial, an instruction that the prosecution was limited to a taking by "fraud, trick, or device," and that, when by means of fraud, artifice, or contrivance accused acquires possession of personalty fraudulently and with intention feloniously to steal when he gets possession, the offense is larceny if the person from whom the property is taken remains the owner, was not improper as implying that Pen. Code, § 332, prescribing punishment for winning at gaming by fraudulent means, was invoked to secure a conviction.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 706*)—MISCONDUCT BY PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

The test whether an improper question asked a witness by the prosecuting attorney is reversible misconduct depends upon the attorney's purpose in asking it, and if it was to take an unfair advantage of accused by intimating to the jury something that was not true, or not subject to proof in the manner attempted, it is error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1661; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 706*) — MISCONDUCT BY PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—ERROR NOT CURED.

If a prosecuting attorney knows when he asks a witness an improper question to prejudice accused before the jury that an objection should or will be sustained, the error is not cured by sustension of the objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1661; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 706*) — MISCONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

Where a prosecuting attorney asks accused questions which he knows to be improper, or to which he expects no answer, or where they are asked and withdrawn on objection, and are clearly intended to prejudice the jury against accused in a vital matter by the mere asking of the question, a conviction will be reversed, though objections to the questions were sustained, unless it appears that the questions could not have influenced the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1661; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 706*)—INTRODUCTION OF EVIDENCE — DUTY OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

When a prosecuting attorney desires to show guilty knowledge by accused, or evidence that is a part of a scheme to commit the offense charged, or introduces other proper evidence and the purpose is not clearly apparent from his question, he should state to the court on what ground the evidence is proper, and, if its relevancy is not then made apparent, he may state the relation of the fact sought to be shown to the offense, but his declarations should be so stated as to give no color to the case in the jurors' minds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1661; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 706*)—MISCONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—COMMENTS DURING TAKING OF EVIDENCE.

The persistent argument of the facts of the case by the prosecuting attorney on objections to questions propounded by him was prejudicial error where he apparently intended to influence the jury.

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 655*) — REMARKS BY TRIAL JUDGE—PROPRIETY.

Where accused's attorney commented on the testimony of the complaining witness during the taking of evidence, it was proper for the trial judge to say that he did not desire counsel to pass such strictures on the witness, since it might tend to prejudice the jury against the witness, which ought not to occur at least before final argument.

15. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1162*)—ERRORS—HARMFULNESS.

16. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1163*)—ERRORS—HARMFULNESS.

Charles C. Grider was convicted of larceny, and he appeals from the judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Milton K. Young and W. Ona Morton (Earl Rogers and W. H. Dehm, of counsel), for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TAGGART, J. Information for grand larceny, verdict of guilty, and sentence of imprisonment in state's prison for two years. Appeal in open court from judgment and from order of court denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The Attorney General objects to the consideration of the appeal from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground that, although such an appeal still exists under section 1237 of the Penal Code by reason of the amendment of sections 1239, 1240, and 1241 in 1909, no method for taking such an appeal is now provided by law; that, prior to the amendments referred to, a method of appeal from the judgment or any order was provided by section 1239, whereas, now the appeal in open court is limited to the judgment and orders made after judgment, and therefore does not include orders relating to a motion for a new trial. While the view of the Attorney General would be correct, if this matter were considered only in connection with the sections mentioned, under section 1259 of the Penal Code, all the matters in the record may be reviewed by this court if properly presented. This objection is urged as affecting only the error assigned by the misconduct of the district attorney.

The larceny of appellant was predicated upon the taking from the complaining witness of a diamond ring of the value of $550. Owing to the pressing demands of the holders of some liens thereon, the complaining witness called upon the defendant, who was a real estate dealer, to negotiate a sale or exchange a lot in Venice belonging to her. According to her testimony, defendant advised her that one McCarthy would exchange two lots in Redondo for her Venice lot and a sealskin coat which she owned. To this she assented, but later defendant told her that McCarthy would trade if she put up the ring instead of the coat, but would not otherwise. She at first refused to part with the ring, but defendant insisted and reminded her of her possible loss of the Venice lot if she did not make the trade. As she testified: "I took it (the ring) off my finger (and had it in my hand, and) he took it out of my hand while we were discussing the matter." Not being able to get the ring back, she consented to its use, if necessary, to carry out the trade with McCarthy, but for no other purpose. Defendant never returned the ring to her, and McCarthy testified that he accepted the proposition to trade for the sealskin coat, but that in his negotiations with the defendant no mention was made of any ring; that he never demanded one and never received one. As these negotiations were all had prior to the time of the taking of the ring by the defendant, an intent upon his part to convert the ring to his own use at the time of procuring it from the complainant might reasonably be inferred from these facts.

In presenting the first point made by appellant, to wit, that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, it is contended that certain statements which the complainant testified to having made to others, about the transaction, are inconsistent with the facts necessary to constitute a larceny. For instance: "The worst of the whole thing is that I had to give up my ring;" and "I said it would only be with that provision that if it was necessary to use the ring in the Redondo lots, but, if it was not necessary, that the ring should be returned to me, and in no way was the ring to be used in any other way. I didn't want to use it then." The theory upon which the case was tried is indicated in the instructions given by the trial court. The jury were instructed that the case for the people was limited to a taking by fraud, trick, or device, and that "the law is that, when by means of fraud, or artifice, or any other kind of contrivance the possession of personal property is fraudulently obtained from another, and the party so obtaining the possession acquires it with the intention feloniously of stealing the property when he gets possession of it, then the crime is larceny; provided, the person from whom the property was taken still remains the owner of the property, and has not parted with the title. One of the questions, therefore, for the jury to consider in this case is whether there was a parting with the title by the witness A. D. Van Houten." It also instructed them that, in order to convict the defendant, the jury must believe "that she did not at the time intend to part with her ownership in said ring, but was induced by fraud of the defendant to part with the possession," there being at the time a "felonious intention on defendant's part, in taking the ring, to steal the said ring."

The distinction between "false pretense" and "embezzlement" on the one hand and larceny on the other is clearly recognized by these instructions, and the statements quoted from the complaining witness' testimony are entirely consistent with the crime of larceny. These statements do not as appellant contends show that she parted with the title by reason of false pretenses, nor that defendant came lawfully, as distinguished from fraudulently, into the possession of the property as the agent of Mrs. Van Houten. These statements, together with the other evidence in the case, justified the jury in drawing the inference that the defendant obtained the ring with the felonious intent to convert it to his own use by means of his misrepresentations as to the McCarthy trade, knowing that the complainant had no intention of parting with the title to him when she gave him the possession of it. Indeed, under the evidence, they might well have found that he obtained possession of it against her will and retained it (the possession) by fraud, and that she did not give it to him at all. They were justified in finding from the evidence that it was his intention from the beginning to obtain it by force or fraud and appropriate it to his own use.

In a larceny of the kind under consideration the owner of the thing has no intention to part with his property therein to the person taking it, although he may intend to part with the possession. In false pretenses the owner does intend to part with his property in the money or chattel to the person to whom he delivers the possession, but is induced to do so by the fraud or false pretenses of such person or some one on his behalf. People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 734, 736, 81 Pac. 131. As between a larceny of this character and an embezzlement, the chief distinction lies in the presence of the fraudulent and felonious intent with which the possession of personal property is procured by the accused, in the case of the larceny, and the absence of this in embezzlement. Measured by these distinctions, the evidence here does not disclose a variance, as appellant contends, but sustains the charge in the information. It seems hardly necessary, in the light of what is said above, to distinguish the charge here and the evidence in its support from the acts punishable under section 332 of the Penal Code. The use of the terms "fraud, trick, or device" by the trial court in its instructions does not imply that this section was invoked to secure a conviction. The instruction in which these words appear is one in which the crime of larceny is being defined by the court, and, if the element of "felonious" intent be necessary, it is sufficiently supplied elsewhere to prevent prejudice. The instruction is not one which directs a conviction. This is true of the other instructions of similar purport to which exception is taken.

The refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury as requested by the defendant with reference to his honest belief that he was entitled to the ring was not error. The instruction given by the court on this matter was all that defendant could ask.

It is also contended that defendant was deprived of a fair trial by the misconduct of the district attorney during the trial of the cause. Among the instances of misconduct assigned as error are the following: An expert witness testifying to the value of the diamond in question on behalf of the prosecution exhibited a diamond belonging to himself, which he characterized as an exact match for the one in question in the case, and the defendant asked that this diamond be made an exhibit in the case. To this the district attorney objected, as he stated, "in view of the fact that the defendant himself has the ring alleged to have been stolen in this case, and in the absence of any showing * * * that he cannot produce it, * * * when there is no showing that the real thing, the stolen diamond, the ring alleged to have been stolen, could not be produced in court." After objection made, the court directed the first sentence reread by the reporter and ordered it stricken out, and instructed the jury to disregard it. Nothing was said or done as to the rest of the statement, although the entire language was objected to. On the cross-examination of the defendant, in seeking to elicit evidence tending to show that the complaining witness was under great financial stress of which defendant had taken advantage, the district attorney asked the question: "Didn't she give that reason in her conversation that she would turn that property over because of the judgment?" The witness replied: "I think Mrs. Van Houten said that she would not transfer that lot, or make a deal on account of the judgment, because she didn't have the money to pay for it, if I remember correctly." Whereupon, the district attorney made the following comment: "Yes, I think that was right. She didn't have the money and she was under this burden. She had to get out from under it as fast as she could and she went to you to help her out." This was followed by the question: "I think that was the way, wasn't it?" No answer to this question was sought and none was given. On another occasion, in cross-examining the defendant as to a conversation had with the complainant, the district attorney asked this question: "Didn't she say in that conversation that she had talked with her attorney, and he had said for her to have absolutely nothing to do with you unless you could be bound up in black and white?" Upon an objection being made to this question, the district attorney withdrew it, but added to his statement making the withdrawal: "The defendant knows all about it." To this remark the defendant's counsel excepted and objected on the ground that this was an improper method of getting before the jury a matter which was not evidence.

Were these the only matters, perhaps it might be said that they are not sufficient to justify the setting aside of a verdict of guilty and a reversal of the judgment, but these are only instances showing the general atmosphere of adverse comment, remark, and running argument of the case by the district attorney throughout the trial. In a number of instances, under the guise of stating the purpose for which evidence was sought to be introduced, the conclusions and deductions of the district attorney and comments upon the evidence already in were made. These arguments were objected to and in some instances the court instructed the jury in relation thereto; at other times these remarks were unrebuked and no instructions given, and in one instance, while the evidence was being received, when the attorney for defendant objected to the district attorney making a speech before the jury, the trial court, instead of suggesting that the remarks be confined strictly to what was proper, said: "No, I want to hear this. But you can take your exception." The language of the district attorney preceding this objection was: "I will have to state my purpose is to show by this witness it runs to the intent of the defendant, and his good faith in dealing with the prosecuting witness in this case relative to this ring. In other words, had he been seeking every opportunity possible to place this prosecuting witness— (Here interrupted by the objection and remark of the court.)" After an argument in similar vein to that apparent in the last sentence, covering a page of the transcript, the district attorney was again interrupted by defendant's counsel, whereupon the court said: "In order that there may be no prejudice, the jury are instructed that what the attorney says is not evidence." In another instance the district attorney, in stating his purpose for introducing certain acts and statements of defendant, said they would "indicate that his intention, possibly from the very earliest acquaintance with this woman, after, as she has testified, he continually admired the ring, and continuously schemed and devised and practiced artifice and fraud, with a view to obtaining possession of that ring—what for? In order to steal it." There are numerous other instances of similar character. Where an improper question is asked of a witness by a district attorney, the test whether it is misconduct is found in answer to the question: "What was the purpose of counsel in asking the question?" If it was to take an unfair advantage of the defendant by intimating to the jury something that was either not true or not capable of being proven in the manner attempted, then it is error. And, if the district attorney knows when he asks the question that an objection to the question should or will be sustained, the error is not corrected because the objection is sustained. Where the prosecuting attorney asks a defendant questions which he knows to be wholly wrong, and where the questions are asked without expectation of answers, or where they are asked and withdrawn upon objection, and the clear purpose is to prejudce the jury against the defendant in a vital matter, by the mere asking of the questions, then a judgment against the defendant will be reversed, although objections to the questions were sustained, unless it appears that the questions could not have influenced the verdict. People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459, 34 Pac. 1078.

When a district attorney desires to introduce evidence of guilty knowledge on the defendant's part, or evidence that is a part of a system, scheme, or conspiracy to commit the crime charged, or any other evidence properly admissible, and the purpose is not clearly apparent from the question propounded, he should state to the court upon what ground he bases his right to have the evidence admitted. If its relevancy to the purpose declared is not then made apparent to the court, he may state the relation of the facts sought to be elicited to those constituting the crime. In doing this he should have due and proper regard to the fact that his proffer is being made in the presence of the jury, that it is merely tentative and may be denied by the court, and that what is said ought not to be so stated as to give any color to the case in the minds of the jurors. When the evidence is all admitted and the testimony closed, it is early enough for the jury to consider it, and the views of the district attorney as to its weight must be reserved until the proper time to argue the case arrives. For him to do otherwise would be to induce the jurors to violate the oath taken by them at each adjournment of the court "not to form or express any opinion upon the case until it is finally submitted to them." The persistent argument of the facts of the case by the district attorney here whenever an objection was made by the defendant to a question propounded by the district attorney, or at least for quite a number of times, was certainly prejudicial. There can be no doubt that the iteration and reiteration of these conclusions and arguments were intended to support what the district attorney regarded as a weak point in his case. It was his apparent intention to influence the jury and we cannot say that he did not.

The rule was properly stated by the trial court when it rebuked the attorney for defendant for commenting on the testimony of the complaining witness in the following language: "I don't want you to pass those sort of strictures upon the witness, because that may have a tendancy to prejudice the jury against the witness, which, if such feeling is created, ought not to be done, at least before the final argument of the case." This and several other remarks of the trial judge are assigned as misconduct on the part of the court and as showing feeling upon the part of the judge adverse to the defendant. The trial judge's rebuke to counsel in the foregoing language was proper under the circumstances. The other remarks of the court which are assigned as misconduct do not indicate any feeling of prejudice toward defendant or his case. It is not necessary that we determine whether or not the trial court violated the rule recognized by the Supreme Court in People v. Blackman, 127 Cal. 248, 59 Pac. 573, and People v. Tupper, 122 Cal. 424, 55 Pac. 125, 68 Am. St. Rep. 44, by being absent from the courtroom temporarily during the time counsel was arguing the case to the jury, but we think it our duty to say that, while those cases are accepted as precedents by the appellate courts of the state, absences of trial judges from the courtroom while the trial is in progress, however brief, cannot be safely indulged in.

The showing of newly discovered evidence is not such as to warrant us in saying the trial court abused its discretion in not granting a new trial on this ground. This is true whether we consider it as evidence affecting the issues tried, or as impeaching evidence tending to weaken the testimony of the complaining witness. The effect of the evidence, considered in either way, is a matter which the trial court is best qualified to pass upon, and its conclusion will not be disturbed in this instance. Loath as appellate courts are to set aside verdicts or reverse judgments in criminal cases upon the ground that the defendant's rights have been prejudiced by the misconduct of district attorneys alone, this has been found necessary in at least two recent cases. People v. Mohr, 109 Pac. 476; People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592, 102 Pac. 266. In the latter case the court, in speaking of the effect of the rebuking of counsel by the court as a correction of the error, quotes from People v. Valliere, 127 Cal. 65, 59 Pac. 295, as follows: "Rebukes do not seem to have any effect upon prosecuting officers, and probably as little on juries. The only way to secure fair trials is to set verdicts so procured aside."

The vital element to be considered in connection with all irregularities or misconduct of court, counsel, party, or jury is, Are the substantial rights of the complaining party materially affected thereby? This being shown, it will be presumed that he was injured, unless the contrary affirmatively appears. In other words, the burden is on the moving party to show the irregularity or misconduct which might have prevented a fair trial. When this is done, the burden shifts to the successful party to show as a matter of fact that the irregularity or misconduct did not affect the result. It is the reasoning of this rule which underlies the declaration of the court in People v. Wells, supra, that where the misconduct of a district attorney tends to prejudice the jury against the defendant, in a vital matter, the judgment will be reversed unless it appears that the asking of the improper questions complained of could not have influenced the verdict. We are unable to say that the misconduct did not influence the jury in this case.

Judgment and order reversed, and new trial ordered.

We concur: ALLEN, P. J., SHAW, J.

13 Cal. App. 689

NORTHWESTERN REDWOOD CO. v. DICKEN. (Civ. 703.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 29, 1910. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 25, 1910.)

1. New Trial (§ 123*)—Motion—Statement.

Where the notice of intention to move for a new trial required by Code Civ. Proc. § 659, to state whether the motion will be on affidavits, or the minutes, or a bill of exceptions, or statement of the case, states it will be on a statement, the record of the proceedings settled by the judge as a "bill of exceptions," and on which the motion was made, may be treated as a statement.

2. New Trial (§ 131*)—Motion—Statement—Specification of Error.

The specification of error in a statement on which a motion for new trial is made that "the court erred in each and every time in which evidence was admitted, over plaintiff's objections, of statements made by R. not in the presence or hearing of plaintiff or any of its officials or agents, to the admission of which evidence plaintiff duly excepted"—is sufficiently direct and definite.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

3. Evidence (§ 121*) — Res Gestæ—Completion of Transaction.

The point at issue in an action for price of supplies furnished by plaintiff for a mill after R. had taken possession of it under an instrument signed by defendant as to the transaction between defendant and R., being as to their legal relations under the instrument—whether it effected an executory contract of sale of the mill by defendant to R., or only an offer of sale by defendant to R. with a provision that R. should take possession of the property to manage it for defendant till R. determined whether he would buy it—the transaction was completed as regards the admissibility as part of the res gestæ, of R.'s declaration, while in possession, that he had bought the mill from defendant, when the instrument was signed, as well if the instrument was an executory contract of sale, and a formal transfer of the property had not taken place, as if it was a mere option.

4. Evidence (§ 317*) — Hearsay — Declarations.

One's declaration, not admissible as part of the res gestæ of the transaction to which it related, having been made after the consummation thereof, not having been made in the presence of the parties to the action to which he is not a party, is mere hearsay, and so inadmissible for any purpose except on proper foundation laid to impeach him.

5. Appeal and Error (§ 1054*)—Harmless Error—Admission of Evidence.

The ruling of the court admitting evidence aliunde an instrument for the ascertainment of its intent, whether an executory contract of sale or an option was intended to be effected by the transaction as evidenced thereby, being conclusive that it was in doubt as to its legal effect, it must have been influenced by, so as to render prejudicial the admission of, the declaration of a party to the contract, but not to the action, made after he had gone into possession of the property under the instrument, that he had bought the property; the language of the instrument being apparently opposed to the construction put on it by the court, even if there was some language in it lending color thereto, and it having nothing but the instrument and such declaration on which to rest its conclusion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by the Northwestern Redwood Company against J. D. Dicken. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

HART, J. This is an action by the plaintiff to recover from defendant the sum of $664.79, alleged to be a balance due on an account. The case was tried by the court without a jury and the defendant given judgment. A new trial was denied to the plaintiff, and this appeal is from the order disallowing the motion therefor.

Respondent makes a preliminary objection to the consideration of the record here, claiming that the record of the proceedings contained in the transcript is neither a statement of the case nor a bill of exceptions. The notice of motion for a new trial states that said motion "will be made upon affidavits and upon a statement of the case," and counsel for respondent declares that, inasmuch as the document intended as a statement or a bill of exceptions is thereafter at all times referred to by counsel for the appellant and the judge in his certificate as a "bill of exceptions," we must accept such characterization of the document as conclusive of its character and treat it as a bill of exceptions and not a statement. But it is further insisted that, even if it may be said to be a statement, it must be disregarded, since it does not contain, as required by section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, specifications of the particular errors occurring at the trial and excepted to by the appellant referred to in the notice of motion. While the record of the proceedings in the court below as set forth in the transcript was settled by the judge as a "bill of exceptions," we think that it may be treated as either a statement or a bill of exceptions, and that in either case the principal, if not, in fact, the only, errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to for which a reversal of the order is asked, are sufficiently pointed out in the "specification of errors" to have enabled the trial court to properly consider them and to enable this court to review them without difficulty or inconvenience. These errors are thus specified in the statement or bill: "(1) The court erred in each and every time in which evidence was admitted over plaintiff's objections of statements made by L. J. Roach not in the presence or hearing of plaintiff or any of its officials or agents, to the admission of which evidence plaintiff duly excepted." Then follows a general or an omnibus specification assigning as error all the other rulings of the court against the objections of appellant. The first specification, however, was, as stated, sufficiently direct and definite to indicate the errors upon which appellant relied for a new trial and demands a reversal of the order denying it, and we shall therefore proceed to review the record as to the errors thus pointed out. The plaintiff is a corporation, organized in pursuance of the laws of this state, and engaged, among other things, in the general merchandising business, at Willits, in Mendocino county. The defendant had for a number of years prior to July 6, 1907, prosecuted the business of cutting and manufacturing lumber on a body of timber land, consisting of 1,800 acres, situated on Cave creek, in said county. During all said time the plaintiff furnished defendant with supplies necessary for his domestic use and for the purposes of his lumber mills, and the latter, it seems, was accustomed to shipping and delivering to plaintiff from time to time, or as it was manufactured, the lumber from his mill. The plaintiff would upon the receipt of the lumber credit the defendant upon its books for the lumber so delivered and received at the current market prices. On the 6th day of July, 1907, the defendant, having previously entered into negotiations with one L. J. Roach for the sale of his lumber mill and the timber growing on the land mentioned, executed the following agreement with said Roach, said agreement being upon its face, as will be observed, unilateral: "Willits, Cal., July 6, 1907. For and in consideration of the sum of ten dollars, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I hereby agree to sell to L. J. Roach all my timber on 1800 acres, more or less, situated on Cave Creek in Mendocino county, for seventy-five cents per M ft. as determined by a disinterested competent timber cruiser, or two thousand dollars cash, at option of Roach, and to allow said Roach fifteen years from date of final consummation of sale to remove said timber, said Roach to be allowed mill sites and all necessary rights of way on any portion of said lands for twenty years from date of sale, same to be incorporated in formal instrument of transfer to be drawn by parties hereto. I also agree to sell to L. J. Roach all my mill property and appurtenances of every description, including saw mill, machinery, logging tools, skid-ways, four horses, ten oxen, harnesses, yokes, four wagons, two trucks, rigging, cooking utensils, etc., all for $4,400 to be incorporated in inventory to be taken by parties hereto. I agree to furnish complete abstract of title to said land and to allow 30 days from date of delivery to said Roach to examine same, and to allow ten days from acceptance by said Roach to complete sale after all necessary legal requirements shall have been complied with. Said Roach to take immediate possession of said premises and conduct operations for me until final sale or rejection of title. J. D. Dicken." The sum of $10 was paid to Dicken by Roach upon the execution of said instrument. On the 7th day of July, 1907, in pursuance of the foregoing agreement, said Roach took possession and control of the mill and lumber manufacturing business referred to therein. The plaintiff continued to furnish supplies to the mill, but charged the same on its books to the defendant, and Roach delivered to the plaintiff, as defendant had always done, the lumber manufactured at the mill. The lumber so delivered was credited by plaintiff on the account of defendant. Roach operated the business for a little over a month, when he abandoned it.

It may here be stated that "it was stipulated and agreed by the parties in open court that the account sued on and an itemized bill for which was then on file among the papers in the case was correct, so far as the particular items thereof were concerned; that the goods to the amount of $800 had been sold and delivered to some one at the 'Dicken Mill' mentioned in the evidence; but it was not admitted that defendant was liable therefor." It was further admitted that "the controversy was in part whether said goods were sold to defendant through one L. J. Roach, as his agent, or to said L. J. Roach on his own account." The claim of the defendant against the complainant is that he agreed to sell and Roach agreed to buy the mill and the timber on his land on the 6th day of July, 1907, and that the instrument above quoted was intended as evidence of a contract of sale. The plaintiff and Roach insist that the quoted instrument was intended as evidencing an option only, and that Roach took possession of the property, not as a purchaser, but to manage the same for Dicken until he (Roach) should determine whether he would buy the property or not. It appears that the written instrument or agreement on the part of Dicken quoted above had been altered in a material respect either before or after the time at which it was signed by Dicken. The document was prepared by one E. A. Selfridge, Jr., president of plaintiff corporation. As so prepared originally the last sentence of the writing read as follows: "Said Roach to take immediate possession of said premises and conduct operations from date until final sale or rejection of title." Selfridge and Roach testified that, when Dicken was about to sign the instrument, Roach objected to the words "from date" contained in said last sentence, saying to Selfridge in the presence of Dicken that "he would not go out there with the possibility of the option being rejected, the sale not going through." Selfridge then said, "Very well. We will change 'from date' and say 'for me.'" The alteration thus suggested was then made, and, according to the testimony of Selfridge and Roach, with the consent of both Dicken and Roach, and as so altered the agreement or writing was signed by Dicken. Dicken flatly contradicted Selfridge and Roach on this point, and emphatically declared that the alteration was made after he had signed the instrument and without his knowledge and consent. The court found with and in favor of Dicken as to the alteration, and held the transaction resulting in the writing to have constituted a contract for the sale of the property to Roach.

It appears from testimony offered and received on behalf of plaintiff that at the time of the alleged sale of the property to Roach Dicken was indebted to plaintiff for supplies in a large sum of money, and that Roach, while running the mill, delivered lumber to plaintiff of much greater value than the supplies and cash furnished Roach by plaintiff during the period of time he was operating the business. As stated, the lumber delivered to plaintiff by Roach was credited to the account of Dicken so that the excess in the value of the lumber delivered by Roach over the supplies and cash received by him from plaintiff obviously contributed materially toward the reduction of the latter's account against Dicken. As seen, according to the complaint, the sum to which plaintiff's claim against Dicken was thus and otherwise reduced amounted to $664.79, to recover which this action was instituted. From what has thus far been seen of this controversy, as it is presented by the pleadings and the evidence, the vital point hinges upon the legal nature and effect of the transaction between Dicken and Roach as evidenced by the writing executed by Dicken on July 6, 1907, and quoted in this opinion.

If the transaction amounted to the making of an executory contract of sale of the mill and the timber on defendant's land, then manifestly Roach was alone responsible for all obligations incurred while he operated the mill, and was entitled to all credits for lumber delivered by him to plaintiff during the same period or term. If, on the other hand, the transaction involved only an option on the part of Dicken to sell to Roach and the latter assumed control and management of the property for Dicken, then it is equally manifest that, in the absence of any other agreement to the contrary, Dicken continued to be responsible for all supplies furnished the mill necessary in the operation thereof and was entitled to all credits for all lumber delivered to plaintiff by Roach during the period the latter operated the mill. In this latter case, in other words, Roach was only an agent of Dicken. A correct construction of the transaction between Dicken and Roach is therefore of vital importance.

To aid it in the construction of said transaction, the trial court, over the objections of plaintiff, admitted evidence of the declarations of Roach, made to the witnesses testifying thereto, after Dicken had executed the writing and Roach had taken charge of the property, and not in the presence of either plaintiff or defendant, to the effect that he (Roach) had bought from Dicken, and was the owner of, the lumber mill and the business connected therewith. The rulings of the court admitting this testimony constitute the principal subject of discussion in the briefs as well as the main reason for which appellant urges that the order should be reversed. The rulings referred to were, in our opinion, not only erroneous, but, in view of the purpose of the evidence admitted thereunder, were highly prejudicial to the plaintiff. Roach is not a party to this action, and his declarations after the consummation of the transaction not in the presence of the plaintiff that he had bought the mill and lumber business from Dicken constituted the plainest sort of hearsay testimony and could have been admissible under no conceivable theory except, after proper foundation had been laid therefor, for the purpose of impeaching Roach. These declarations were not properly receivable in evidence under the rule of res gestæ, and obviously not admissible on the ground that they constituted declarations against the interest of the declarant. Nor would proof of such declarations constitute proper substantive or independent and affirmative evidence contradictory to the testimony of Roach. Undoubtedly, where the intention of the parties to a written contract is rendered obscure by the ambiguity of the language in which its terms are expressed, evidence of declarations of the parties to said contract or either of them made contemporaneously with the negotiation and execution of the agreement, if explanatory of the purpose or intent of the same, would be admissible as part of the transaction or res gestæ. But it is very clear that such declarations made by either of the parties, not in the presence of the parties to the action, after the transaction has been fully completed, in an action between one of the parties to the transaction and a third party, would involve a narrative of a past event, and therefore constitute hearsay testimony pure and simple. By no known rule of law are declarations thus made binding upon a stranger to the transaction.

But counsel for respondent advances the theory that at the time the alleged declarations were made "the transaction was not completed and would not have been completed until the final transfer of title by Dicken to Roach." In this counsel is mistaken. The question to be determined by the court as to the transaction between Dicken and Roach was: What were the legal relations established between them by the instrument whose terms were sought to be explained in part by the declarations of Roach after the execution of said instrument? Whatever was intended to be accomplished by the transaction evidenced by the writing—whether an agreement to sell and buy the property involved or only an option to buy the same—was completed by the execution by Dicken of said writing. The point at issue as to this transaction, was whether an executory contract of sale had thus been effected or only an offer to sell tendered to Roach. Dicken claimed that it was an executory contract of sale. Roach contended that it was only intended as an offer or an option, and, as stated, the question was as to the legal effect of that transaction, which was, whatever may have been its ultimate purpose and scope, as fully completed as a transaction resulting in the actual sale of property could be. In other words, a contract involving an option to buy property is as fully a completed contract to the extent of the only purpose intended to be accomplished thereby as is a contract of sale or a contract for any other purpose. The gist of a contract of option is the right given thereby to accept or reject an offer to sell within a stipulated or reasonable time. If, therefore, as Roach testified, the transaction evidenced by the writing amounted to an option only, then it was completed as such upon the execution of the instrument by Dicken. If, on the other hand, it was intended as, and in fact constituted, an executory agreement to sell, as the trial court found the transaction to be, then the transaction itself was completed, even though there was something remaining to be done to fully consummate the effect of said transaction. In other words, accepting the defendant's construction of the transaction, the execution or completion of the agreement on his part to sell and on Roach's part to buy the property was a completion of that transaction, and the fact that a formal transfer of the property had not taken place at the time the declarations were made by Roach would not extend the "transaction" culminating in the agreement to sell and buy so as to make said declarations admissible under the rule of res gestæ.

The case of Lewis v. Burns, 106 Cal. 381, 39 Pac. 778, cited by respondent, was where the declarations of one De Blainville, deceased at the time of the trial, were allowed in evidence for the purpose of showing the character of a transaction by which certain real property was conveyed by the declarant to the wife of the plaintiff. De Blainville, by whom the plaintiff and his wife were employed, retained their wages, and during the period of said employment acted as their friend and adviser, and also acted for them in the investment of their earnings. The deeds to the property so bought by De Blainville for plaintiff and his wife were by the advice of De Blainville taken in the wife's name. The plaintiff was then a man of dissipated habits, and it was perhaps on this account that De Blainville suggested that the deeds be taken in the name of his wife. However, the wife, before her death, conveyed the property to her brother and sister, reserving to herself during life the rents, issues, and profits thereof. Upon her death her husband brought an action to quiet title to said property, and the question submitted for trial was whether the property was a gift from De Blainville to the wife, "or whether in purchasing said property De Blainville acted as the agent of the plaintiff and his wife and as their adviser," and the property so purchased constituted community property because of having been purchased with community funds. The Supreme Court held that "the declarations of De Blainville as to his intentions in the premises, made at the time he purchased the lots and constructed the houses upon them illustrative of his intent, formed a part of the res gestæ, and were admissible in evidence." In other words, the declarations of De Blainville constituted a part of the very transaction on which the cause of action in that case rested. They were not, as here, made after the completion of the transaction.

The case of Bates v. Ableman, 13 Wis. 644, also cited by respondent in connection with the attempted application of the rule of res gestæ to the declarations of Roach, afford no support to his position. This case, as we read it, is against him. There the validity of an assignment by a party for the benefit of his creditors was the question in controversy. The trial court refused to allow a witness to testify to declarations made by the assignor in insolvency after the assignment as to his intention in making it. The Wisconsin court, speaking of this ruling, said: "We think it (the testimony) was properly excluded. The statements of Seymour were not those of a party to the suit, and were not admissible on that ground. They were not admissions of a vendor with respect to his title, made before he had parted with it. They were no part of the res gestæ. We can therefore see no principle of evidence upon which they could be admitted. It is undoubtedly true that, where the intent of a party to a sale is in issue, his statements at the time, and so connected with the transaction as to be a part of the res gestæ, are competent evidence to show such intent, even though the person is not a party to the suit. But where they are not so connected with the transaction, but are offered as mere admissions after it occurred, he not being a party to the suit, they are no more competent for that purpose than they would be to prove any other material fact. They are then mere hearsay. And, although a person may be presumed to know very well what his intention was, yet that fact does not make his mere statements, not under oath, proper evidence to prove it, any more than any other material fact equally well known to a witness, could be proved in the same way." We think the foregoing language very clearly expresses the situation here.

The very recent case—in the Matter of the Estate of Henry Gird, Deceased, 108 Pac. 499—was where the question whether the decedent was the father of the distributees of the estate of the deceased was the vital issue. A futile attempt was made to prove certain declarations alleged to have been made by the mother of said distributees to a doctor, some months prior to the birth of one of the children, "to the effect that she was 'in the family way' by one Smith, and that she desired to be rid of the child by an operation." Upholding the ruling of the trial court excluding said declarations, the court say: "This proposed evidence was properly excluded by the trial court. Alice was not a party to this proceeding, but only a witness on behalf of her children. Evidence of these declarations by her to the physician would have been pure hearsay, in no way binding on her children as evidence on the question of paternity. Being contrary to her evidence given on that question, the declarations, waiving other objections thereto, would have been admissible by way of impeachment of Alice as a witness, but a complete answer to appellants' claim in this regard is that no foundation was laid for any such impeachment on the examination of Alice."

There is, as we have declared, no express rule of evidence or principle of law which would authorize the proof of these declarations for any other purpose than as a matter of impeachment, except, of course, in those cases where the declarant is a party to the action. In addition to section 1850 of the Code of Civil Procedure, counsel for respondent refers to sections 1851 and 1854 of the same Code as authorizing this evidence. The sections so cited, as well as section 1870 of said Code, specifically point out the kinds of declarations that are competent to be proved and the conditions upon which they may be given in evidence. The declarations here do not come within any of the sections mentioned. They were, in other words, neither admissible as "against interest," within the purview of any section of the Code authorizing proof of extrajudicial declarations, nor as "prima facie evidence between the parties" to this action, within the meaning of section 1851 of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor as "a part of an act, declaration, conversation or writing" which had been given in evidence within the contemplation of section 1854 of said Code. That the effect of the rulings of the trial court admitting these declarations was to greatly prejudice the rights of plaintiff in the action cannot for a moment be doubted. The instrument which is the main subject of this controversy appears from its language to be nothing more than a mere option, or as involving only the bestowal upon Roach by Dicken of the right to accept or reject, within a certain time, the offer therein contained to buy the property mentioned at the price named. It is plainly apparent, therefore, that, in order to show that the transaction resulting in the execution of the instrument by Dicken constituted an executory contract of sale, parol testimony was absolutely necessary to be received. In fact, the rulings of the court admitting testimony aliunde the instrument itself for the ascertainment of its intent conclusively show that the court was in doubt as to the legal effect of the transaction as evidenced by the writing, for it may safely be assumed that, if the language of the instrument itself had been reasonably clear in the expression of the intent of the parties to the transaction, the court would have neither required nor allowed parol testimony to be introduced upon the subject, since, under such circumstances, testimony independent of the writing itself would not have been necessary to aid the court in the construction of the instrument. Clearly, then, the court, in forming its conclusion as to the nature in legal effect of the relations established between Dicken and Roach by the transaction, must have been influenced to a very great extent by the evidence of the declarations of Roach, not a party to the action, made after the completion of said transaction.

Of course, if, as we have in effect before observed, some competent evidence had been received showing that the transaction was of the nature claimed for it by respondent, a reviewing court would not perhaps feel justified in disturbing a finding based upon such testimony. But the situation here is that the court's general findings (there is no specific finding upon the point under consideration), which necessarily embrace a finding that the transaction between Dicken and Roach amounted to an executory contract of sale must rest, if at all, solely upon a construction of a writing whose language is apparently opposed to such construction. But, even if it could be said that there is some language in the instrument which lends some color to the construction which the court has given it, the evidence of the declarations of Roach must nevertheless be held to have been prejudicial.

In Estate of James, 124 Cal. 653, 57 Pac. 578, 1008, it was contended "that there is sufficient evidence in the record, which came before the court without objection, to support the findings of fact, and that, therefore, even conceding the admission of evidence under objection which should have been denied admission, still a new trial for the aforesaid reasons should not be ordered." In answer to that contention, the court said: "This position cannot be sustained. If improper evidence under objection has been admitted, it is impossible for this court to say how much weight and influence it had in the mind of the trial court in framing its findings of fact. The improperly admitted evidence may have been all powerful to that effect. As far as this court knows, it may have been that particular evidence which turned the scale and lost the case to appellants. This must of necessity be the rule wherever improper evidence has been admitted which upon its face tends in any degree to affect the final conclusion of the court." (Italics ours.)

There can be no doubt, as previously suggested, that the evidence of Roach's declarations contributed in no small degree to the conclusion reached by the trial court with regard to the nature of the transaction between Dicken and Roach.

There are some other questions discussed by counsel in their briefs, but the point to which we have solely addressed our attention is conceded by counsel for the respondent to involve the pivotal proposition in the controversy, and therefore in view of our conclusion as to said point, others need not be noticed.

The order refusing plaintiff a new trial is reversed, and the cause remanded to the court below for trial de novo.

WHITLEY et al. v. BRADLEY. (Civ. 545.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 5, 1910.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 955*)—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER — REVIEW — DISCRETION OF COURT.

The power to appoint a receiver pendente lite is one resting in the sound judicial discretion of the trial court, which will not be disturbed on appeal, in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3822; Dec. Dig. § 955.*]

2. RECEIVERS (§ 16*)—GROUNDS FOR APPOINTMENT—PRESERVATION OF PROPERTY.

The power to appoint a receiver pendente lite will not be exercised, except on a satisfactory showing that it is necessary to preserve and protect the rights of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. §§ 24–28; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

3. RECEIVERS (§ 16*)—GROUNDS FOR APPOINTMENT—INTEREST OF APPLICANT.

A party seeking the appointment of a receiver pendente lite must show at least a probable right or interest in the property involved in the suit, and that there is danger of its being lost or misappropriated, unless a receiver is appointed.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1024*)—QUESTIONS OF FACT—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

Where, on conflicting testimony, the right of a party seeking the appointment of a receiver in the property in litigation and the danger of the destruction or misappropriation thereof are found to exist, the court on appeal will not as a general rule disturb the appointment of a receiver.

6. PARTNERSHIP (§ 19*) — EXISTENCE — EVIDENCE.

That a partner has not put up his share of the capital pursuant to an agreement to form a firm does not prevent the existence of a firm, but is a circumstance merely tending to negative its existence.

7. PARTNERSHIP (§ 11*)—FIRM AGREEMENTS—SHARING IN PROFITS AND LOSSES.

8. PARTNERSHIP (§ 325*)—ACTION FOR DISSOLUTION—RECEIVER—GROUNDS FOR APPOINTMENT.

Where, in a suit for the dissolution of a firm and for an accounting and a receiver, there was evidence of an original agreement and intention of the parties to form a firm to carry on a business until the same should be transferred to a corporation to be formed, and that the firm conducted the business for a time, and that the corporation which was formed never acquired the property and business, and that one of the parties denied the existence of the firm and excluded the others from participating therein, the court did not abuse its discretion in appointing a receiver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 757–767; Dec. Dig. § 325.*]

9. PARTNERSHIP (§ 20*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION.

F., W., and B. agreed to form a firm to carry on a business, and to form a corporation to which the firm property and business should be transferred, each of the parties to obtain a third of the capital stock. The firm carried on the business, but did not transfer the property and business to the corporation which was formed. F. transferred to B. the stock purported to have been issued to him in the corporation. B. violated the agreement by demanding 51 per cent. of the stock of the corporation. Held, that the transaction did not prevent F. from being a partner in the property and business, so that he could sue for the dissolution of the firm, and for an accounting, and a receiver.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Gerald S. Whitley and another against Alexander Bradley. From an order appointing a receiver pendente lite, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Louis Boardman, for appellant. Richard C. Harrison and R. V. Whiting, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an appeal from an order appointing a receiver, pendente lite.

The complaint alleges that "on or about the 4th day of January, 1907, at the city of San Francisco, state of California, said plaintiffs and said defendant entered into an agreement wherein and whereby said parties agreed to form a copartnership for the purpose of carrying on the business of manufacturing and selling cement wash trays and doing a general cement construction business, said business to be conducted under the firm name of 'California Cement Tray Company,' and it was then and there agreed that each of said parties should furnish one-third of the necessary capital to carry on said business and each of said parties should receive one-third of the profits of said business and be liable for one-third of the debts of the same;" that said parties ever since entering into said agreement have conducted said business in pursuance of the terms of said agreement; that said copartnership has acquired and "now owns" valuable property consisting of a lease of land situated in the city of San Francisco and other property of different kinds of the approximate aggregate value of $18,850; that "said copartnership is largely indebted." It is further alleged that "on or about the 21st day of May, 1907, said defendant denied the existence of said copartnership, denied that said plaintiffs had any interest in said business, and then excluded, and ever since has continued to exclude, said plaintiffs from any participation in said business, and ever since the said last-mentioned date has taken sole charge of said business, and has retained the whole proceeds thereof and income therefrom"; that since said 21st day of May, 1907, said defendant has not kept up the manufacture of trays, so far as quantity is concerned, as theretofore, but has manufactured not more than one-fifth of the number of trays which had prior to that date been manufactured, and "has been, and is, selling the trays on hand at prices unreasonably low and turning the assets of said copartnership into cash and applying the proceeds thereof to his own use, and unless restrained by an order of this honorable court will continue to do so." It is additionally averred that "it is necessary that a receiver be appointed to take possession of the assets of said copartnership and manage the said business for the benefit of the said partners and of the creditors of said copartnership." An accounting of the business and the affairs of the alleged copartnership and a dissolution thereof constitute the ultimate relief demanded, and that in the meantime a receiver be appointed to take charge of the business and the defendant enjoined from "selling, incumbering or otherwise disposing of said property or any part thereof until the further order of" the court.

The answer specifically denies each and every material allegation of the complaint, and by way of an affirmative defense alleges that the defendant had for many years prior to the 4th day of January, 1907, been engaged in the manufacture of cement trays in the city of San Francisco; that on said date he made an agreement with the M. Fisher Company, a corporation, by which the latter was to construct the buildings "now situate on the premises described in plaintiffs' complaint herein"; that shortly thereafter "the plaintiffs herein proposed the formation of a corporation to be known as 'The California Cement Tray Company,' to conduct said business in which they should hold two-thirds of the capital stock thereof, and which should have the property described in plaintiffs' said complaint and conduct the business mentioned therein;" that accordingly said corporation was subsequently organized and "went into the possession of all the property described in plaintiffs' complaint, and has since remained in the possession of the same, and that the business mentioned in said plaintiffs' complaint has since been in the possession of and conducted in the name of said corporation; that all said property and said business is now in the possession of and being conducted by and in the name of said corporation." Defendant further alleges that plaintiff Fisher on the 7th day of May, 1907, "for a valuable consideration," assigned, transferred, and delivered to defendant all the capital stock held by him in said corporation, and, after such transfer, said plaintiff had no other stock or further interest whatever in said corporation; that plaintiff Whitley "has not contributed or paid any money whatever toward the capital stock of said corporation, and has not paid any money whatever for the construction of the said improvements on the premises described in plaintiffs' complaint, and has not contributed or paid any money whatever in or about the manufacture or purchase of the personal property described in said complaint"; that he has not paid or contributed any money whatever as capital of the alleged copartnership, and that said Whitley has no interest in or ownership of the said property described in the complaint "as a copartner therein or otherwise."

The application for the appointment of a receiver was heard on the 20th day of June, 1907, at which time evidence, oral and documentary, was introduced both in support and against the allowance of said application. The power to appoint a receiver is one of sound judicial discretion, and, unless we can say that there appears from the record here a clear abuse of such discretion in the action of the court below in making the order appealed from, the same must stand.

Equitable relief by way of the appointment of a receiver will be invoked only where the exigencies of the case clearly appear to absolutely require it for the conservation of the rights of all the parties concerned in the litigation giving rise to the application for such relief. The appointment of a receiver is justly regarded as an extraordinary or harsh remedy, and a court of equity will never exercise its discretion favorably to a motion invoking the aid of this remedy except upon a satisfactory showing that such relief is necessary in order to preserve and fully protect the rights of all the parties. Mead et al. v. Burk et al., 156 Ind. 577, 60 N. E. 338. It must, of course, be made to appear that the person seeking such relief has at least a probable right or interest in the property or fund involved in the litigation, and that there is danger of its being lost or destroyed or misappropriated unless a receiver be appointed pendente lite; and where, upon conflicting testimony, such right or interest and danger of the destruction or misappropriation of the property or fund are found to exist, a reviewing court is as a general rule in no position to say that a nisi prius court has abused its discretion in the appointment of a receiver. High on Receivers (3d Ed.) § 11; Mead et al. v. Burk et al., supra; Copper Hill Mining Co. v. Spencer, 25 Cal. 16; Gillett v. Higgins, 142 Ala. 444, 38 South. 664; Brown v. Vandermeulen, 41 Mich. 418, 49 N. W. 920; Bank, etc., v. Hardy (Miss.) 48 South. 731; Dawson v. Parsons, 137 N. Y. 605, 33 N. E. 482; Lyle v. Commercial Bank, 93 Va. 487, 25 S. E. 547; Nash v. Meggett, 89 Wis. 486, 61 N. W. 283; Naylor v. Sidener, 106 Ind. 179, 6 N. E. 345; Cone v. Paute, 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 506; Cameron v. Groveland Imp. Co., 20 Wash. 169, 54 Pac. 1128, 72 Am. St. Rep. 26. The determination of the question here must therefore of necessity rest upon the proposition whether the evidence upon which the order appealed from was made affirmatively discloses an abuse of discretion.

The contention of the appellant is that the evidence received at the hearing of the motion is insufficient to show that there ever was an agreement to organize a partnership, much less the organization of one, between the parties to this suit; that, on the contrary, it was understood and agreed among the parties that they would form a corporation, as alleged in the answer, for the purpose of manufacturing cement trays; that the property mentioned in the complaint was acquired for the benefit of such corporation; that, in accordance with this understanding, a corporation was formed. It is further contended by appellant that the lease mentioned and claimed as partnership property is shown to have been transferred to the corporation; that the plaintiff Fisher the evidence shows, sold and transferred whatever stock he owned in the corporation to the defendant, and that, according to the testimony, plaintiff Whitney never at any time contributed any money toward or for the benefit of either the alleged partnership or the corporation.

The claim of respondents is, as the allegations of the complaint in part show, that the original agreement between the parties was to form a copartnership, to thereafter incorporate and then to transfer the business and property of said partnership to the corporation so formed, that the property was owned and the business conducted by them as copartners, and that said property and said business have never been transferred to the corporation formed subsequently to the formation of the partnership. We cannot say that it affirmatively appears from the record that the court was not justified in appointing a receiver; or, in other words, that the court thus abused its discretion. Both Whitley and Fisher testified that in the early part of January, 1907, they and the defendant entered into an agreement to form a partnership for the purpose of carrying on the business of manufacturing and selling cement trays. Fisher testified that at the time now spoken of Bradley was not engaged in business. "Prior to the fire," continued Fisher (referring to the fire of 1906), "he had been in the cement wash tray business, but not since the fire. He claimed that he had promised Mr. Whitley that at any time he (Bradley) should go into the tray business he would have him act as partner, and I acquiesced in that, and said I would go into partnership with them under those conditions." The plaintiffs and defendant agreed that Bradley and Whitley should manage the business for which each was to receive a salary. The property upon which the building to be used for carrying on the business was erected was leased by the parties in the names of Bradley and Whitley. It was agreed that, after the business was started, a corporation should be organized for the purpose of conducting the business. Neither Whitley nor Fisher actually contributed any money toward establishing the business, but both testified that they were at all times ready and willing to put up their respective shares, but were told by Bradley to wait until the business was incorporated, when they would divide up the stock; the agreement being that the shares in and the profits of the business should be equally divided. Efforts were finally made to incorporate and a lawyer consulted with that view; but Bradley demanded 51 per cent. of the stock, "and," testied Fisher, "that broke this thing all to pieces, and, Mr. Whitley and myself not agreeing to that, we couldn't come to any conclusion at all." Whitley, as stated, corroborated Fisher on all important particulars as to the agreement between the parties. The parties were to be equal partners, he said, and share equally in the profits—that is, each was to have a one-third interest in the business and each to receive one-third of the profits. Whitley negotiated for the lease of the property upon which the building was erected, and he and Bradley were each to receive a monthly salary, while Fisher, not actively engaged in the management of the concern, was to receive his share of the profits only. "Before the building was completed," proceeded Whitley, "we were making trays. We carried on the business of manufacturing cement trays under the name of the 'California Cement Tray Company.' I took care of the books and handled the outside business and solicited business. Mr. Bradley took charge of the making of the trays and selling them. Mr. Fisher was the silent man, and had a great deal of prestige, and is connected with Levy Bros. who buy more material than anybody else in San Francisco." Referring to the fact that he had not put any money into the business, Whitley testified: "I had several conversations with Mr. Bradley about my putting up money. He always put it off. There was always some excuse, and we couldn't come to any agreement. I told him my money was lying in the bank any time he wanted it. * * * There was no arrangement or understanding had between me, Bradley, and Fisher as to the amount of money that any of us should put into the business, but I told Mr. Bradley my money was ready to be paid at any time. Mr. Bradley refused to take money on account. He said that he wanted all the bills to come in, and wanted the building and the plant to be put in operation, and that then we would divide up the business share and share alike, and repay him for the money that he had withdrawn from the bank with interest."

The attorney consulted by the parties with regard to the formation of a corporation prepared the papers for that purpose, and also prepared a draft of the minutes of what should take place at the preliminary meeting of the directors. McGrath, the secretary of the board of directors, testified that there was a meeting of the stockholders held on February 9, 1907, and that the business then transacted was the election of the directors of the corporation, after which, and on the same day, said directors held a meeting, at which the only business transacted was the adoption of a code of by-laws. He further testified that there were no other meetings of the directors after the 9th day of February, and that what purported in the "minute book" of the corporation to have been an offer on the part of Bradley, Whitley, and Fisher to transfer and assign to the corporation the business of cement tray making and the property used in connection therewith and an acceptance of said offer by the corporation through the directors, never took place. The attorney referred to corroborated these statements, saying, as before intimated, that that part of the "minute book" referred to was prepared by him not for the purpose of representing the fact of the transfer or the offer to do so and acceptance thereof, which had then not occurred, but merely as an exemplar to be followed for the proper preservation in the "minute book" of the record of the transaction as so carried out, in the event that at any future time such transaction should take place. Whitley also testified that the business and property of the partnership had never been transferred to the corporation.

It may be conceded that there is not an overwhelming amount of testimony in the record showing that the parties first formed themselves into a copartnership for the carrying on of the business referred to in the pleadings and the evidence, but there is some showing that such was the original arrangement and intention of the parties and that they actually formed a partnership and carried on the business, for a time at least, through that instrumentality; and this showing is of a character to make it impossible for this court to reverse the order appealed from without an unwarranted interference with the discretion vested in trial courts in such matters. The lease was taken in the names of Bradley and Whitley, and, so far as the record shows to the contrary, is still in their names. This of itself is a valuable asset. The property and the business were never transferred to the corporation, and the latter, although properly existing, it may be admitted, and brought into existence for the purpose of acquiring the property and business of the partnership and conducting the same, has never acquired the property and the business or either, and as such property and business must be owned by some one, ownership thereof has necessarily remained and still remains, so far as we are advised by the record before us, in the partnership.

The fact that neither Whitley nor Fisher has put any money into the business cannot change the situation in the least. This circumstance, as an evidentiary fact, tending, it may be, to negative the proposition of a partnership, was worthy only of such weight as the court deemed it entitled to, and no doubt was given proper consideration by the judge in determining whether there existed a partnership between the parties under the agreement, but it by no means follows that because one partner may not put up his share of the capital under an agreement to form a partnership the combination so formed is any the less a partnership.

The case of Brooke v. Tucker, 149 Ala. 96, 43 South. 141, is in many respects almost identical with the case at bar. There a partnership was formed with an understanding between the parties thereto that later on there would be organized by the partners a corporation to which said business would be transferred and through the agency of which the same would thereafter be carried on. We quote from the opinion in that case: "Whether complainant and Brooke are partners inter sese must be determined by their intention as the same is expressed in or may be gathered from the written agreement entered into by them. By the contract it is made to appear that complainant and Brooke associated themselves together for the publication of a newspaper. It also appears that at the time the contract was made Brooke was the sole owner of the newspaper plant, and it may be conceded that by the terms of the contract he was to remain the owner and possessor of the legal title, and in control, until the formation of the contemplated corporation provided for by the contract; yet this of itself would not prevent the contract from being one of partnership. To constitute a partnership, it is not necessary that there should be property forming its capital jointly owned by the partners. The property employed in the partnership business may be separate property of the partners; but, if they share in the profits and losses arising from its use, a partnership exists—[citing McCrary v. Slaughter, 58 Ala. 230, 234]. * * * While nothing is said specifically about the losses, or that complainant is to share in them, yet, construing all the terms of the contract together, it is our opinion that there is created a community of profits and loss, or, as it is expressed in one of our cases, 'a communion of profits and loss is created,'" citing a number of cases. The foregoing expressions harmonize with our Code definition of a partnership. Sections 2395, 2404, Civ. Code. The agreement here was that the parties should at all times participate in the profits in equal shares, and that they should equally bear the burden of the losses is implied from such agreement, there appearing no stipulation to the contrary. Section 2404, Civ. Code, supra. There can be no doubt that the ultimate purpose or intent of the parties was to form a corporation by and through the agency of which the business in which they had engaged was thereafter to be transacted. But there is evidence that they started to do business before a corporation was formed or before steps were taken to form one, and it is shown that they sustained some sort of relations with each other before the organization of the corporation. We think it clearly enough appears that the intention was to establish and fix as their status toward each other during their association together prior to the time at which the corporation was to be organized that of a copartnership.

Nor does the fact that Fisher transferred to Bradley stock purporting to have been issued to him in the corporation make him any the less a partner in said property and business, since the said property and business were never transferred to said corporation. Obviously no one can sell property and convey a valid title thereto which he does not own and to which he has no title. Even if it might be contended that, under the agreement to form a corporation at a certain time, pending which time the business and property acquired for the purposes of such a corporation were to be conducted by and owned as a partnership, the copartners would become trustees of the corporation as to such business and property upon the formation of such corporation, and that the latter upon its formation would have an equitable title to such business and property, such contention could not be successful here, since it appears from the evidence that the terms upon which the corporation here was to be formed were not kept by the defendant, who demanded, instead of one-third of the capital stock to which he was alone entitled, according to the agreement, 51 per cent. thereof. It is very clear that the stock issued to Fisher by the corporation could not affect the property involved here, and that Fisher's sale of said stock to Bradley conveyed nothing, so far as the property and the business of the partnership were concerned.

The cases cited by counsel for appellant to the effect that property acquired for the purposes of a corporation to be subsequently organized ipso facto inures, with all its rights and advantages, to such corporation upon its formation, and that, therefore, a formal transfer of the property so acquired to said corporation is not necessary, do not fit the facts of this case as found by the court and as are sufficiently shown by the evidence, and are therefore not in point here.

The order is affirmed.

12. Specific Performance (§ 91*)—Contract to Convey—Demand Unnecessary.

Under a contract to convey, no demand by the purchaser for possession was necessary when final payment was tendered, since demand for a deed, if complied with, would confer right of possession.

13. Contracts (§ 266*)—Withdrawal—Restoration of Consideration.

14. Specific Performance (§ 105*) — Contracts to Convey—Laches.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Bert F. Mull, for appellant. A. C. Lawson and Kendrick, Knott & Ardis, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was one for a decree requiring defendant to specifically perform a contract for the conveyance of real property. It is based upon an agreement between defendant and plaintiff's assignor, which is in the words and figures following: "Long Beach, California, Oct. 26th, 1904. Received of Southern California Realty Co. one hundred ($100) dollars as deposit and part payment on the west 140 feet of lots 10, 12, in block 67 of the city of Long Beach, county of Los Angeles, state of California. Certificate of title to be furnished showing said property free of all incumbrances; also deed properly signed and executed. Price to be thirty-five hundred ($3,500) dollars net to seller; terms, fifteen hundred ($1,500) dollars cash, balance payable $1,000 in one year and $1,000 in two years, with interest at 7 per cent. on deferred payments. W. J. Davis. L. F. Oakes, Witness to Signature of W. J. Davis."

It is averred that Oakes subscribed his name as witness at the request of defendant Davis, and that the instrument, duly acknowledged so as to entitle it to record, was recorded in the records of Los Angeles county, state of California, on November 22, 1904; that on the date of the execution of the instrument L. F. Oakes and one Bixby were partners engaged in buying and selling real estate in Los Angeles county, and doing business under the firm name and style of the Southern California Realty Company. It is further averred that said firm paid the cash payment mentioned in the agreement; that the total consideration agreed to be paid for the property was the fair market value of the same at the time of the agreement, and was as to all parties fair, just, and equitable. It is further averred that on November 21, 1904, notwithstanding defendant's failure to provide the certificate of title as specified, the firm tendered to defendant the balance of the cash payment; that on the 13th of December following such firm assigned and transferred to plaintiff the agreement, with all their right, title, and interest to the property described, which said agreement is in the words and figures following: "For value received we have assigned and set over, and do hereby assign and set over, all our right and interest in, to and under the within agreement to Edward S. Tutt. Dated this 13th day of December, 1904. Southern California Realty Co., per L. F. Oakes."

This assignment was indorsed upon said agreement executed by defendant Davis. Thereafter, on the dates fixed in the agreement for making the deferred payments, plaintiff tendered the amounts thereof, with interest as specified in such agreement, and on the 26th of October, 1906, tendered to defendant the full sum of $3,400, with interest as specified, and demanded that defendant execute a deed conveying said property, which defendant has failed and refused to do. It is further averred that plaintiff is ready and willing, and has been at all times, to pay said purchase price, together with interest thereon, and the amount was brought into court and offered to defendant in payment thereof; that defendant Davis on August 14, 1906, made a pretended conveyance of said property to himself, in which he is designated as grantee therein under the name of Jasper Davis, but that said William J. Davis and Jasper Davis are one and the same person; that the deed was made without consideration and for the sole purpose of annoying plaintiff and hindering and delaying the enforcement of the agreement held by plaintiff.

Issue was made as to all the allegations of the complaint. Upon the trial the court found in favor of plaintiff, and that all the allegations of the complaint were true and the allegations of the answer untrue, and rendered a judgment and decree accordingly in plaintiff's favor, from which defendant William J. Davis appeals under the alternative method.

It is insisted by appellant that the substituted process shown to have been made in the action was insufficient to give the court jurisdiction. We think that in actions of this kind service of process may be made by publication. The action being one for the determination of a right or interest in real property (Grocers' Union v. Kern, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 473, 89 Pac. 120) brings the same within section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The rule is laid down in Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 727, 24 L. Ed. 565: "In cases where the object of the action is to reach and dispose of property in the state, or of some interest therein, by enforcing a contract respecting the same," constructive notice is held sufficient. In Heidritter v. Elizabeth Oil Cloth Co., 112 U. S. 301, 5 Sup. Ct. 135, 28 L. Ed. 729, it is said that jurisdiction may be acquired "by the mere bringing of the suit in which the claim is sought to be enforced" against the property situate within the territorial jurisdiction; that this "may by law be equivalent to a seizure, being the open and public exercise of dominion over it for the purposes of the suit"—all of which is quoted with approval in Loaiza v. Superior Court, 85 Cal. 34, 24 Pac. 707, 9 L. R. A. 376, 20 Am. St. Rep. 197. We find no error in the action of the court denying the motion to vacate and set aside the order for publication of summons.

It is claimed that the trial court neglected to make a formal ruling upon objections to the admission in evidence of the memorandum and the written assignment. Conceding this to be true, the extent to which defendant could be prejudiced thereby is measured by the injury which would have resulted from their improper admission. The findings are conclusive that the instruments were received and considered in evidence, and we think that they were properly received. The memorandum was sufficient as a contract upon which to base the action. Bird v. Potter, 146 Cal. 288, 79 Pac. 970. Mutuality attached by the tender and subsequent suit. Section 3388, Civ. Code. It is claimed that the memorandum was uncertain, in that the manner of securing the deferred payments did not appear. In the absence of specific agreement by which deferred payments are to be secured in the sale of real property, the law fixes the security through a vendor's lien. The law also determines that the time for delivery of the deed under a contract of this kind is when the last payment is made or tendered. We regard the agreement as an assignable one (section 1458, Civ. Code), and the assignment sufficient to pass the interest of plaintiff's assignor. Defendant having dealt with the partnership is not in a position to question its authority to enter into the original contract. Fresno Canal Co. v. Warner, 72 Cal. 380, 14 Pac. 37; Yancy v. Morton, 94 Cal. 560, 29 Pac. 1111. The partnership being one for the purpose of dealing in real estate, as between the parties in the settlement of equities between themselves the assets of the firm must be regarded as personal property (Woodward v. McAdam, 101 Cal. 440, 35 Pac. 1016), and the agency of one of the partners a sufficient authority to execute the assignment in the firm name.

No demand of possession was requisite when final payment was tendered. The demand for a deed, if complied with, would confer right of possession without demand.

No withdrawal from the agreement based upon a tender of the money received thereunder is made to appear. One cannot be said to have withdrawn from an agreement by simply expressing a desire or intention so to do, while he retains the consideration paid him on account of its execution. The claim of appellant that he offered to refund the amount received by him is found by the court to be untrue.

Laches cannot be imputed to plaintiff in bringing the action, because of a delay of a little over three months after the cause of action arose before suit was brought, especially in view of the fact that there is nothing in the record indicating any fluctuations in value between those dates.

An examination of the record, or that portion thereof to which reference is made in the briefs, satisfies us that each and every finding of the court has support from the evidence.

Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; TAGGART, J.

Ex parte DANFORD. (Cr. 177.)

1. Indictment and Information (§ 132*)—Two Offenses—Election.

Where an information properly charged the offense of accused, who had been committed by the justice's court after hearing on a proper affidavit of complaint, and also charged another offense, the striking out of the latter offense was an election to proceed only on the former, which could in no way prejudice the accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 428; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

2. Habeas Corpus (§ 4*)—Remedy by Appeal—Review.

Where an information, based upon a proper affidavit of complaint and commitment, purported to state an offense of which the court had jurisdiction, the same rule applies as in the case of an indictment, that all errors in the subsequent proceedings can be reviewed only by appeal, and not on application for a writ of habeas corpus.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

Application by W. J Danford for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

W. J. Danford, in pro. per.

PER CURIAM. An affidavit of complaint was filed before a justice of the peace charging defendant with a violation of section 474 of the Penal Code. This affidavit of complaint is sufficient in every respect. The justice of the peace upon preliminary examination held the defendant to answer. Thereafter the district attorney filed an information charging defendant with the same offense specified in the affidavit of complaint, and, in addition thereto, included in said information a second and different offense than that for which defendant had been held to answer. Defendant moved to set aside the information because two separate and distinct offenses were charged, and also filed a demurrer to the information on the grounds, first, of the uncertainty thereof; and, second, that the information included an offense for the commission of which defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate.

It is alleged in the petition for the writ that the court granted leave to the district attorney to strike out of the information the second offense, which was the one not embodied in the affidavit of complaint, and overruled the demurrer to the information. It is contended by petitioner that this action of the district attorney in striking out the second offense deprived the court of jurisdiction to hear and determine the action. Assuming that this second offense was included in the information without warrant, upon such theory the same was surplusage and was properly stricken from the information. The effect of striking the same from the information was an election to proceed only as to the offense properly charged. When a sufficient information charging the offense for which he stood committed remained, the accused could in no sense be injured by the action of the district attorney or the court in striking out such surplusage. It is alleged that subsequently the defendant was tried and convicted of the first offense. It will be assumed, nothing to the contrary appearing in the petition or exhibits attached thereto, that his plea was entered after the hearing of the motion and the demurrer. The affidavit of complaint being sufficient, no reason is apparent why the rule laid down in Ex parte Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 89 Pac. 605, should not be applied, which is that: "Where an indictment purports or attempts to state an offense of a kind of which the court assuming to proceed has jurisdiction, the question whether the facts charged are sufficient to constitute an offense of that kind will not be examined into on habeas corpus." Such inquiry is only permissible where there is for review a proceeding in an inferior court. Ex parte Greenall, 153 Cal. 770, 96 Pac. 804. Here we are called upon to review a proceeding in a court of general jurisdiction, and a rule which would apply to an indictment should apply with equal force to an information filed in such court. In our opinion, therefore, the petitioner having been regularly held to answer, the affidavit of complaint and commitment being sufficient, and the information purporting to state an offense of a kind of which the court assuming to proceed has jurisdiction, that all subsequent irregularities or errors, if any occurred in the course of the proceedings, are matters for review upon appeal, and habeas corpus will not lie on account thereof.

In re MILLS SING. (Civ. 860.)

1. INFANTS (§ 18*)—JUVENILE COURT PROCEEDINGS—JURISDICTION.

Though St. 1901, p. 95, gave the police court and the city justice's court of Los Angeles exclusive jurisdiction of misdemeanors, the juvenile court act (St. 1909, p. 213) divests them of exclusive jurisdiction of misdemeanors arising under that act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 98*)—SPECIAL ACTS—JUVENILE COURT ACT.

The provisions of juvenile court act (St. 1909, p. 213) for jurisdiction of offenses under the act do not violate the constitutional prohibition against special or local laws affecting jurisdiction of justices of the peace, the punishment of offenses, or the practices of courts; the act being general in its application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 3*)—OFFENSES UNDER JUVENILE COURT ACT—PRACTICE.

Since offenses under Juvenile Court Act, § 26 (St. 1909, p. 225), are triable in the superior court, they are governed by Pen. Code, § 888, which requires offenses so triable to be prosecuted by indictment or information excepting proceedings to remove officers.

4. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 41*)—MISDEMEANORS—NECESSITY FOR PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION.

Under Pen. Code, § 809, directing the filing of an information after commitment of accused, and under section 950, specifying what an information must contain, a preliminary examination and commitment are precedent conditions to the information, upon which only the superior court can proceed to try one charged with a public offense, though it be a misdemeanor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 212*)—COMPLAINT—VERIFICATION.

Under Pen. Code, § 806, a complaint for an offense need not be verified, but, if verified and containing positive evidence of facts tending to show guilt, it may be treated by the examining magistrate as the supporting deposition required by section 812.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 212*)—COMPLAINT—SUPPORTING DEPOSITION—VERIFICATION.

The deposition of a complaining witness taken by an examining magistrate, as provided for by section 812, Pen. Code, must be taken by the magistrate, as must all preliminary evidence introduced tending to show commission of an offense, and that there is a reasonable ground to believe that accused committed it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

7. OATH (§ 2*)—SUPERIOR COURT JUDGE ACTING AS MAGISTRATE—ADMINISTERING OATHS.

A superior judge acting as a magistrate cannot call in a clerk or any other officer to administer oaths, since the judge, in that capacity, has only such powers as are conferred upon justices of the peace or police judges.

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 212*)—OFFENSES UNDER JUVENILE COURT ACT—COMPLAINT.

A complaint charging an offense under Juvenile Court Act, § 26 (St. 1909, p. 225), verified before a deputy county clerk, cannot be used as a deposition on the preliminary hearing, and is insufficient as a deposition authorizing issuance of the warrant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

9. PROHIBITION (§ 5*)—SCOPE OF RELIEF.

Since on application for prohibition against a superior judge holding a preliminary examination does not involve a question of illegal restraint, applicant cannot rely on insufficiency of the deposition on which the warrant issued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prohibition, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

10. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 137*) — DEPOSITION SUPPORTING COMPLAINT — INSUFFICIENCY—EFFECT.

When an arrest has been made and accused is before a court having jurisdiction as a magistrate to hold a preliminary examination, the magistrate may proceed, and, if commitment issue, a foundation is laid for an information, and the information cannot be set aside because the depositions were insufficient to warrant the arrest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 483-485; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

Application of Mills Sing for a writ of prohibition. Writ denied.

George L. McKeeby and Paul W. Schenck, for petitioner. Curtis D. Wilbur, George Beebe, and J. D. Fredericks, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner represents that heretofore an affidavit was signed by one McLaughlin before a deputy county clerk of Los Angeles county charging petitioner with a violation of section 26 of the act known as the "Juvenile Court Law" (Laws 1909, p. 225); that thereafter the probation officer of the juvenile court arrested petitioner, and he was taken before respondent, a judge of the superior court of said county; that said judge then and there set the cause for preliminary hearing and examination before himself sitting as a committing magistrate, said examination to be had at 9 o'clock a. m. of the 1st day of June, 1910; that, objection being made to the jurisdiction of respondent to conduct such preliminary examination, respondent continued the hearing thereof until the 2d day of June, at 9 o'clock a. m., for the purpose of hearing evidence and taking testimony; that, notwithstanding such continuance the respondent on the 1st day of June, made and indorsed on the affidavit of complaint an order in conformity to section 872 of the Penal Code. It is averred that this order was made and entered by the court without hearing any evidence or taking any testimony. It is further averred that respondent threatens to hold a preliminary examination on the 2d day of June, that respondent is without jurisdiction to hold such preliminary examination, the petitioner has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the usual course of law, and asks that the respondent be prohibited from sitting as a magistrate and conducting the preliminary examination of petitioner "upon the said instrument designated 'Complaint-Criminal' on file in said court."

Respondent demurs to the petition as being insufficient to authorize the issuance of the writ, and at the same time a motion was made to strike out of the application that portion thereof which contained the order indorsed upon the affidavit of complaint, for the reason that the same was indorsed thereon through inadvertence, and the record shows that such preliminary examination has not been held. We are of opinion that it is so evident from the petition that the order of commitment was prematurely entered, and without authority, that it need not be considered. The fact that the preliminary examination is threatened, and that the order of commitment could only be entered after such a preliminary examination, sufficiently demonstrates its premature character, and that its entry is not of serious consequence in the consideration of the questions presented upon this application. It is contended by petitioner, the offense being a misdemeanor, that the police court and the city justice's court of Los Angeles city have exclusive jurisdiction. St. 1901, p. 95. The exclusive jurisdiction of misdemeanors committed within the city was by said act conferred upon such courts, but the juvenile court act (St. 1909, p. 213) divested such city courts of exclusive jurisdiction in misdemeanor cases of the class under consideration and conferred jurisdiction upon the superior court. Whether this jurisdiction so conferred upon the superior court is exclusive in such cases or concurrent is not material for the purposes of this decision.

It is next contended that the juvenile act violates those provisions of the Constitution which prohibits special or local laws as affecting jurisdiction of justices of the peace, or the punishment of criminal offenses, or the practice of courts of justice. This criticism is fully answered by the statement that such act is general in its nature, applying to every county in the state and to every superior court therein. In addition to this, the Constitution confers upon the superior court jurisdiction in all misdemeanors not otherwise provided for by law; and here we have a case where such jurisdiction is expressly conferred by a general law.

Next, it is claimed that the law contemplates no preliminary examinations in misdemeanor cases. The juvenile act making the offense under consideration triable in the superior court, section 888 of the Penal Code applies, which provides that all public offenses triable in the superior court must be prosecuted by indictment or information, except as to accusations for the removal of certain officers. Section 809 of the Penal Code directs the filing of an information after commitment by a magistrate, and section 950 of the Penal Code, specifies what such information must contain. It follows, therefore, that the preliminary examination and commitment are precedent conditions to the information upon which, and upon which only, can the superior court proceed to try one charged with a public offense, even though it be a misdemeanor.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is finally contended that the court is without jurisdiction to conduct the preliminary examination threatened because the complaint was verified before a deputy county clerk, and not before the magistrate. The complaint which initiates a criminal proceeding need not be verified. Section 806, Pen. Code. If verified, however, and containing positive evidence of facts tending to show guilt, the same may be treated by the magistrate as the deposition required by section 812 of the Penal Code. Ex parte Dimmig, 74 Cal. 166, 15 Pac. 619. Such depositions, however, must be taken by the magistrate, as must all preliminary evidence introduced tending to show the commission of an offense, and that there is reasonable ground to believe the defendant has committed it. A superior judge assuming the duties of a magistrate has no right to call in the clerk or any other officer to administer oaths. He sits as a creature of the statute with such powers only as are conferred upon justices of the peace or police judges. People v. Cohen, 118 Cal. 78, 50 Pac. 20. It must be held, therefore, that the complaint verified before a deputy clerk cannot be used as a deposition upon a preliminary hearing, nor was it a deposition authorizing the issue of the warrant of arrest. The arrest, however, was made, and the petitioner is before the court for examination. No question of illegal restraint is here involved. We are called upon to determine only whether, having petitioner before him under a complaint in writing, the respondent can be prohibited from conducting the preliminary examination. The complaint and the depositions are only intended as a basis for the warrant of arrest. When the arrest has been actually made and the prisoner is before a court having jurisdiction as a magistrate to hold a preliminary examination, such magistrate may proceed to a preliminary examination, and, if commitment issue, a foundation is laid for the filing of an information, and the same cannot be set aside because the depositions were insufficient to warrant the arrest. People v. Lee Look, 143 Cal. 220, 76 Pac. 1028.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the petition herein does not state facts sufficient to authorize the issuance of the writ of prohibition.

Writ denied.

RUSS v. TUTTLE. (S. F. 5,007.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1910.)

1. Corporations (§ 116*)—Sale of Stock—Offer and Acceptance.

Where a party offered to sell certain stock to another party at any time within 30 days, there being no consideration for it, there was no contract to sell, but merely an offer, which became a binding contract on its acceptance and tender of payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

2. Corporations (§ 118*)—Sale of Stock—Contract—Offer and Acceptance.

Where a person offered to sell certain stock to either one of two parties, the sale to one relieved him of any obligation to the other, but the refusal of the one to purchase did not relieve him of his duty to sell to the other on his accepting the offer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

3. Appeal and Error (§ 1002*)—Questions of Fact—Conflicting Testimony.

Where, in a suit for the refusal to sell stock according to a written option to purchase, which was accepted, the testimony was conflicting whether such offer was procured through fraud, the finding that there was no fraud will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3935–3937; Dec. Dig. § 1002.*]

4. Corporations (§ 121*)—Breach of Contract to Sell Stock—Action by Buyer—Damages.

In a suit for the refusal to sell certain stock as agreed, the purchase price not being paid, it was proper to instruct that the damages should be the excess, if any, of the value of the stock to the buyer over the purchase price under the contract, as provided by Civ. Code, § 3308, regardless of evidence that plaintiff had assigned his option to purchase, since that referred to who was the proper party to bring the suit, and had nothing to do with the question of damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

5. Parties (§ 80*)—Defect in Parties Plaintiff—Waiver of Objection.

In the absence of a plea of defect of parties plaintiff, one of several parties jointly interested in a claim may recover the whole amount due.

6. Judgment (§ 683*)—Res Judicata—Assignor and Assignee.

In a suit for damages for the refusal to sell certain stock, for which an option to purchase was given and accepted, defendant would be protected by a judgment for plaintiff against the claim of another, where plaintiff had assigned his option to purchase without the knowledge of defendant.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; E. W. Wilson, Judge.

Mahan & Mahan and Geo. D. Murray, for appellant. L. F. Puter and Denver Sevier, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an action to recover damages for the refusal of the defendant to perform an alleged agreement to sell and deliver to plaintiff certain shares of corporate stock. There was a trial by jury, and a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for the amount demanded. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleges a written agreement by the defendant to sell the stock to plaintiff at any time within 30 days from August 2, 1906, at the price named in the writing; that on August 18, 1906, the plaintiff ratified and accepted the agreement, and tendered to the defendant the purchase price of said stock and demanded delivery of the same; that defendant failed and refused and still refuses to deliver to the plaintiff the stock or any part thereof; and that he thereafter sold and delivered said stock to other parties. It is further alleged that the plaintiff is wholly unable to purchase other shares of the capital stock of either of said corporations, and that by reason of the premises he has been damaged in the sum of $2,645. The complaint is not verified. The answer consisted of a general denial of all of its allegations and of various separate defenses.

The first defense was that within 30 days from August 2d the defendant had offered the stock in question to Z. Russ & Sons' Company, and that said Z. Russ & Sons' Company had refused to accept the same. The second defense was that the defendant had been induced to execute the writing by reason of fraudulent representations made to him by the plaintiff. The third defense was that there was no consideration for the writing. Each of the defenses set forth in hæc verba the terms of the contract, which reads as follows: "Eureka, Cal., August 2nd. 1906. For and in consideration of the sum of one dollar receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, I hereby agree to sell and deliver to Ira A. Russ or Z. Russ & Sons' Company within thirty days from date one hundred ninety (190) shares of the capital stock of the Home Savings Bank at seventy-six 50-100 ($76.50) dollars per share, and three hundred thirty shares of the capital stock of the Humboldt County Bank at one hundred and fifty-four ($154) dollars per share. Said payments to be made in cash upon delivery of said shares of stock within said thirty days. L. C. Tuttle."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The first and third separate defenses did not allege matter constituting any real ground of answer to plaintiff's demand. So far as the want of consideration is concerned, it may be conceded that the agreement of defendant to sell his stock at a given price at any time within 30 days was not, if unsupported by a consideration, binding upon him. Until accepted by the plaintiff, it was a mere offer which might be revoked by the defendant at any time. When, however, the plaintiff accepted the offer and tendered payment, the contract became complete and both parties were bound by it. Keller v. Ybarru, 3 Cal. 147. The agreement or offer was to sell the stock either to the plaintiff or to Z. Russ & Sons' Company. No doubt a sale to either of these parties would have relieved the defendant of any obligation to transfer to the other, but we do not construe the contract as relieving the defendant from the obligation to sell to one of the parties if the other should decline to make the purchase. The court below instructed the jury in accordance with these views, and we are satisfied that it acted correctly in so ruling.

The second special defense—i. e., that of fraud—was the subject of considerable testimony. The issue so raised was submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and the verdict in favor of the plaintiff imports a finding against the allegations of the answer. The testimony was in conflict on this point, and we cannot interfere with the finding reached under such conflict. A motion for nonsuit was based on the ground that the testimony showed that plaintiff had taken the option as agent only, and that performance had been tendered to his principal. It is enough to say, in answer to the point that the court erred in denying this motion, that there was evidence admitted prior to the motion for nonsuit to the effect that plaintiff had stated to Tuttle that he was taking the option at least in part for himself.

The court gave an instruction defining the measure of damages in the words of section 3308 of the Civil Code, and directed the jury that, if they should come to the conclusion that the plaintiff should recover in this action, the verdict should be "for the amount of the excess, if any, of the value of the stock described in the agreement to the plaintiff, over the amount called for by the contract, if the contract had been fulfilled." These instructions are complained of by the appellant. The action being one for the breach of a seller's agreement to deliver personal property, the price of which had not been fully paid in advance, it would seem to have been entirely proper to charge the jury that the detriment to the plaintiff was to be determined according to the rule laid down by the Code for cases of this character. It is urged, however, that the jury might have found the damage to be less, because of the fact that there was testimony tending to show that the plaintiff, after taking the option, had assigned the whole or a part of it to one Buhne. Neither of these circumstances would affect the applicability of the Code section. The damage occasioned by the breach of the contract was defined by the statute. That damage was recoverable by the party or parties maintaining the action. Whether the plaintiff after recovery would be bound to account to Buhne for a part or all of the amount received by him was a question between him and Buhne. The defendant was in no way concerned in it. In fact, the point urged does not at all bear on the measure of damages, but goes rather to the question whether the plaintiff was the real or the sole party in interest, and as such authorized to bring the action in his own name. Grain v. Aldrich, 38 Cal. 514, 99 Am. Dec. 423. If he had assigned the contract to Buhne it might be claimed that the latter was the proper party plaintiff (Code Civ. Proc. § 367), or, if there had been an assignment of a part interest, that the plaintiff and Buhne should have sued jointly. These objections, however, could not be made by the defendant in the absence of some foundation for them in the pleadings. Where the complaint shows upon its face that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue, or that there is a defect of parties plaintiff, the defendant may demur (Code Civ. Proc. § 430), or, if the ground does not appear upon the face of the complaint, the objection may be taken by answer (Code Civ. Proc. § 433). But, if the objection is not taken either by demurrer or answer, the defendant is deemed to have waived it. Code Civ. Proc. § 434. In the absence of a plea of defect of necessary parties plaintiff, one of several parties jointly interested in a claim may recover the whole amount due. Wendt v. Ross, 33 Cal. 650; Trenor v. C. P. R. R. Co., 50 Cal. 222; Williams v. Southern Pac. R. R. Co., 110 Cal. 457, 42 Pac. 974; Ah Tong v. Earle Fruit Co., 112 Cal. 679, 45 Pac. 7.

Furthermore, it may be doubted whether the defense that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest would have been available to the defendant even if properly pleaded. In Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 651, 40 Pac. 8, it is held that "where the plaintiff shows such a title as that a judgment upon it satisfied by defendant will protect him from future annoyance or loss, and where, as against the party suing, defendant can urge any defenses he could make against the real owner, then there is an end of the defendant's concern and with it of his right to object." See, also, Price v. Dunlap, 5 Cal. 483; Gushee v. Leavitt, 5 Cal. 160, 63 Am. Dec. 116; Meyer v. Foster, 147 Cal. 166, 81 Pac. 402. The plaintiff here was the apparent owner of the contract which had been made with him. The defendant could not be bound by any assignment which had not been brought to his notice, and there is nothing to show that he had any knowledge of the alleged assignment prior to the trial. A judgment in favor of plaintiff will, therefore, protect the defendant against any claim by Buhne. So far as such defendant is concerned, the question of who is the real party in interest as between Russ and Buhne is immaterial.

But whatever view might be taken of the propriety of Buhne bringing the action, either as sole plaintiff or as coplaintiff with Russ, it seems plain that, as we have stated, the question is not one that affects the measure of damages. It appearing that the action is one of the kind referred to in section 3308 of the Civil Code, the rule declared in that section for ascertaining the detriment occasioned by a breach must be applied.

Complaint is made of the refusal of the court to give an instruction defining the consent necessary to a contract. But the material part of the proposed instruction was embodied in a direction given by the court of its own motion.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PASCOE v. BAKER. (L. A. 2,527.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 26, 1910.)

1. VENUE (§ 81*) — MOTION TO REMAND — WHEN MADE.

In a suit for injuries, where the venue had been changed, a motion to remand on the ground of convenience of witnesses could not be made before the joining of issues of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 143; Dec. Dig. § 81.]

2. VENUE (§ 81*)—MOTION TO CHANGE—DISCRETION OF THE COURT.

While, as a rule, motions for change of venue should be prosecuted with diligence, yet it is within the discretion of the court as to whether there has been undue delay, and, where the venue of a suit for injuries was changed, and the answer was filed on December 1, 1908, but the hearing was continued to March 5, 1909, at which time a motion to remand was made, the court's finding that such motion was made with reasonable promptness was not an abuse of its discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 143; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

3. VENUE (§ 81*)—MOTION TO REMAND—COMPLAINT—VERIFICATION—NECESSITY FOR.

The complaint in an action for injuries need not be verified nor an affidavit of merits filed as a prerequisite to plaintiff's motion for the remand of the case for convenience of witnesses, where the venue had been changed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

4. VENUE (§ 81*)—MOTION TO REMAND—AFFIDAVIT—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the venue of a suit for injuries had been changed, plaintiff's affidavit supporting his motion to remand for the convenience to witnesses was sufficient in stating the names of the witnesses that would be inconvenienced, and the testimony expected of them, without stating that she had been advised by counsel that such witnesses were material.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 965*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—CONVENIENCE OF WITNESSES—DISCRETION OF THE COURT.

A change of venue on the ground of convenience of witnesses is mostly within the discretion of the trial court, which the appellate court will not disturb unless it has been abused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3836; Dec. Dig. § 965.*]

6. VENUE (§ 81*)—REMAND—DISCRETION OF THE COURT—ABUSE.

On the motion to remand a case for injuries to the county of San Francisco for the convenience of witnesses, the venue having been changed to the county of Los Angeles, on which it appeared that four of plaintiff's witnesses besides plaintiff himself resided in San Francisco where the injuries occurred, one being plaintiff's physician, and three being familiar with the place where the accident happened, and that defendant, while alleging in his affidavit that his two witnesses were the only eyewitnesses of the injury, not only did not aver that they resided in Los Angeles county, but declared that one of them resided in Kansas, the court did not abuse its discretion in remanding the case to San Francisco county; for, although defendant named other witnesses who were residents of Los Angeles, yet, they being able to testify only as to the place of the injury, other witnesses for that purpose could be easily procured in San Francisco.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. § 143; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action for injuries by Chester Pascoe against C. H. Baker. From an order changing the venue back to the county of San Francisco, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wilbur Bassett and Lynn Helm, for appellant. Johnstone Jones, Louis H. Brownstone, and R. P. Jennings, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Appeal by defendant from an order changing the place of trial. The action is for damages for personal injuries. It was commenced in the city and county of San Francisco. The defendant appeared and demanded a transfer to the county of Los Angeles, in which he resided. His motion to that end was granted. Thereafter the plaintiff moved the superior court of Los Angeles county for an order retransferring the action to the city and county of San Francisco, basing his application on the ground of convenience of witnesses. The present appeal is from an order granting this motion. The appellant makes four points for reversal.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

1. It is urged that the plaintiff delayed the making of his motion for so long a period as to deprive him of the right to have the cause removed. A motion for retention or remand on the ground of convenience of witnesses could not be made before the joining of issues of fact. Heald v. Hendy, 65 Cal. 321, 4 Pac. 27; McSherry v. Penn. C. G. M. Co., 97 Cal. 637, 32 Pac. 711. It appears that the answer was filed on December 1, 1908, and that plaintiff's motion was presented on March 5, 1909. The hearing had, however, been continued to the last-named date, and had been noticed by notice dated February 9, 1909, for the 19th day of February, 1909. The delay was therefore a few days more than two months. It is, no doubt, the general rule that motions for change of venue should be prosecuted with diligence. 4 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 421; Cook v. Pendergast, 61 Cal. 72, 79; Smith v. Pelton W. W. Co., 151 Cal. 399, 90 Pac. 932, 1135. But whether or not there has been undue delay must be determined by the trial court upon the facts of the particular case. It certainly cannot be said that there was any abuse of discretion in the holding that, under the circumstances here disclosed, the plaintiff had moved with a reasonable degree of promptness.

2. The complaint was unverified, and the plaintiff filed no affidavit showing a meritorious cause of action. But we are cited to no authority in support of the appellant's claim that such affidavit is required. It is true that a defendant, asking a change on the ground that the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county for the trial, must file an affidavit of merits. This is the express provision of section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No such condition has, however, been imposed upon a party occupying the position of the respondent here.

3. In support of his motion, the plaintiff relied upon the affidavit of Mrs. Eva Pascoe, his mother and guardian ad litem. This affidavit discloses the names of a number of witnesses residing in the city and county of San Francisco, and sets forth the substance of the testimony that will be given by each of them. The affidavit does not allege that the plaintiff has stated to his counsel the facts which he expects to prove by his witnesses, and is advised by counsel that said witnesses are necessary and material. The appellant cites several New York cases holding that such allegations should be contained in an affidavit for change of venue on the ground of convenience of witnesses. We do not understand the rule to be without exception, even in New York. At any rate, there is no authority requiring this court to apply it with the strictness contended for. Nor do we see any good reason for viewing proceedings of this character in any but a liberal spirit. If the affidavit contains a statement of the matters to which the witnesses will testify, the court may determine for itself how far the desired testimony may be needed. In Cook v. Pendergast, supra, it is said that "the affidavits should state what is expected to be proved by the witnesses, that the court may judge (in view of the issues) of their materiality; otherwise they will be slightly regarded." The affidavit of plaintiff made a sufficient showing in this regard.

4. The appellant contends that an examination of the affidavits filed by the respective parties fails to show that the convenience of witnesses would be served by a change of venue. "Much is necessarily confided to the discretion of the trial court on motions for a change of place of trial on the ground of convenience of witnesses, and it is only where it is clear that there has been an abuse of such discretion that this court will interfere." Miller & Lux v. Kern County Land Co., 140 Cal. 132, 136, 73 Pac. 836, 838. The complaint avers that plaintiff, while lawfully in a store conducted by defendant in San Francisco, was injured by falling through a trapdoor which said defendant had negligently left open and unprotected. The answer denies every allegation of the complaint. The affidavit in support of the motion shows that four witnesses, in addition to plaintiff himself, reside in San Francisco. One of them is the physician who attended plaintiff from the time he received the injuries complained of. Three are familiar with the premises upon which plaintiff claimed to have been injured, with the situation of the trapdoor, and with the purposes of plaintiff in entering the premises. The defendant's affidavit alleges that W. C. Ingram and one Walters were the only eyewitnesses of plaintiff's accident, and that defendant expects to have them appear and testify in Los Angeles. It is not averred, however, that either is a resident of Los Angeles county. There is no suggestion that Walters could not as well appear in the one county as in the other. The affiant does state that "it would be highly inconvenient and expensive for said Ingram to go to the county of San Francisco," but, inasmuch as it is further declared that Ingram resides in Beloit, Kan., it is difficult to see how his convenience would be greatly affected by a change of the place of trial. Other witnesses, residents of Los Angeles, are named, but of them all that is stated is that they "are familiar with the situation, condition and circumstances surrounding said alleged happening." Since they were not eyewitnesses of the occurrence, this must be taken to mean that they can testify as to the physical conditions of the place of injury. But there can obviously be no great difficulty in obtaining in San Francisco, where the premises are located, other witnesses who can testify to these matters. Un-

The order is affirmed.

FROWLEY et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF MODOC COUNTY et al. (S. F. 5,333.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1910.)

1. CONTEMPT (§ 2*) — "CONSTRUCTIVE CONTEMPT."

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1468–1469.]

2. CONTEMPT (§ 54*)—CONSTRUCTIVE CONTEMPT—REQUISITES OF AFFIDAVIT.

An affidavit on which constructive contempt proceedings are based must show on its face the acts constituting a contempt, since the affidavit constitutes the complaint, and, unless it states facts showing that a contempt has been committed, the court is without jurisdiction to proceed, and any judgment based thereon is void, and will be so declared on certiorari.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 143–146; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

3. CONTEMPT (§ 54*)—CONSTRUCTIVE CONTEMPT—AFFIDAVITS—SUFFICIENCY.

An affidavit by the probation officer of a juvenile court that he has reason to believe, and believes, that one has committed a contempt against the court and an order of the court prohibiting any one to furnish a particular minor any intoxicating liquor by furnishing the minor intoxicating liquor as set forth in an affidavit by the minor, and referring to the minor's affidavit for a more complete statement of the contempt, which states that at a specified time and place the minor drank whisky with accused and others and that the minor procured several drinks and drank in the presence of and with the knowledge of such persons, and with their consent, and became intoxicated in their presence, are insufficient to show that accused "furnished" intoxicants to the minor in violation of the order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 143–146; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

4. CONTEMPT (§ 54*)—PLEADING—REQUISITES.

Proceedings in contempt being of a criminal nature, no intendments or presumptions are indulged in aid of the complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 143–146; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

5. CONTEMPT (§ 54*) — CONSTRUCTIVE CONTEMPT—REQUISITES OF AFFIDAVIT—NOTICE OF ORDER VIOLATED.

An affidavit for contempt of an order of a juvenile court prohibiting the furnishing of intoxicants to a minor was fatally defective where it failed to show that accused had any notice or knew of the order when he violated it; he being not party to the proceeding in which the order was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 143–146; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

6. CONTEMPT (§ 55*)—VIOLATION OF COURT ORDER OR JUDGMENT—NECESSITY FOR NOTICE.

Generally, to punish for contempt of a court order or judgment, it must appear that the order or judgment was previously served on accused, or that he had actual notice of the order or judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Cent. Dig. §§ 150–161; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

7. CONTEMPT (§ 67*) — REVIEW — RECORD — STIPULATION NOT CONSIDERED BELOW.

On certiorari to review a conviction for contempt of a court order, a stipulation entered into after the judgment of conviction had become final, and constituting no part of the record, cannot be considered on certiorari to show that accused had notice of the order when he violated it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

8. CONTEMPT (§ 67*) — REVIEW — EFFECT OF STIPULATION.

On certiorari to review a conviction for contempt of a court order, a stipulation merely reciting that it was shown in the contempt proceedings that accused knew of the order when he violated it is of no force where the trial court found that fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

9. CONTEMPT (§ 54*) — DEFECTIVE PLEADING NOT CURED.

Radical defects in an affidavit to punish for contempt, or the absence of facts essential to show jurisdiction, cannot be cured by proof on the hearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contempt, Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

10. STIPULATIONS (§ 3*)—DEFECTIVE PLEADING NOT CURED BY STIPULATION.

Since the trial court in proceedings to punish for contempt of an order could not cure the jurisdictional defect existing through the affidavit's failure to show knowledge by accused of the order when he violated it, a stipulation entered into after the conviction could not have that effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Stipulations, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

11. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 76*)—AUTHORITY TO ENTER INTO.

The attorney of one accused of contempt of a court order had no authority to enter into a stipulation that accused had notice of the order when he violated it, after the contempt proceeding had terminated and the relation of attorney and client had ceased.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 129–130; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

In Bank. Certiorari to Superior Court, Modoc County; John E. Raker, Judge.

Certiorari by Thomas Frowley and another against the Superior Court of the County of Modoc and others to review an adjudication in contempt proceedings. Proceedings and the judgment and order thereon annulled.

H. M. Anthony, for petitioners. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Raymond Benjamin, Deputy Atty. Gen., and F. M. Jamison, Dist. Atty., for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This is a proceeding in certiorari to review a judgment of the superior court adjudging the petitioner, Thomas Frowley, Jr., guilty of contempt of court and punishing him therefor, and also imposing certain duties and obligations upon the other petitioner, Thomas Frowley, with reference to said Thomas Frowley, Jr., his son.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The contempt with which the petitioner, Thomas Frowley, Jr., was charged, consisted of the alleged violation of an order made by the superior court of Modoc county, sitting as a juvenile court, in the matter of one James Forrest, a minor. In that matter a judgment was entered placing said James Forrest on probation, under the juvenile act, until he should attain his majority, and it was further provided in said judgment that it "should be a contempt of court for any person to furnish the said James Forrest or to cause to be furnished to him any intoxicating liquor." It was for an alleged violation of the order against furnishing liquor to said James Forrest, while still on probation, that the contempt proceeding against the petitioner, Thomas Frowley, Jr., was instituted. After a hearing he was adjudged guilty of contempt for violating said order and required to pay a fine of $250, payable at the rate of $5 a month until paid. It was further ordered that the other petitioner herein, the father of Thomas Frowley, Jr., should take control of him, in a probationary way, and was charged with certain duties relative to his conduct, and required to report to the court monthly concerning his behavior. In this present proceeding in certiorari various attacks are made on the validity of the contempt proceedings, but we think it only necessary to examine a couple of them.

It is familiar law that in proceedings for constructive contempts of court—that is, contempts committed without the presence of the court, and such as the petitioner Frowley, Jr., is claimed to have committed—the affidavit which is made the basis for the proceeding should show upon its face the acts which constitute a contempt. The affidavit constitutes the complaint, and, unless it contains a statement of facts which show that a contempt has been committed, the court is without jurisdiction to proceed in the matter, and any judgment of contempt based thereon is void, and will be so declared upon certiorari. It is hardly necessary to cite authorities upon a proposition so well settled, but reference may be had to the following cases: Overend v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 280, 63 Pac. 372; Hutton v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 156, 81 Pac. 409; Otis v. Superior Court, 148 Cal. 129, 82 Pac. 853; Ex parte McCarty, 154 Cal. 534, 98 Pac. 540.

Examining the affidavits which served as a basis for the contempt proceeding under review, we find that there are two. One was made by the probation officer of the juvenile court of the county of Modoc, and states "that he has reason to believe and does believe that Thomas Frowley, Jr. (and five others named), have committed a contempt against the juvenile court * * * and against the order of said court heretofore made in the matter of James Forrest, * * * which said contempt will more fully appear by reference to the affidavit of James Forrest hereunto attached and made a part hereof, by furnishing the said James Forrest intoxicating liquor as set forth in said affidavit." The other was the affidavit of James Forrest, referred to in the previous affidavit of the probation officer, which states that on May 9, 1909, "at a place * * * known as the Frowley slaughterhouse he drank certain intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky, with Thomas Frowley, Jr. (and five others named). That said whisky was contained in a large bottle, and that this affiant procured a number of drinks and drank in the presence of and with the knowledge of the aforesaid parties and with their consent, * * * and that this affiant became intoxicated in the presence of the said parties." These excerpts from the affidavits constitute all the reference which is made to any order of court which petitioner Thomas Frowley, Jr., is charged with having contumaciously violated, and also contain a specification of the only acts which are charged to have been committed by him and claimed to constitute a contempt of court.

While the probation officer's affidavit states that the order of court was violated "by furnishing the said James Forrest intoxicating liquor as set forth in said (Forrest's) affidavit," that affidavit of Forrest, relied on as charging the specific acts constituting the violation, does not show any violation of the order by Thomas Frowley, Jr., or at all. The order prohibited the "furnishing liquor" to the probationary minor, and all the affidavit shows is that Forrest, Frowley, Jr., and the others, drank whisky together. Of course, when they drank together, it was with the knowledge of all, and doubtless no objection was urged by any member of the party against any other member of it doing so. But mere knowledge of and consent to Forrest's drinking the whisky was not a violation of the order. The affidavit nowhere states that the petitioner, Frowley, Jr., furnished the whisky, or that he gave it to Forrest or asked him to drink it. There is an entire absence of statement as to who procured the whisky, and for all the affidavit contains to the contrary, or on the subject at all, it may have been furnished by Forrest himself, or by some person not mentioned in the affidavit. There is certainly nothing in the affidavit showing that Frowley, Jr., furnished it, or procured it, or enticed Forrest to drink it, or did any other act violative of the terms of the order. Proceedings in contempt are of a criminal nature, and no intendments or presumptions are to be indulged in in aid of the sufficiency of a complaint. The affidavits (the complaint) must set forth acts showing in themselves the fact that a contempt has been committed by the party charged, and, failing to do so, the court is absolutely without jurisdiction in the matter.

Aside from this, however, these affidavits are radically defective as a basis for a contempt proceeding, in failing to show that the petitioner, Frowley, Jr., had any notice or knowledge whatever of the existence of the order of court at the time when it is claimed he violated it. He was not a party to the proceeding in which the order was made, and hence knowledge of it could not be imputed to him. The general rule is that "in order to punish a person for contempt of court for violation of an order, judgment or decree of court, it must appear that said order, judgment or decree, has been previously served on the one charged or that he has had actual notice of the making of such order or the rendition of such judgment or decree." 9 Ency. of L. & P. p. 12. The petitioner, Frowley, Jr., could not be adjudged guilty of contempt unless he had knowledge of the order. This being true, knowledge on his part was one of the essential facts to be stated in the affidavits, so that upon their face they would show a case of constructive contempt. Such knowledge not being charged, the affidavits were fatally defective. No case of contempt appeared therefrom, and hence the court had no jurisdiction in the matter, and its subsequent proceedings were void. The effect of the absence of this essential averment in the affidavits is sought to be obviated by calling the attention of the court on the hearing to a stipulation entered into between the district attorney who appeared in support of the contempt proceedings and the attorney who then represented the petitioner, Frowley, Jr., in which it was "stipulated and agreed * * * that * * * Thomas Frowley, Jr., did at the time of the alleged contempt have knowledge of the order * * * prohibiting any one from furnishing any intoxicating liquor" to Forrest, and "did know at the time of the said alleged contempt that it was a contempt of said court and of the said order of said court to furnish any intoxicating liquor to the said James Forrest, and these facts appeared in evidence and were proven in the hearing of the above proceeding before the aforesaid court."

But this stipulation cannot be considered, and has no legal force even if it could. It was entered into and filed months after the proceedings in contempt had terminated and the judgment therein had become final, and is no part of the record in the contempt proceedings. In fact, it was entered into months after this proceeding in certiorari had been commenced here by other counsel representing petitioner, and the attack thereby made on the contempt proceedings for want of jurisdiction in the lower court to entertain them, and doubtless to meet the attack on that ground. Nor, if the stipulation might be considered, would the matter stated therein affect the question of jurisdiction. It simply recites that it was shown in the contempt proceedings by evidence that Frowley, Jr., had knowledge of the order when he violated it. But, as far as showing that fact is concerned, the stipulation was unnecessary because the court in its findings found as a fact that the petitioner had such knowledge, and the stipulation is no broader than the finding. It is settled law, however, that radical defects in the affidavit, the absence of essential facts, the existence of which are necessary to be shown in the affidavit as a condition precedent to the exercise of jurisdiction to proceed in contempt, cannot be cured by proof upon the hearing. Having failed to acquire jurisdiction, the court had no authority to proceed to a hearing at all. In Hutton v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 156, 159, 81 Pac. 409, 410, after reiterating the rule that as a basis for judicial action in contempt the essential facts constituting it must appear on the face of the affidavits or the court is wanting in jurisdiction to proceed, it is said: "In such a case, it is immaterial what may be shown to the court upon the hearing, or specified and found by the court in its decree adjudging the accused guilty of contempt. The proceedings are void ab initio. The affidavit or affidavits upon which the contempt proceeding is based constitute the complaint, and unless they, upon their face, charge facts constituting a contempt, the court is without jurisdiction to proceed." As the court could not by its finding cure the jurisdictional defect existing on account of a failure to allege knowledge by petitioner of the existence of the order when it is claimed he violated it, the stipulation could not have that effect.

Aside from this, we are satisfied that the attorney had no authority to enter into such a stipulation. There was no proceeding then pending in which he was attorney for petitioner. The contempt proceeding had terminated and the relation of attorney and client had ceased, and with it ceased any authority in the attorney to stipulate as to anything relative to that proceeding so as to bind petitioner.

It follows, for the reasons given, that the proceedings in contempt against Thomas Frowley, Jr., should be and the same are annulled, and, as far as the orders of the court imposed obligations and duties upon the other petitioner, Thomas Frowley, relative to Thomas Frowley, Jr., his son, to be discharged under the direction of the trial court, as they were only made and based upon the contempt proceedings, the judgment and order as to them are likewise annulled and set aside.

1. COURTS (§ 206*)—ELECTION CONTEST.

It was not a sufficient reason for commencing a primary election contest in the Supreme Court that, if commenced in the superior court, an appeal might be taken which could not be decided before the ballots were printed, so that justice would be defeated, because under St. 1909, p. 709, § 27, providing that the Supreme Court or District Courts of Appeal or the superior court of the proper county may entertain such contests, concurrent jurisdiction is given them, and no provision for appeals in such cases is made, and, if the Supreme Court should consider such cases, it would be overrun with them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

2. ELECTIONS (§ 277*)—ELECTION CONTESTS—COURTS — "PROPER COUNTY" — CONSTRUCTION.

Under St. 1909, p. 709, § 27, providing that the Supreme Court or District Courts of Appeal or the superior court of the proper county may entertain a primary election contest, by "proper county" is meant the county in which the election is held.

In Bank. Contest by Charles P. Snyder of the right of John Hancock to be declared to be the nominee of the Republican Party for the office of district attorney of Calaveras county. Petition dismissed.

Geo. F. Snyder and J. P. Snyder, for contestant.

BEATTY, C. J. At the recent primary election, the petitioner and John Hancock were opposing candidates for the Republican nomination for the office of district attorney of Calaveras county. The result of the canvass as declared by the board of supervisors was that 612 votes had been cast for Hancock and only 610 for petitioner, and in consequence the clerk will print the name of Hancock on the official ballot to be voted at the approaching election unless restrained. The substance of the further allegations of the petition is that there are 34 election precincts in Calaveras county, and that, owing to misconduct of the precinct officers, one or more votes in every precinct were counted for Hancock that ought to have been counted for petitioner, wherefore he prays for a recount by this court of all the ballots cast in Calaveras county, and for all other orders necessary to secure for him the right to have his name instead of Hancock's printed on the official ballot as the Republican nominee for district attorney. The reason alleged for bringing the contest before the Supreme Court as an original proceeding is that, if it were heard by the superior court of Calaveras county and there determined in favor of the petitioner, the contestee might, by taking an appeal, which could not possibly be determined before the time for printing the ballots, cause a failure of justice.

In disposing of the petition we do not find it necessary to consider any other question than the sufficiency of the reason assigned for commencing the contest in this court. It is instituted, of course, in supposed conformity to the provisions of section 27 of the primary nomination law (St. 1909, p. 709), which in terms assumes to confer upon this court, the District Court of Appeal, and the superior court of the proper county a concurrent jurisdiction to correct in a summary proceeding all errors, omissions, misconduct, or neglect of duty of any of the officers concerned in the preparation of the official ballot. According to the terms of the act, the jurisdiction of the superior courts in their respective ("the proper") counties is just as extensive and complete as the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and, as there is no provision for an appeal in this class of contests, their judgments are final when entered. There is therefore nothing to justify the commencement of the proceeding in this court. Any other construction of the primary nomination law would involve the most absurd results. Every contest of a close election for any county, township, or municipal office throughout the state, to be effective, would have to be waged in this court, and probably very few could be determined between the canvass of the votes cast at the primary election and the date of the general election, and the time of the court which scarcely suffices for the due consideration of causes within our constitutional jurisdiction would be occupied for many weeks in the merely clerical task of counting ballots and tallying votes.

The petition is dismissed without prejudice to an original proceeding in the superior court of Calaveras county, which we hold to be the "proper county" within the meaning of the statute.

(Civ. 723.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 13, 1910. Rehearing Denied Aug. 13, 1910.)

1. LEVEES (§ 6*)—PROTECTION DISTRICTS—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH—PRESUMPTIONS.

In the absence of proof to the contrary, in a proceeding under Act March 27, 1895 (St. 1895, c. 201), as amended by St. 1909, c. 477, to establish a protection district, the board of supervisors will be presumed to have required evidence as to the genuineness of the signatures on the petition and that the signers were qualified as required by the act, especially where they find that the petition was signed by the proper number of property holders.

2. LEVEES (§ 6*)—PROTECTION DISTRICTS—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH — VALIDITY — BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden is on one attacking proceedings under Act March 27, 1895 (St. 1895, c. 201), as amended by St. 1909, c. 477, to establish a protection district to show invalidity of the proceedings.

3. LEVEES (§ 6*)—PROTECTION DISTRICTS—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH.

In a proceeding under Act March 27, 1895 (St. 1895, c. 201), as amended by St. 1909, c. 477, to establish a protection district, the board of supervisors need not rehear evidence as to the sufficiency of the petition, on hearing objections of property owners to the improvement, especially when no such issue is raised by the property owners.

4. LEVEES (§ 6*)—PROTECTION DISTRICTS—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH—NOTICE.

Proceedings under Act March 27, 1895 (St. 1895, c. 201), as amended by St. 1909, c. 477, to establish a protection district are not vitiated because affidavit of publication of notice of the supervisors' intent to proceed was not filed until after the order establishing the district, where it was found that the notice was actually published as required by law, and the complaining party had actual notice and was heard on his objection before the order was made.

5. LEVEES (§ 6*)—PROTECTION DISTRICTS—PROCEEDINGS TO ESTABLISH — DESCRIPTION OF BOUNDARIES.

Proceedings under Act March 27, 1895 (St. 1895, c. 201), as amended by St. 1909, c. 477, to establish a protection district, were not vitiated because the order establishing the district described the boundaries more definitely than the petition and the resolution of intention, especially since the act authorizes the board to change the boundaries.

6. LEVEES (§ 2*)—PROTECTION DISTRICTS—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF LAW.

Act March 27, 1895 (St. 1895, c. 201), as amended by St. 1909, c. 477, authorizing the establishment of protection districts, is not unconstitutional because commissioners view the lands and the improvements affected, and determine in the first instance the value thereof and the damage thereto, and also estimate the cost of the work and assess the same on the lands in the district, since the supervisors need not adopt the report and they finally determine the assessment.

7. LEVEES (§ 22*) — PROTECTION DISTRICTS — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Act March 27, 1895 (St. 1895, c. 201), as amended by St. 1909, c. 477, is not unconstitutional as involving double taxation.

8. QUO WARRANTO (§ 5*)—PROTECTION DISTRICTS.

The validity of the organization of a de facto protection district can be determined only through quo warranto by consent of the Attorney General.

Proceedings by Peter D. Barnes against the Board of Supervisors of Colusa County and others to review action of the Board establishing a protection district. Writ denied.

A. C. Huston and Ernest Weyand, for petitioner. Frank Freeman, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This is a proceeding to review the action of the board of supervisors of Colusa county culminating in the establishment of what is known as "the Boggs protection district."

It is conceded that the warrant for the board's proceedings in the premises is found in the act of the Legislature approved March 27, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 247), entitled "An act to provide for the formation of protection districts in the various counties of this state, for the improvement and rectification of the channels of innavigable streams and water courses, for the prevention of the overflow thereof by widening, deepening and strengthening and otherwise improving the same, and to authorize the boards of supervisors to levy and collect assessments from the property benefited to pay the expenses of the same," and as amended in 1909. St. 1909, p. 807.

Petitioner bases his request and contention for an annulment of the proceedings of the board creating said district upon the grounds: (1) The board of supervisors had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter for the reason that there was no proof that the petition for the organization of the district was signed by ten property holders as required by the statute; (2) the board proceeded to establish the district without any proof that the notice of intention had been published as required by law; and (3) that the act itself providing for these protection districts is unconstitutional and therefore void.

The first contention of petitioner is supported—so it is claimed—by the testimony of W. J. King, the county clerk, who testified in this court that he was not present at the meetings of the said board of supervisors when the petition for the formation of the district and the resolution of intention "was up before the board but after that, at all sessions, I was." When the objections of Mr. Barnes were heard, the witness was present, and he declared as to what occurred: "My remembrance of it is that Mr. Weyand, on behalf of Mr. Barnes, objected or began talking to the board in regard to it, that there were not property owners that had signed the petition, and Mr. Freeman answered him that the question had been settled when the resolution of intention was published by the board; that that question had previously been settled; and the board proceeded with the other business of the formation of the protection district immediately after that without any further consideration. I do not remember of any testimony on the subject of the ownership of the land. The statements of Attorney Weyand and Attorney Freeman were all I remember." It is to be observed that the witness is somewhat uncertain as to what occurred. No doubt, however, he details the transaction as he remembers it and, probably, as it took place. We may, indeed, accept his testimony as sufficient to overcome the finding of the board of supervisors that "said petition having conformed to all requirements of the law, and being signed by the proper number of property holders of the district and landowners," and yet this effect must be limited to the particular time concerning which the county clerk testified. We must presume that when the petition was filed the board required and received evidence as to the genuineness of the signatures and that the signers were "property holders of the district." The presumption that the supervisors did their duty in that regard and the finding that the petition was signed by "the proper number of property holders" must certainly prevail, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary. It is not denied that the burden in this proceeding is upon the petitioner to show that the board of supervisors had no jurisdiction to form said district, and it would be singular if the board required no proof as to the signatures before passing a resolution of intention to organize the district. To require such proof is the natural order of procedure contemplated by the statute. And there seems no reason why the evidence should be repeated at the time of the hearing of the objections of the property owners, if any, to said work or improvement, especially when no such issue is raised by any property owner. The statute provides (section 3) that "any person interested, objecting to such work or improvement, or to the extent of the district of lands to be affected or benefited by such work or improvement and to be assessed to pay the costs and expenses thereof, may make written objections to the same within ten days after the expiration of the time of the publication of said notice," and thereafter such objection shall be heard by said board. Petitioner herein, in accordance with the said provision of the statute, filed his written objection to the formation of said district to the effect that the work as contemplated would be an injury to his lands—specifying in what respect—and that the formation of said district as contemplated "would burden the general taxpayers of said county with an additional burden to keep up the said works contemplated to be constructed." The return shows that evidence was heard as to these specifications and the finding was against petitioner. The board was not required at that time to do more, assuming that its prior proceedings were regular.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The only additional adverse suggestion as to this refers to the filing of the affidavit of publication. It appears to have been filed subsequent to the order of the board establishing the district; but, as stated by respondents, this is of no consequence, "for in fact it shows that the notice was published and may be additional evidence of that fact. The record of the board shows that it was adjudicated that the notice was published as required by law in the Daily Colusa Sun. This finding is not disputed or any showing made that such publication was not made. The filing of this affidavit does not prove or tend to prove that the board did not have sufficient and proper evidence before them as to the publication of the notice." A sufficient answer to petitioner's contention would indeed seem to be that the statute does not require an affidavit of publication to be filed before the order is made, although this would be the usual course, that the publication was actually made as required, that the hearing was had at the proper time, and that petitioner had actual notice and was present with his objections at the appointed time and was duly heard by the board before the order was made establishing the district. Neither is there any merit in the contention that the supervisors were divested of jurisdiction by reason of a change in the boundaries of said district. It appears from the return that the description in the order establishing the district was made more definite and certain than in the said petition and resolution of intention, but the identity of the land seemed to be the same. At any rate, the statute authorizes a change as follows: "Such board may, in its discretion, sustain, in whole or in part, any or all of the objections made and filed, and may change or alter the boundaries of such district to conform to the needs of the district."

The objections made to the constitutionality of the act we think are equally untenable. The supervisors are not deprived of the power to levy and fix the amount of the assessment on the land. It is true that the commissioners view the lands and the improvements affected and determine in the first instance the value thereof and the damage to the same and also the estimated amount of the cost of the proposed work and the expenses incident thereto, and they assess the same upon the lands embraced within the exterior boundaries of such protection district and report the result of their investigations to the board of supervisors. The latter, however, are not bound to adopt the report. It is set for hearing and notice given thereof, and any objections that may be made by the landowners are considered, and the board of supervisors finally determine the assessment, being limited, however, as to the proportion they may impose upon the county.

The cases cited by petitioner are entirely different. For instance, in People v. Houston, 54 Cal. 536, as stated in the syllabus: "By a special act in relation to a swamp land reclamation district, the trustees were required to make up a sworn statement of the cost of the reclamation work 'based upon the books and vouchers thereof,' and the amount so reported was to be assessed upon the lands." The Supreme Court declared that: "It is, in effect, nothing more nor less than an attempt by the Legislature to levy an assessment upon the lands of the district; the amount being the sum total shown by the books and vouchers, without any reference to the nature or character of the charges on the books, and irrespective of any question as to whether the law authorizing and providing for the work has been complied with." So, in McCabe v. Carpenter, 102 Cal. 469, 36 Pac. 836, the legislation was condemned for the reason that the amount of the tax was left wholly to the discretion of an executive officer and thereby delegating legislative power to the county superintendent of schools.

Nor is the act open to the objection that it involves double taxation. The tax is manifestly for a particular purpose, a public improvement within a certain district, of especial benefit to the lands within said district, but incidentally of advantage to the county at large. The landowners within the district certainly cannot complain that a portion of the tax is assessed to the county, and the general scheme involves the same principle as is found in the reclamation and irrigation legislation which has been upheld by the higher courts.

Aside from the foregoing, there is much plausibility in the suggestion of respondents that we have the case of a de facto corporation, and that the only course open to petitioner to have its validity determined is through quo warranto by consent of the Attorney General. The decisions of the Supreme Court upon this question were recently reviewed by this court in the case of Reclamation District No. 765 v. McPhee, 109 Pac. 1106, and it is unnecessary to repeat the discussion. It may be said, though, that Keech v. Joplin, 106 Pac. 222, involved the validity of the organization of a protection district, and the Supreme Court therein declared that the doctrine applies to such districts as well as to irrigation and reclamation districts, and "the validity of the organization of such a district cannot be questioned by private individuals, but only in a proceeding in quo warranto at the suit of the state." The only controversy could be as to whether the record here discloses a de facto corporation. As to this point, quotation was made in the McPhee Case, supra, from Martin v. Deetz, 102 Cal. 55, 36 Pac. 368, 41 Am. St. Rep. 151, as follows: "What is a corporation de facto? It exists where a number of persons have organized and acted as a corporation; have put on the habiliments of a corporation; have assumed the form and features of a corporation; have conducted their affairs, to some extent at least, by the methods and through the officers usually employed by corporations; and have assumed the appearance, at least, of the counterfeit presentment of a legal corporate body."

The petition and return herein show that at a regular session of the board of supervisors of Colusa county a petition was presented and filed for the formation of a protection district; that said board passed a resolution to improve said Willow creek and to form said protection district; that said resolution was published as required by law; that a hearing of said petition was had by said board and an order made establishing said district and designating it as the "Boggs protection district"; that said board adopted plans for the work contemplated and appointed commissioners to assess damages and to proceed under said act with all matters by the said commissioners deemed necessary to the end that said Willow creek might be improved and controlled; that said commissioners qualified and were about to proceed with the work required of them when it was arrested by this proceeding. It is clear that the district established had the appearance of a legal corporate body. There was a complete organization of the district under color of title, with no step omitted that the statute makes a prerequisite for the beginning of the work by the commissioners, and it is difficult to perceive how the case would be different in principle if said commissioners had actually proceeded in the work which they contemplated. But it is unnecessary to decide this question, as upon the merits we think respondents should prevail.

The order to show cause is therefore discharged, and the writ denied.

1. Criminal Law (§ 84*)—"Police Court"—Creation.

The police court established by the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, as authorized by Const. art. 11, § 8½, authorizing cities to provide for the constitution and jurisdiction of police courts, is not the police court created by St. 1889, c. 66, as amended by St. 1893, c. 15, but is a new court created by a different authority, and the statutes of 1889 and 1893 are repealed by the charter, declaring that it supercedes inconsistent laws.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 84*)—POLICE COURTS—STATUTES—VALIDITY.

The provision of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco which gives concurrent jurisdiction of all misdemeanors to the superior and police courts is void, and under the charter the police court has jurisdiction of all prosecutions for violations of ordinances of the board of supervisors, and such jurisdiction as is possessed by justices of the peace, of misdemeanors under the general law.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 94*)—JURISDICTION OF OFFENSES—COURTS.

The superior court, vested by the Constitution with original jurisdiction of misdemeanors not otherwise provided for, has original jurisdiction of an offense committed in the city and county of San Francisco, punishable by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment in the county jail for not more than a year, and the police court of the city and county of San Francisco, possessing only such jurisdiction as is possessed by justices of the peace of misdemeanors under the general law, is without jurisdiction.

4. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS (§ 6*) — PRACTICING DENTISTRY WITHOUT A LICENSE — BURDEN OF PROOF.

One charged with practicing dentistry without a license in violation of the dentistry act (St. 1901, c. 175), as amended by St. 1909, c. 476, has the burden of proving that he either had a license from the board of dental examiners, or at the time of the passage of the act had the right to practice dentistry.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Physicians and Surgeons, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

5. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS (§ 1*)—REGULATING PRACTICE OF DENTISTRY—STATUTES.

The Legislature adopting a statute regulating the practice of dentistry may define the practice, and thus make it clear what acts it intends to make unlawful.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 772*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction on a trial for practicing dentistry without a license, which defines the practice of dentistry in the language of the statute, regulating the practice, is not erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

O. J. Fortch was convicted of practicing dentistry without a license, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John T. Williams and Walter J. Thompson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen. (Oliver Dibble, of counsel), for the State.

HALL, J. Defendant was charged, by information, filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, with practicing dentistry without a license in said city and county, in violation of the so-called "Dentistry Act," as amended in 1909. St. 1909, p. 800. Upon his trial, he was found guilty, and is now before this court upon his appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The principal point relied on for a reversal of the judgment is that the superior court had no original jurisdiction of the offense charged. The offense is punishable by a fine of not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year. The Constitution gives to the superior court original jurisdiction of all "cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for." Therefore, unless jurisdiction of the class of misdemeanors to which this offense belongs is given by some law to some other court, jurisdiction thereof belongs to the superior court. Appellant's contention is that such jurisdiction is given by the act creating a police court in the city and county of San Francisco approved March 5, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 62), and the act amendatory of and supplemental thereto, approved February 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 9). These two acts may be read as one act, and did give jurisdiction in all cases of misdemeanor punishable by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year to the police court created by the act of 1889. This court continued in existence, and the law by which it was created remained in force, until the taking effect of the present charter of the city and county of San Francisco, on the first Monday in January, 1900. In accordance with the provisions of section 8½ of article 11 of the Constitution, adopted in 1896, the present charter creates a police court and defines its jurisdiction. The language of the charter is: "There is hereby created and established in and for the city and county of San Francisco a court to be known as the police court of the city and county of San Francisco." Section 1, c. 8, art. 5, Charter San Francisco. Then follow complete provisions defining the jurisdiction of such court, and providing for its regulation and government, and for the manner and time of the election of the judges thereof and its clerks and attaches. The police court established by the charter is not the same court referred to in the act of 1889 and in the supplemental act of 1893, but it is a new court created by a different authority. When the charter court was created, the police court created by the act of 1889 went out of existence, and the act of 1889 and the supplemental act of 1893 were repealed. This we understand to be the doctrine laid down in Graham v. Mayor, etc., of Fresno, 151 Cal. 465, 91 Pac. 147. It is there said: "The effect of subdivision 1 of section 8½ of article 11 was to make the matter of such police courts purely a municipal affair as to any freeholders' charter city which subsequently made appropriate provision in its charter for such court. It confided the matter of such courts, and the election and compensation of the judges thereof, to any such city desiring to assume, and assuming control thereof, just as by the same section the matter of fixing the compensation of county officers in consolidated cities and counties was confided to the city and county, to be provided for in its freeholders' charter. Such jurisdiction could not coexist in both the Legislature and the city, and the provision for the assumption of such jurisdiction by the city necessarily contemplated the removal of the same from the Legislature whenever the jurisdiction was assumed by the city. Any act of the Legislature relative to such subject-matter would necessarily be inconsistent with a charter provision in regard to the same subject-matter. As to such matters as the Constitution authorizes to be provided for in freeholders' charters, the provisions of the charter are supreme superseding all laws inconsistent therewith (Const. art. 11, § 6) and being exempt from any control by any subsequent act of the Legislature." By the terms of the Constitution, the subject-matter of providing for the Constitution and jurisdiction of police courts is given to such cities and cities and counties if they so elect. In the case just cited it is said: "Any act of the Legislature relative to such subject-matter would necessarily be inconsistent with a charter provision in regard to the same subject-matter." The charter provides that it "shall supersede the existing charter of said city and county, and all amendments thereof, and all laws inconsistent with this charter."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is clear that the effect of the provisions of the charter creating a police court was to repeal the acts of 1889 and 1893, which are the only acts claimed to give jurisdiction of misdemeanors of the class to which the case at bar belongs to any court other than the superior court; for, while the charter attempts to give concurrent jurisdiction of all misdemeanors to the superior court and police court, such provision has been declared to be void. Robert v. Police Court, 148 Cal. 131, 82 Pac. 838. The charter, therefore, as is very properly conceded by appellant, does not give jurisdiction to the police court of the offense of which defendant was convicted. Under the charter, the police court has jurisdiction of all prosecutions for violations of ordinances of the board of supervisors, and such jurisdiction as is possessed by justices of the peace in cases of misdemeanors under the general laws (Robert v. Police Court, supra). But there is no general law giving to the justices of the peace jurisdiction over misdemeanors punishable by fine of $1,000 or imprisonment for one year. As we have shown, the only law relied on by appellant as giving jurisdiction of the offense to any court other than the superior court has been repealed by the adoption of the charter. Neither the act of 1889 nor the supplemental act of 1893 purports to define the jurisdiction of any police court other than the one created by the act of 1889. That such court is a different court from the one created by the freeholders' charter is quite plain. The two courts were created by different authorities, and the creation of the second abolished the first and repealed the acts for its creation. It is therefore plain that the superior court had original jurisdiction of the case at bar, and the contention of appellant upon this point cannot be sustained.

Appellant next contends that the trial court erred in instructing the jury to the effect that the burden was upon the defendant to prove that he either had a license from the board of dental examiners of California, or that at the time of the passage of the act regulating dentistry, approved March 23, 1901 (St. 1901, c. 175), he had the lawful right to practice dentistry in the state of California. The court followed the rule laid down in People v. Boo Doo Hong, 122 Cal. 606, 55 Pac. 402, and in so doing committed no error.

The only other point relied on by appellant is that the court erred in charging the jury "that any person shall be understood to be practicing dentistry who shall for a fee, salary, or reward, paid directly or indirectly, either to himself or some other person, perform an operation of any kind upon the human jaws or teeth." This instruction is in the exact language of the statute defining what shall constitute the practice of dentistry within the meaning of the act. The Legislature had the power to thus define what it meant by the terms "practicing dentistry," and to thus make clear what acts it intended to make unlawful. State v. Yegge, 19 S. D. 234, 103 N. W. 17, 69 L. R. A. 504. The instruction was not erroneous.

No other grounds are urged for a reversal, and the judgment and order must be affirmed. It is so ordered.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 409*) — PROSECUTION — ADMISSIONS.

The extrajudicial admissions of the accused are not sufficient of themselves to sustain a conviction for arson.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 918, 919; Dec. Dig. § 409.*]

4. Arson (§ 37*)—Corpus Delicti—Evidence—Sufficiency.

While the mere destruction of a building by fire is not enough to establish the corpus delicti of arson, yet evidence that the condition of the premises showed that three separate fires had been started, taken in connection with other evidence tending to show the improbability of the fire being the result of accident, was sufficient to establish it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

5. Criminal Law (§ 680*)—Corpus Delicti—Order of Proof—Discretion of the Court.

The order of proof in a prosecution for arson is in the discretion of the court, and, while the corpus delicti ordinarily should first be proved, yet evidence of a declaration of defendant before such proof will not warrant a reversal of the conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1609, 1610; Dec. Dig. § 680.*]

6. Criminal Law (§ 448*)—Trial—Cure of Error—Admission of Evidence.

In a prosecution for arson, a witness testified as an expert over defendant's objection that there had been three separate fires set in the basement which had formed into one conflagration. This was later stricken out on defendant's motion, and the jury were instructed not to consider it. The witness subsequently stated facts which showed that the fire originated in three places. Held, that there was no error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 448.*]

7. Criminal Law (§ 1044*)—Appeal—Objections Not Made Below.

Where in a criminal prosecution a certain question was permitted to be asked a witness the court being unable to anticipate the nature of the answer, the defendant could not complain on appeal of the admission of the answer, a part of which was admissible, where he failed to move to strike it out.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1044.*]

8. Witnesses (§ 306*)—Privilege—Tendency to Degrade — Persons Entitled to Privilege.

In a criminal prosecution, it is no objection to a question asked a witness calling for competent and material testimony that it may tend to degrade the character of the defendant, as it is only when the answer will tend to degrade the character of the witness that he is excused from answering under Code Civ. Proc. § 2065, providing that a witness need not give an answer that will tend to degrade his character unless it be to the fact in issue, or to a fact from which the fact in issue would be presumed.

9. Criminal Law (§ 1186*) — Appeal — Remarks of Prosecuting Attorney—Effect.

Where, in a criminal prosecution, defendant objected to certain questions as tending to degrade his character, the prosecuting attorney's remark that "the character of the defendant is being degraded as we go along, that is our object," while it were better left unsaid, was too trivial to be a ground for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1186.*]

10. Criminal Law (§ 939*) — New Trial — Newly Discovered Evidence — Abuse of Discretion.

Where, in a prosecution for arson, the court had granted several continuances, its refusal to grant a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence showing his insanity at the time of the offense was not an abuse of its discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 939.*]

11. Criminal Law (§ 977*)—Continuance—Grounds — Discovered Evidence for New Trial.

Where, in a prosecution for arson, the court had granted several continuances, its refusal to continue the case for sentence, so that defendant could obtain certain affidavits proving his insanity at the time of the offense, was not an abuse of its discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 977.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Thomas Elliot Saunders was convicted of arson, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Clarence G. Atwood and Charles A. Strong, for appellant. Attorney General U. S. Webb, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was accused by information of the crime of arson of the first degree. He was tried and convicted as charged. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 20 years. This appeal is prosecuted from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

Defendant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The record is long, but the facts, very briefly, are as follows: The defendant had been in the employ of the St. Luke's Hospital as a porter for about two weeks when, on November 16, 1909, being under the influence of liquor, and being moreover generally unsatisfactory to the management of the hospital, he was discharged by the matron. Although discharged at about 5 o'clock in the afternoon of that day and repeatedly requested thereafter to leave the premises, he did not do so, and was arrested and removed by police officers at about 12 o'clock that night. On the way to the police station he abused the doctors and nurses of the hospital, and told the officer in charge of the patrol wagon that he would "get even." The next day, upon being released from custody, he went back to the hospital, and, after being ordered away, he called at the offices of two of the San Francisco daily morning newspapers and endeavored to have them publish a statement that the dead were being robbed at St. Luke's Hospital. On the way to these offices he met Rev. Dr. Shields, head of one of the departments of the hospital, and said: "I am sorry to have to do it, but you will see it all in the papers in the morning." His story was refused publication. He returned to the hospital that evening at about 11:30. The police department was again appealed to, but police officers did not arrive at the hospital until somewhere between 1 and 2 o'clock, whereupon they searched the premises, but did not find the defendant. At 3:45 a. m. of November 18, 1909, a fire occurred in the basement of that wing of the hospital called the Mills building, in which 18 patients were at that time confined, who all, however, fortunately escaped unharmed. Defendant was seen by several witnesses both just before and just after the fire in the neighborhood of the hospital. Yet in a letter to one of the nurses, and in a statement to the fire marshal in the presence of several police officers, he denied that he was in that vicinity at either of those times. In his statement to the fire marshal he attempted to account for his whereabouts on the night of the 17th of November, but we think the jury were fully justified in disbelieving him. The condition of the basement of the Mills building, shows that the fire in all probability was of incendiary origin. We think the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury. In criminal cases this court can pass only upon questions of law, and it is only where there is in effect an entire lack of evidence to support a verdict that a question of law is presented. The rule is stated thus in People v. Emerson, 130 Cal. 563, 62 Pac. 1069: If the evidence which bears against the defendant, considered by itself, and without regard to conflicting evidence, tends to support the verdict, the question ceases to be one of law—of which alone this court has jurisdiction—and becomes one of fact, upon which the decision of the jury and the trial court is final and conclusive.

It is true, as contended by defendant, that the mere proof of the destruction of a building by fire is not enough to establish the corpus delicti, and the defendant's extrajudicial statements and admissions are not sufficient of themselves to sustain a judgment of conviction for arson. People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345, 40 Pac. 440. But here the physical condition of the premises showed that three separate and distinct fires had been started; and this evidence, taken in connection with other evidence tending to show the improbability of the fire being the result of accident, was sufficient to show that the crime of arson had been committed. The extrajudicial statements of the defendant were adduced after the corpus delicti was disclosed; and, even if they had been admitted in evidence before the corpus delicti was established (as the defendant claims was the case), still no serious question would be presented. The usual order of proof would have been departed from; but the order of proof is in the discretion of the trial court, and, while the corpus delicti is ordinarily the first point to which the evidence should be directed, nevertheless the admission in evidence of a declaration by the defendant before such proof is made will not warrant a reversal of the judgment. People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 567; People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 65, 55 Pac. 698. Fire Marshal Towe gave his opinion as an expert that there had originally been three different and separate set fires which had formed into a small conflagration. This testimony went in over the objection of the defendant, and later, upon his motion, it was stricken from the record; and the jury was instructed to disregard it. Subsequently the witness stated facts which showed that the fire had three different places of origin. The assertion of the defendant that the court's action in this regard was error is entirely without merit.

On the way to the police station on the occasion of his first arrest the defendant made a remark to the police officer in charge of the patrol wagon in disparagement of the women attachés of the hospital, and that he would get even with the hospital authorities. The question which elicited this testimony was objected to upon general grounds, and also for the reason that it would tend to degrade the defendant. The deputy district attorney in reply said: "The character of the defendant is being degraded as we go along, that is our object." When the question was propounded, the court was unable to anticipate the nature of the answer, and as no motion was made to strike it out, and part of the answer being admissible, the defendant cannot be heard to complain. Moreover, if the question called for competent and material testimony, it was no objection to it that it might tend to degrade the character of the defendant. It is only when the answer to a material question will tend to degrade the character of the witness that he is excused from answering it (Code Civ. Proc. § 2065), and the question here was addressed to the police officer, and not to the defendant. Coming to the observation of the prosecuting officer, and conceding that it would have been better left unsaid, nevertheless it is too trivial a matter to be considered as a ground for reversal. Besides, what the district attorney meant, and what he was probably understood to mean, was that the defendant was being degraded by the evidence introduced tending to prove him guilty of the crime charged.

Defendant claims that "throughout the case the court took a very prominent part in the examination of the witnesses," at times taking the witnesses "out of the hands of the prosecuting attorney and conducting the examination." A reading of the record discloses that, whenever the court examined witnesses, the questions asked were not only pertinent, but they showed no leaning against the defendant. Therefore there is no occasion here, as there was in the case of People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 Pac. 752, for criticizing the conduct of the trial court. The defendant moved for a new trial upon the ground that subsequent to the trial he had discovered evidence showing that he was insane at the time of the commission of the act charged. At the hearing of the motion, five affidavits in support thereof were read and filed, whereupon defendant's counsel requested a continuance of the pronouncing of judgment to enable them to get affidavits from Denver concerning defendant's family record and of his confinement in an insane asylum in the state of Colorado. The court had granted several continuances of this matter, and refused this request, and also made its order denying the motion for a new trial. We cannot say that the court in either matter abused its discretion.

Having thus concluded that there is no error prejudicial to the defendant in the record, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the point made by the Attorney General that no proper appeal has been perfected.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re CLARK'S ESTATE. (Civ. 744.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 26, 1910.)

1. Evidence (§ 309*)—Declarations—Pedigree.

Declarations of the deceased father of claimants to the estate of an intestate that the intestate was his sister, made in the lifetime of the intestate, are admissible without extrinsic preliminary proof of the relationship of the father to the intestate.

2. Evidence (§ 309*)—Declarations—Pedigree.

Before the declarations of a deceased person as to his relationship to another are admissible, the relationship of the claimant to the declarant must be shown.

3. Descent and Distribution (§ 71*)—Heirship—Evidence.

Evidence held to show that a decedent was a brother of an intestate, so that decedent's children were distributees of the intestate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Proceedings for the distribution of the estate of Eliza Clark, deceased. From a decree of distribution and an order denying a new trial, the State appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb and Malcolm C. Glenn, for appellant. J. R. Hughes, for petitioner and respondent.

BURNETT, J. This is an appeal by the people of the state of California from a decree of distribution and the order denying a motion for a new trial. It is stated by appellant that these two questions are involved: "First. Were the rulings of the trial court correct in the admission of statements claimed to have been made by certain deceased persons, not shown by any independent proof to have been related by blood or marriage to Eliza Clark? Secondly. Assuming all the testimony admissible, was the same sufficient to establish relationship between petitioner and Eliza Clark?"

The distributees claimed through one Jackson Freeman, who was admitted to be the father of Alice Aiston, the petitioner for distribution. Her case rested upon the contention that her father was the brother of said Eliza Clark, deceased. It is conceded by appellant that if Jackson Freeman and Eliza Clark were brother and sister, and this fact was legally shown, then the decree must be affirmed. The objection of appellant to the admissibility of evidence is addressed particularly to the declarations of said Jackson Freeman, deceased, to the effect that said Eliza Clark was his sister. There are decisions of other jurisdictions in harmony with the contention that, before such declarations can be admitted, independent evidence of the relationship of the claimant to the testate or intestate must be introduced, but the question is set at rest in this state adversely to appellant's view by the recent decision of our Supreme Court in the case of In the Matter of the Estate of William Hartman, Deceased, 107 Pac. 105, where it is held, as stated in the syllabus, that "declarations made by the father of the contestant to her, during the lifetime of the testator, of his relationship to the testator are admissible in proof of the same without extrinsic preliminary proof of the relationship of such declarant to the testator and such declarations do not derive their evidentiary value or competency from their being admissions against the interest of the party making them, but from reasons of necessity, and the probability of their trustworthiness." In reviewing the authorities upon the subject it is said: "On the other hand, however, it seems absurd to require, as a foundation for the admission of the declaration, proof of the very fact which the declaration is offered to establish. The preliminary proof would render the main evidence unnecessary. There are statements in the cases which seem to recognize a rule thus rigid and absurd." As pointed out in said decision, the relationship that is required to be shown before said declarations can be admitted is the relationship of the claimant to said declarant. This was covered, as we have seen, by the admission that petitioner is a daughter of said Freeman, and his declarations are therefore not those of a stranger, but of a member of the family.

It is but fair to the Attorney General to say that the appeal herein was taken before the Hartman Case was decided by the Supreme Court, and he has not attempted to refute the logic of said decision or to question its conclusiveness as an authority in the case at bar. There is no more doubt as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the conclusion of the trial court. We can do no better, perhaps, than to adopt the résumé of said evidence furnished by respondent. Among the effects of the intestate found by the administrator were several photographs, a stencil of the name "Eliza Clark," an album and some gold nuggets wrapped in a very old soiled cloth. The photographs were identified as those of the intestate and also of Eliza Clark, the sister of said Jackson Freeman. The intestate resided in Nevada county from 1860 to 1864 and so did the sister. It appears also that Freeman's sister always had a few gold nuggets in a little cloth when she visited him and had a stencil with which she marked her handkerchiefs; the stencil being similar to the one found by the administrator as aforesaid. The foregoing is sufficient to support the finding that Eliza Clark, the intestate, and Eliza Clark, the purported sister of Jackson Freeman, are one and the same person.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The relationship was shown (1) by the direct testimony of a member of Jackson Freeman's family; (2) by evidence of declarations of deceased members of the family of Alice Aiston, made during the lifetime of the intestate; (3) evidence of admissions and declarations of Eliza Clark herself. As to the first, Alice Aiston testified: "I do not think my father had any other relatives, only this sister, Eliza Clark. I knew Eliza Clark in her lifetime. She was a sister of my father. I am a niece of Eliza Clark. I have seen her on several occasions. We always called her 'Aunt Eliza Clark.'" As to declarations of members of the family, James Rowe testified that he knew Jackson Freeman and met a person at his home named Eliza Clark in 1857 and Freeman introduced her as his sister, and afterwards spoke to him about her several times. Alice Aiston testified that her father told her that Eliza Clark was his sister. There is testimony also of declarations of Jackson Freeman's wife to the same effect. As to the third point, the acquiescence of Eliza Clark when introduced on two separate occasions as the sister of Jackson Freeman is equivalent to an acknowledgment on her part of said relationship, and petitioner testified that the same person represented by the photographs spoke to her concerning this relationship and told her that she was her niece; that she, the said Eliza Clark, was a sister of her, Alice Aiston's, father; that she called her "niece" when she spoke to her, and when she wanted her told her to come to her "aunt."

It is unnecessary to discuss any other question, as the foregoing are the only points upon which appellant relies, and they furnish no reason for disturbing the judgment.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

ITALIAN SWISS COLONY v. ITALIAN VINEYARD CO. (L. A. 2,407.)

1. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES (§ 67*)—UNFAIR COMPETITION—REMEDY.

The law will protect one against the unfair competition of another who seeks by imitation of label or package or other artifice to induce persons to deal with him in the belief that they are dealing with the former.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, Cent. Dig. § 78; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

2. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES (§ 75*)—UNFAIR COMPETITION—ELEMENTS.

To justify protection against the unfair competition by imitation of label or package or other artifice to induce persons to deal with one in the belief that they are dealing with another, there must be an intent to deceive or at least the doing of things reasonably likely to deceive, and, where one puts up his product with intent to palm it off as that of another, and his act in fact tends to mislead the purchasing public, a case is made out, though the latter has shown no exclusive right in any trademark or trade-name.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, Cent. Dig. § 86; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

3. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES (§ 1*)—"TRADE-MARK."

A "trade-mark" is a form, symbol, or name appropriated by one who produces or deals in a particular thing or conducts a particular business to designate the origin or ownership thereof.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7042-7048.]

4. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES (§ 81*)—INFRINGEMENT OF TRADE-MARK — UNFAIR COMPETITION.

A manufacturer of red and white wines put them up under the name of "Tipo Chianti." The wines became known to customers as "Tipo Red" and "Tipo White," and the word "Tipo" became known to consumers as indicating a wine manufactured by him. A rival manufacturer offered his product to the public as "Tipo Barbera" and "Tipo Puglia." The bottles and labels of the two manufacturers were different except in the use of the word "Tipo," an Italian word in common use signifying type or kind. Held, that the right of the manufacturer to restrain his rival from putting up his product in the way he did depended on his right to sue for an infringement of a trade-mark, and not on his right to protection against unfair competition.

5. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES (§ 81*)—PROTECTION OF TRADE-MARK.

One who has obtained the exclusive right to a trade-mark is entitled to restrain an infringement whatever the motive or intent of the infringer, and relief is granted not on the ground of fraud, but because a right of property has been invaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, Cent. Dig. § 91; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

6. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES (§ 3*)—NATURE OF TRADE-MARKS.

The rule that words or phrases in common use and indicating the character, kind, quality, and composition of the thing may not be appropriated by any one to his exclusive use as a trade-mark is recognized in Civ. Code, § 991, prohibiting the appropriation as a trade-mark of any designation relating only to the name, quality, or description of the thing or business or the place where the thing is produced or the business is carried on.

8. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES (§ 3*)—NATURE OF TRADE-MARKS.

Though the Italian word "Tipo," meaning "type," may be capable of adoption as a trademark, the use of the word by a manufacturer of wines as a part of the phrase "Tipo Chianti" is merely descriptive, and cannot be adopted as a trade-mark.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-7; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

Angellotti, Henshaw, and Lorigan, JJ., dissenting in part.

O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin and Frederick S. Lyon, for appellant. Naphtaly & Freidenrich and Shankland & Chandler, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Appeal by defendant from an order granting a temporary injunction. The action is one to restrain the infringement of an alleged trade-mark.

The complaint avers that since December 8, 1900, the plaintiff has been engaged in the business of manufacturing wines from grapes grown in California, and of selling such wines in said state and elsewhere. Prior to 1900 the same business was conducted for more than 10 years by the Italian Swiss Agricultural Colony, to all of whose rights the plaintiff succeeded on said 8th day of December, 1900. During this period of 10 years preceding 1900, the Italian Swiss Agricultural Colony adopted and appropriated to its exclusive use, for the purpose of designating the origin and ownership of wine manufactured by it, the name of "Tipo," which had never theretofore been used by anyone in connection with the manufacture or sale of wine. During said 10 years the Italian Swiss Agricultural Colony, and since 1900, the plaintiff, as its successor, has used said name of Tipo and affixed it to packages containing wine manufactured by it, and said wine was during all said time known to the public, and to dealers and consumers, as wine manufactured by the said Italian Swiss Agricultural Colony or by the plaintiff, respectively. The registration of said trade-mark under the provisions of the act of Congress of February 20, 1905, is alleged. It is averred that the plaintiff's wines have become well and favorably known to the public and to the trade by the name of "Tipo." The defendant is engaged in business of the same character as that of plaintiff. The complaint charges that said defendant, knowing of plaintiff's appropriation of the word "Tipo" to its exclusive use as a trade-mark, and knowing that plaintiff's wines were generally known by said name, and with the intent of defrauding the plaintiff and acquiring the benefits of its reputation, did wrongfully affix upon barrels and packages of wine manufactured by it, and known as Barbera wine and Puglia wine, the word Tipo, with intent and purpose to palm off said wine for the wine of this plaintiff. The defendant threatening to continue such use of the word, the prayer of the complaint is for an injunction restraining the defendant from offering for sale or selling any wine under the name of Tipo, for an accounting of profits, and for other relief.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The application for an injunction pendente lite was heard upon this complaint, the answer of the defendant (both pleadings being verified), and certain affidavits and exhibits. The answer set up four separate defenses, but we think it will be sufficient to refer to the following denials and allegations contained in it. The defendant denies that the plaintiff or its predecessor used the word "Tipo" for the purpose of designating the origin or ownership of wine manufactured by it, and alleges that the word "Tipo" is an adjective of description, kind, and quality, and is a common word of the Italian language meaning "type" or "kind" or "having the properties or characteristics of" the thing with reference to which said word "Tipo" is used. It alleges that the word has been used by plaintiff as a descriptive term in connection with the word "Chianti," to designate that its wine was a type of the well-known Chianti wine manufactured in Italy. The defendant has been manufacturing wines having characteristics similar to those of other Italian wines, to wit, those known as "Barbera", "Puglia," and "Gragnano"—and has branded and marked them, as "Tipo Barbera," "Tipo Puglia," and 'Tipo Gragnano," in order to indicate that its said wines were, respectively, of the type of the said Italian wines.

An affidavit offered by defendant supported the averments of the answer to the effect that "Tipo" is an Italian word in common use signifying type or kind, and that, when used in connection with the name of a certain kind of wine, such as, for example, "Barbera," it signifies wine of the general characteristics or qualities of such kind of wine. In this regard there was no conflict in the evidence, the affidavits on behalf of plaintiff going no further than to allege that its wines, red and white, put up under the name of Tipo Chianti, had become known to customers as "Tipo Red" and "Tipo White," and that the word "Tipo" had become known to customers and consumers as indicating a wine manufactured by the Italian Swiss Colony. The exhibits, consisting of bottles of the wines manufactured and sold by the plaintiff and the defendant, respectively, have been brought here on this appeal. They bear out defendant's averments that plaintiff was putting up its wines under the name of "Tipo Chianti," and that defendant's product was offered to the public as "Tipo Barbera" and "Tipo Puglia." An inspection of the exhibits shows, further, the most marked differences of appearance between the respective packages and labels. The bottle of plaintiff is distinctive in shape and style. It is bulbous in form, tapering to a narrow neck. Its lower half is encased in a hemp or straw jacket. The defendant's packages are in the form of the ordinary straight-sided claret bottle. The respective labels are totally different in size, shape, color, and device. The sole point of resemblance between the two is in the use of the word "Tipo."

That the law will afford protection against the "unfair competition" of one who seeks, by imitation of label or package or by other artifice, to induce persons to deal with him in the belief that they are dealing with another, is, of course, well settled. Pierce v. Guittard, 68 Cal. 68, 8 Pac. 645, 58 Am. Rep. 1; Weinstock, Lubin & Co. v. Marks, 109 Cal. 529, 42 Pac. 142, 30 L. R. A. 182, 50 Am. St. Rep. 57; Dodge S. Co. v. Dodge, 145 Cal. 380, 78 Pac. 879; Banzhaf v. Chase, 150 Cal. 180, 88 Pac. 704. All of these cases rest upon the basis of fraud. There must be the intent to deceive, or, at least, the doing of things reasonably likely to deceive. 12 Ency. of Ev. 650; Lawrence Mfg. Co. v. Tenn. Mfg. Co., 138 U. S. 537, 11 Sup. Ct. 396, 34 L. Ed. 997; Deering Harv. Co. v. Whitman Co., 91 Fed. 376, 33 C. C. A. 558. If the defendant can be shown to have put up his product with intent to palm it off as that of plaintiff, and if it does in fact tend to mislead the purchasing public, a case is made out, even though the plaintiff has shown no exclusive right in any trade-mark or trade-name.

But a technical trade-mark stands upon an entirely different ground. A trade-mark is a form, symbol, or name appropriated by one who produces or deals in a particular thing, or conducts a particular business, to designate the origin or ownership thereof. Civ. Code, § 991. If a plaintiff has obtained the exclusive right to such trade-mark, he is entitled to restrain an infringement, whatever the motive or intent of the infringer. 12

Ency. Ev. 638. In such cases the relief is granted, not on the ground of fraud, but because a right of property—i. e., plaintiff's exclusive right to the use of his trade-mark—has been invaded. It is clear on the facts shown by the record before us that this case must stand as one for the infringement of a trade-mark, and that the injunction cannot be supported as one directed against unfair competition. There is no attempt to allege, or to show, any simulation of plaintiff's goods with the intent or effect of deceiving the public, unless such intent and effect can be found in the use of the word "Tipo." And this word is used in a manner which absolutely disproves the existence of any fraudulent scheme to represent defendant's goods as those of plaintiff. The injunction does not purport to merely limit the use of the word "Tipo" to such extent as may be necessary to prevent deception, as it should in a case of unfair competition (Dodge S. Co. v. Dodge, supra), but absolutely prohibits the defendant from using the word at all. This order (which follows the prayer of the complaint) can be supported only upon the ground that plaintiff has the exclusive right to use the word "Tipo" in any manner as a name for wines. And such exclusive right can exist only if the word is a valid technical trade-mark.

As we have pointed out, the showing made on the hearing established beyond question that the word "Tipo" is an Italian word in common use, and that it signifies "type" or "kind." If it were a term of the English language, it would, as is at once apparent, not be available for appropriation as a trade-mark in the connection in which it was used by plaintiff and its predecessor. "There is no principle more firmly settled in the law of trade-marks than that words or phrases which have been in common use, and which indicate the character, kind, quality, and composition of the thing, may not be appropriated by any one to his exclusive use." Caswell v. Davis, 58 N. Y. 223, 17 Am. Rep. 233; Amoskeag Mfg. Co. v. Spear, 2 Sandf. (N. Y.) 599; Col. Mill Co. v. Alcorn, 150 U. S. 460, 14 Sup. Ct. 151, 37 L. Ed. 1144; Falkinburg v. Lucy, 35 Cal. 52, 95 Am. Dec. 76; Choynski v. Cohen, 39 Cal. 501, 2 Am. Rep. 476; Schmidt v. Brieg, 100 Cal. 672, 35 Pac. 623, 22 L. R. A. 790; Spieker v. Lash, 102 Cal. 38, 36 Pac. 362. This rule, fundamental in the law of trade-marks, finds statutory recognition in section 991 of the Civil Code, which prohibits the appropriation as a trade-mark of "any designation, or part of a designation, which relates only to the name, quality, or the description of the thing or business, or the place where the thing is produced, or the business is carried on." That such expressions as "Chianti Type," or "Barbera Type," or the like, would be descriptive of kinds of wine, is obvious.

Is the case taken out of the general rule by the fact that the descriptive term used is adopted from a foreign language? The authorities, virtually without conflict, answer this question in the negative. In Re Farbenfabriken's Trade-Mark, 63 L. J. Ch. 257, it was held by the English Court of Appeals that the word "Somatose," composed of the Greek word "Soma" and the suffix "tose," was not entitled to registration under a statute authorizing the registration as a trade-mark of "a word or words having no reference to the character or quality of the goods." So as to the word "Monobrut," a combination of foreign words applied to champagne, and found by the court to be descriptive. In re Vignier's Trade-Mark "Monobrut," 61 L. J. N. S. 495. In Davis v. Stribolt, 59 L. T., N. S., 854, the Norwegian term Bokol, meaning the same as the German "Bock Bier," was first used by the plaintiffs in England. It was held, however, that they could gain no exclusive right to the use of such a descriptive mark. In Eastman P. M. Co. v. Comptroller-General, 79 L. T., N. S., 195, the House of Lords overruled the Farbenfabriken Case on a point of statutory construction not here involved, but the Lord Chancellor took occasion to express the view that "where any English word would be rejected as not entitled to registration, no person ought to be permitted to register its translation into any other language." In our own court a similar view was expressed in Burke v. Cassin, 45 Cal. 467, 13 Am. Rep. 204. There the plaintiff sought to establish an exclusive right to use the word "Schnapps" as a trade-mark applied to gin. But it appeared that "schnapps" was a Dutch word which had been in common use in Holland, and to some extent in the United States, to designate gin. "That word, therefore," said the court, "could not be appropriated by the plaintiff as his trade-mark. Had it not been used in New York, or elsewhere in the United States, as the name of gin, prior to its adoption by the plaintiff, he still could not maintain his claim to it. Could he secure his claim to the word on the ground that it was not in use in the United States, prior to the time when he adopted it, the law for the protection of trade-marks would be shorn of most of its strength, for on the same principle other persons would be at liberty to adopt and use the word in other cities, states or countries, if at the time of its adoption by them it was not in use in such cities, states or countries." See, also, Bolander v. Peterson, 136 Ill. 215, 26 N. E. 603, 11 L. R. A. 350; Luyties v. Hollender (C. C.) 30 Fed. 632.

The respondent cites no authority questioning the rule as just stated. Indeed, it places its reliance upon the contention that defendant is guilty of "unfair competition" rather than upon infringement of trade-mark. We have already stated our reasons for holding this position to be untenable.

We are not called upon to decide, and do not undertake to decide, whether a valid trade-mark right could be based upon the use of the word "Tipo," standing alone. That term, not associated with the name of any kind of product, might perhaps be regarded as in itself meaningless, and therefore capable of adoption as a fancy name or symbol. The person first using it might be in a position to restrain a similarly restricted use by others. But, while the allegations of the complaint indicate such adoption and use, the evidence, and more particularly the exhibits, show clearly that the word was used by plaintiff as part of the phrase "Tipo Chianti." So used it was unquestionably descriptive.

Upon the whole case, we see no ground upon which an injunction can be sustained. The order appealed from is reversed.

ANGELLOTTI, J. I dissent. While I agree with Justice SLOSS to the effect that the word "Tipo" is not such a word as is available for appropriation by plaintiff as a trade-mark in the connection in which it is used, I am of the opinion that a sufficient showing was made to warrant the lower court in concluding that the case was within the rule against unfair competition, as declared in such cases as Pierce v. Guittard, 68 Cal. 68, 8 Pac. 645, 58 Am. Rep. 1; Weinstock, Lubin & Co. v. Marks, 109 Cal. 529, 42 Pac. 142, 30 L. R. A. 182, 50 Am. St. Rep. 57; Dodge S. Co. v. Action by Arthur M. Flood against the E. L. Goldstein Company and others. From an order dissolving a temporary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Knight & Heggerty, H. M. Owens, and Frank J. Hennessy, for appellant. Manson & Ackerman, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order dissolving a preliminary injunction. The order was made upon the complaint and affidavits filed in behalf of the defendants and counteraffidavits filed on behalf of the plaintiff. In the consideration of an appeal from an order made upon affidavits, "if there is any conflict in the affidavits, those in favor of the prevailing party must be taken as true, and the facts stated therein must be considered as established." Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 19, 91 Pac. 1002, and cases there cited.

The restraining order enjoined the defendants from wrecking and removing the building upon a certain lot described, and from excavating and removing the soil under and around the building and from removing the plaintiff's implements and furniture from the building. The lot belonged to the E. L. Goldstein Company. The defendant H. H. Yard was the lessee thereof under a lease extending to May 31, 1907. Plaintiff on July 7, 1906, became a subtenant of Yard of one room in the building, under an agreement which he claimed was a lease of that room from that date to May 31, 1907, at a rental of $50 per month, payable in advance on the 1st day of each month, and which Yard claimed created a tenancy from month to month only. Arrangements were made in September, 1906, by the Goldstein Company with other defendants, in pursuance of which it was proposed to cancel the lease to defendant Yard, remove the building from the lot, and erect a large hotel building thereon. Notice was given by Yard to the plaintiff on September 14, 1906, that from and after October 1, 1906, the rental of the room he occupied would be $1,000 per month. On October 1st, the plaintiff having refused to pay the increased rent, Yard served upon him a notice to quit and deliver up the possession of the room within three days. Plaintiff refused to yield possession. Thereafter, about November 1, 1906, the Goldstein Company began preparations for the erection of a new building and for the destruction and removal of the old building. Excavation was begun for the basement of the new building and continued until the ground was excavated in front of the old building to a depth of six to eight feet below the street level. About November 17th the destruction of the old building was commenced. The water pipes and gas pipes were disconnected, possession was taken of the entire building, the floors of nearly all the rooms were taken up, and the attic story of the house and a large part of the roof, and all the doors in the house were removed. The greater part of this destruction took place on November 18, 1906, and on that day all of the property of the plaintiff was removed from the room formerly occupied by plaintiff, the agents of said company took possession of that room, and took up and removed the floor and windows, leaving it obviously uninhabitable, and completely ousting the plaintiff from possession. The following day, November 19th, the plaintiff began the action for an injunction and obtained the aforesaid preliminary restraining order without notice to the defendants.

The issuance of a preliminary injunction and the dissolution thereof on motion are matters resting in the sound discretion of the superior court having jurisdiction of the action. Bigelow v. Los Angeles, 85 Cal. 618, 24 Pac. 778; Patterson v. Supervisors, 50 Cal. 344. "As a general rule courts of equity will not interfere by preliminary injunctions to change the possession of real property, the title being in dispute." San Antonio W. Co. v. Bodenhamer, 133 Cal. 251, 65 Pac. 472; Richter v. Kabat, 114 Mich. 579, 72 N. W. 600. In Delger v. Johnson, 44 Cal. 184, the plaintiff sued to obtain an injunction to prevent a threatened waste, consisting of the opening of a public street through his property. A preliminary injunction was held to have been properly dissolved upon a showing that the opening of the street had been fully completed one day before the order of injunction was made. "No court can, by a preliminary ex parte order or process, turn even a wrongdoer out of possession." People v. Simonson, 10 Mich. 337; Tawas v. Iosco, C. J., 44 Mich. 482, 7 N. W. 65; Toledo, etc., Co. v. Detroit, etc., Co., 61 Mich. 11, 27 N. W. 715. See, also, Felton v. Justice, 51 Cal. 529; Raffetto v. Fiori, 50 Cal. 363; Williams v. Long, 129 Cal. 229, 61 Pac. 1087; Gardner v. Stroever, 81 Cal. 151, 22 Pac. 483, 6 L. R. A. 90. "It is a general rule that rights already lost and wrongs already perpetrated cannot be corrected by injunction, and that the party aggrieved must seek some other remedy for redress." 16 Am. & Eng. Ency of Law, 362; Gardner v. Stroever, supra.

From these authorities it is clear that the preliminary injunction should not be used to restore the possession of the room to the plaintiff. If, under the lease he claimed to have taken, he was entitled to possession for the remainder of the alleged term, he would have the right to enjoin the destruction of the premises by a person who had wrongfully ousted him until he could regain possession in a proper action, or until his term ended. But it is plain that this right, under the circumstances here shown, could be of no substantial benefit to him. The house was completely dismantled, the roof was gone, the doors, windows, and floors removed, and access to it was rendered difficult, if not dangerous, by the excavation. The injury was done. The house, so far as its use for his purposes, that of a dental office, was concerned, was already practically destroyed. The plaintiff's term, if he had any, would run but six months longer. It does not appear that he had begun or was about to begin any suit for possession. Indeed, one of the main points made in his behalf in the present case is that the plaintiff still held partial possession, and that the injunction is maintainable to protect his possession; this point being based on the fact that the defendants did not remove the plaintiff's furniture entirely away from the lot, but placed it temporarily in a room in the basement, thus, as counsel's theory goes, leaving him partly in possession. This theory is wholly untenable. The plaintiff neither had nor claimed a right to any part of the house except the one room, and the place where his property was deposited was as entirely out of his possession and control as if it had been in a remote part of the city. With regard to the continuance of the injunction to prevent waste, or to maintain the house and the plaintiff's property in the condition it was in when the order was made, until he could establish his right in that or some other action, it is easily seen that this would assuredly not benefit him. His term would expire before he could obtain a final judgment establishing his right. In the meantime the maintenance of the property in the condition in which it was at the time the action was begun would be of no benefit to any one, it being left utterly uninhabitable, and the delay would injure the defendants, preventing them from erecting the contemplated building and depriving them of any beneficial use of the property while the litigation was in progress. The issuance of a mandatory injunction compelling the defendant to restore the plaintiff's room to a habitable condition or to give him undisturbed possession and access thereto would have been equally injurious to the defendants, and it would amount to an adjudication of the rights of the parties in advance of a trial and without a hearing. Furthermore, no such relief as this was demanded nor did the order of injunction which was vacated contain any such mandate. All these conditions were proper matters for the consideration of the trial court in the exercise of its discretion in the decision of the motion to dissolve the order. We are of the opinion that, under all the circumstances, the granting of the motion was not an abuse of discretion.

There is no merit in the point that the notice of motion to dissolve the injunction did not specify the particular defendant who proposed to present the motion. It sufficiently appears that the defendant, E. L. Goldstein Company, was the real party in interest, and that the appearance was on its behalf, if not for the others. The plaintiff appeared by counsel in response to the motion, and submitted his own affidavit in opposition thereto, without making any objection to the hearing of the motion on the ground that the notice was defective or irregular. This was a waiver of the irregularity complained of. It was also a waiver of the additional objection that the grounds of the motion were not set forth in the notice. They were clearly disclosed in the affidavits filed in support of the motion.

The order is affirmed.

VESTNER v. NORTHERN CALIFORNIA POWER CO. (Sac. 1,719.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1910.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 190*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

An experienced workman employed as a lineman in constructing a power line was ordered by the foreman in charge of the men to ascend a tree to do an act within the line of his duty. The place was not inherently dangerous. He knew that men were cutting on a neighboring tree, and could see the extent of the cutting, and knew that, if the work continued, the tree would fall and might injure him. The foreman assured him that there was no danger. Held, that under Civ. Code, § 1970, providing that an employer need not indemnify his employé for losses suffered in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business or of the negligence of another person employed in the same general business unless committed in the performance of a duty the employer owes to the employé, the master was not liable; the negligent act of the foreman in permitting the tree to be cut down being the act of a fellow servant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 466-469; Dec. Dig. § 190.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 206*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

The workman assumed the risk under the rule that, where an employment is accompanied with risks of which those who enter into it have notice, they cannot, if they are injured by exposure to such risks, recover compensation from their employer.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by Charles O. Vestner against the Northern California Power Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles L. Donohoe and Frank Freeman, for appellant. Samuel Rosenheim, H. B. M. Miller, and B. F. Geis, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant in an action for damages for personal injuries. The appeal is on the judgment roll alone. Plaintiff was employed by the defendant corporation as a lineman, and was engaged with other workmen constructing a power line from Orland to Hamilton in Glenn county. The complaint alleged that plaintiff was directed by defendant to ascend a tree for the purpose of placing certain wires therein; that he climbed the tree as directed, and while there was caught and injured by the falling of another tree which defendant negligently and carelessly cut without warning to plaintiff; that plaintiff was not familiar with the handling of wires in trees, such work being outside of his regular employment; that defendant failed to warn him of the dangers attendant upon the performance of his work, and particularly of the peril arising from the cutting of a tree near the one in which he was at work; and that by reason of defendant's negligence he was injured.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The court found, however, that plaintiff was experienced in the kind of work he was performing, and that, indeed, he was a man of varied experience in several employments. There were also findings to the effect that plaintiff was ordered to ascend the tree by defendant's field foreman Stark for the purpose of fastening a rope therein; that before he climbed it, while he was climbing it, and after he had ascended it, some of plaintiff's fellow servants were removing trees; and that said fellow servants were also under the direction of foreman Stark. There was an additional finding to the effect that before going up into the tree plaintiff had requested Stark to have the work of cutting the other tree cease, but that Stark assured plaintiff that there was no danger. There was also a finding that there would have been no danger if the chopping had ceased at the time plaintiff made his request that Stark should order the other men to discontinue the work of cutting down the tree that afterwards fell and injured plaintiff. Additionally the court found that plaintiff went into the tree to tie a rope, and that this was within the scope of his employment, and that said tree was not a place of danger to plaintiff except as it was made so by the careless and negligent act of plaintiff's fellow servants in cutting down the tree that did the damage in its fall.

At the time of the occurrence of the unfortunate accident which was the basis of this action, section 1970 of the Civil Code was as follows: "An employer is not bound to indemnify his employé for losses suffered by the latter in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business in which he is employed nor in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer in the same general business, unless the negligence causing the injury was committed in the performance of a duty the employer owes by law to the employé, or unless the employer has neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employé." Appellant maintains that under the duty enjoined by law upon respondent to provide a safe place for the prosecution of the work of its employés, the corporation was bound to insure Vestner against injury arising from the negligence of his fellow servants in cutting the tree near the one into which he was directed by the foreman to go; and that Stark, the foreman, acted as a vice principal in putting Vestner to work in a place made perilous by the operations of the other workmen.

We are unable to agree with this view of the case. Vestner, an experienced workman, was sent into a place not inherently dangerous. He knew that men were at work cutting on a neighboring tree. Of course, he knew as a matter of common experience, that, if their work was continued sufficiently, the tree would fall, and might injure him. While the foreman assured him that there was no danger, he was in a position to see the extent of the cut which the woodchoppers had made. Seeing that, and estimating the probabilities, it is clear that he took the chance of finishing the particular duty of the moment before the tree should fall. The sole question in this case is this: Was the injury caused by defendant's failure to perform a personal duty which it owed to plaintiff? Stark had control of the men engaged in the construction of the work, and it was the duty of plaintiff to obey his orders. There was no contention that he was incompetent, or that the corporation had not exercised due care in selecting and employing him as a foreman. The place which he had chosen for the plaintiff's work was, as we have said, in itself a reasonably safe one. He was negligent in permitting the other tree to be cut down so that it fell upon and injured the plaintiff, but in this he was a fellow servant of Vestner. Under the statute and authorities as they existed at the time plaintiff was injured, we can see no other conclusion. Since that time section 1970 of the Civil Code has been amended, but such amendment has no application to this case. The learned judge of the superior court filed an opinion in which he discussed some of the Californian cases upon this question, as follows: "The defendant was engaged in mining gold at Sucker Flat, county of Yuba. The plaintiff was in its employ, and was engaged in picking dirt and gravel into the defendant's ground sluice. The defendant was engaged in blasting rock on the mine. One Kegan was the foreman of all the work, and had the authority to employ and discharge hands. The plaintiff was struck by a rock thrown from a blast a distance of 300 feet. He was exposed to injury by the blast, and it was by means of Kegan's negligence that he was not notified that the blast was to be fired. It was held that the defendant was not liable. McLean v. Blue Point Gravel Co., 51 Cal. 255. That case was very much like the one at bar. In each case the foreman ought to have warned the plaintiff of the danger, and failed to do so. Another similar case is that of Daves v. S. P. Co., 98 Cal. 19, 32 Pac. 708, 35 Am. St. Rep. 133. The section foreman, who had the power to employ and discharge men, and had employed the deceased, opened a switch and ran a hand car thereon, negligently leaving the switch open. The deceased was engaged in doing something about the hand car, and was under the end thereof when a train coming up ran into the open switch, colliding with the hand car and killing the deceased. It was held that the death of deceased resulted from the negligence of a fellow servant and that the defendant was not liable; that the place provided by the defendant was a safe place to work in the first instance, and was rendered unsafe only by the negligent act of a fellow employé. So it would appear in this case, if it was the duty of the defendant to furnish the place to work, that it was reasonably safe, and was rendered dangerous only by reason of the negligence of the fellow employés of the plaintiff in the act of cutting down the tree which injured him. In the case of Donnelly v. S. F. Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 417, 49 Pac. 559, the facts were as follows: A pile had been driven too deep, and the plaintiff, with other men, was sent by the superintendent to lay a foundation for a jackscrew to raise the pile. This required the plaintiff to work under the pile driver. Plaintiff was engaged in carrying and arranging blocks upon which to place the jack. The blocks were supplied from a place 10 or 12 feet above, from which height they were thrown down to the workmen below. M. B. Stone, the superintendent, was supervising the work. Plaintiff, while stooping down to pick up a block, was struck by one thrown from above. The man above asked before he threw the block if all was clear below, and was answered in the affirmative by the superintendent and others, and the block was allowed to fall. The superintendent, when he gave his answer, was standing within a few feet of the plaintiff, and there was nothing to obstruct his view of him. The superintendent was held guilty of negligence, but the defendant company was held not to be negligent. The following language of the court is applicable to this case: 'Under the facts of the case at bar, it is quite apparent that Stone, in answering to the call of the workmen that all was clear below, was not performing on behalf of the defendant corporation any duty by law imposed upon it. The employés were engaged in a task within the scope of their employment. It cannot be successfully contended that the appliances were not suitable, the place of labor not reasonably safe for the character of the work, or the fellow employés not fairly competent and careful.'"

In none of the cases cited by the court were the facts so strongly against the contention of the plaintiff as those found in the case at bar. In those cases the persons injured did not know of the operation of the dangerous agencies near the places where they worked. Here the plaintiff knew that the chopping by his fellow workmen was in progress after he climbed the tree. By thus assuming the risk he brought himself clearly within the well-known rule so well expressed by Wharton in his work on Negligence (section 200): "Where an employment is accompanied with risks of which those who enter into it have notice, they cannot, if they are injured by exposure to such risks, recover compensation from their employer." In Nofsinger v. Goldman, 122 Cal. 617, 55 Pac. 429, this language was used: "Defendant's proposed instruction 9 was to the effect that when an employé assents to occupy a place prepared for him, and to incur the dangers to which he will be exposed thereby, if the employé have sufficient intelligence and knowledge to enable him to comprehend the risks and dangers, his assent dispenses with the performance upon the part of the employer of the duty of making the place reasonably safe. If an employé agree with his employer to undertake the performance of a specific task, either working in an unsafe place, or with unsafe and inadequate appliances, and in so contracting the employé knows and understands the danger of the situation, and knows and understands that the appliances are unsafe, and further appreciates the risks which may follow the use of such inadequate appliances, it is truly said that in these respects he has by his contract and by his assent relieved his employer from duty in these particulars. So far as the proposed instruction bears upon this proposition of law, it is unobjectionable."

In view of the fact that the law has been changed and that under the present statute perhaps there might have been a liability on defendant's part, we have carefully examined the authorities cited, and have considered the case in all of its aspects which have been presented to us. After such consideration, we are constrained to agree with the learned judge of the superior court who, after a very clear exposition of the law, summed up as follows: "At the time of the accident the employés were engaged in cutting down a few trees which happened to be in the way of the power line, and it was their duty to exercise such care in cutting them as to avoid injury to any of their number, and the injury to the plaintiff occurred by reason of the negligent manner in which his fellow employés did their work, and not by reason of any act or omission of the defendant. The foreman, Stark, was a fellow employé of the plaintiff, and not in the discharge of a personal duty which the defendant owed to the plaintiff, and the injury was due to the negligence of plaintiff's fellow employés."

From the foregoing discussion, it follows that the judgment must be sustained; and it is so ordered.

DEITER v. KISER et al.

KISER et al. v. DEITER et al. (S. F. 5,443.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 30, 1910.)

1. Attorney and Client (§ 76*)—Authority of Attorney—Termination by Death of Client.

The death of a party terminates the authority of his attorney.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 127; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

2. Attorney and Client (§ 76*)—Authority of Attorney—Termination by Death of Client.

Where plaintiff died after judgment against him, and an administrator was appointed, but there was no substitution of the administrator or application therefor, the attorney was without authority to give notice of appeal in the absence of any direction from the administrator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 127; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

3. Attorney and Client (§ 76*)—Authority of Attorney—Termination by Death of Client.

The right of an attorney to appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 941b, as added by St. 1907, c. 410, providing that, on the death of any person having a right of appeal, his attorney of record may appeal at any time before the appointment of an administrator or executor, is limited to the period prior to the appointment of a personal representative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

4. Appeal and Error (§ 412*)—Notice of Appeal—Validating Invalid Notice.

An order directing the continuance of the cause in the name of the administrator of the deceased party, does not validate a prior notice of appeal given by one without authority to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 412.*]

5. Appeal and Error (§ 429*)—Notice of Appeal—Want of Authority to Give—Estoppel.

A motion for a new trial was properly made and notices of appeal were properly given by cross-defendants other than a cross-defendant and original plaintiff, who died subsequent to the rendition of the judgment, and whose attorney gave notice of appeal. Respondents did not mislead the opposing counsel or the administratrix of the deceased party. Held, that respondents, though participating in the proceedings for new trial and accepting service of the notice of appeal without objection, were not estopped from moving for the dismissal of the appeal of the deceased party for want of authority of the attorney to give notice thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2168–2172; Dec. Dig. § 429.*]

6. Appeal and Error (§ 801*)—Motion to Dismiss—Time to Hear.

A motion to dismiss an appeal on the ground that appellant who was made a cross-defendant has no interest in the action will not be considered in advance of a hearing on the merits where the determination thereof requires an examination of the entire record and of the merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3164; Dec. Dig. § 801.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Benito County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Action by George A. Deiter against J. N. Kiser and others, who filed a cross-complaint against George A. Deiter and others. From a judgment for defendants on the cross-complaint, plaintiff and the cross-defendants appeal. Motion to dismiss the appeals of George A. Deiter granted, and the motion to dismiss the appeals of E. E. Bray and another denied.

W. M. Gardner, W. C. Kennedy, and A. D. Shaw, for appellants. Briggs & Hudner and H. W. Scott, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Motion to dismiss appeals. The complaint alleged that a deed of certain mining property was made by defendants to E. E. Bray, and deposited in escrow; that the deed was thereafter fraudulently altered at the instance of defendants, and was, after its delivery, filed for record on behalf of the grantee, who was ignorant of the alteration. The plaintiff, claiming as successor in interest of E. E. Bray, sought a reformation of the deed. The defendants answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and filed a cross-complaint by which they sought, as against Deiter, E. E. Bray, and F. W. Bray, a decree that the deed and agreement under which it was executed be declared null and void, and that the title of defendants to the property described in the deed be quieted. The court ordered the Brays brought in as parties. Judgment went in favor of defendants in accordance with their prayer. This judgment was entered on May 8, 1909. Motion for new trial was denied on November 13, 1909. On November 5, 1909, there was filed a notice of appeal from the judgment, and on November 19, 1909, a notice of appeal from the order denying a new trial. Each purported to be given in behalf of the plaintiff and the cross-defendants, and each was signed by the attorneys who had appeared for said plaintiff and cross-defendants in the action; the signatures being followed by the words "attorneys for plaintiff and cross-defendants." The respondents move to dismiss both appeals as to all parties appellant.

The motion to dismiss the appeals of Deiter, the original plaintiff, is based on the ground that the attorneys giving the notices had no authority so to do. It appears from the showing made that said plaintiff died on the 27th day of August, 1909, and that on the 17th day of September, 1909, Mabel L. Deiter was, by an order of the superior court of Santa Cruz county, appointed administratrix of his estate. Letters of administration were issued to her four days later. No substitution of the administratrix has been made in the action, and none was applied for prior to the giving of notice of the motions now before us. The notices of appeal do not appear to have been given in pursuance of any order, authority or direction from her, or in her behalf.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Upon this state of facts, it seems clear that this court is without jurisdiction to entertain the appeals purporting to have been taken by Deiter. His death terminated the authority of his attorneys to act for him. Applying this rule, it has frequently been held that, where the respondent dies after judgment, a service of notice of appeal on the attorney who has represented him is entirely ineffectual. Judson v. Love, 35 Cal. 463; Shartzer v. Love, 40 Cal. 93; Sheldon v. Dalton, 57 Cal. 19; Pedlar v. Stroud, 116 Cal. 462, 48 Pac. 371; Estate of Turner, 139 Cal. 85, 72 Pac. 718; Bell v. S. F. Sav. Union, 153 Cal. 64, 94 Pac. 225. If death of the client deprives the attorney of authority to receive service of notice of appeal, it must, of course, end his authority to give such notice.

It is true, as claimed by counsel seeking to support the appeal, that this rule has been modified by the enactment in 1907 (St. 1907, c. 410), of section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides that "in the event of the death of any person having at his death a right of appeal the attorney of record representing the decedent in the court in which the judgment was rendered may appeal therefrom at any time before the appointment of an executor or an administrator of the decedent." But the facts do not bring the case within the operation of this enactment. The right given is limited to the period prior to the appointment of a personal representative of the decedent. It is here shown that the administratrix was appointed and letters issued before the filing of either notice.

No importance is to be attached to the circumstance that on February 4, 1910, the court below denied a motion that the cause be continued in the name of the administratrix in place of the deceased plaintiff. If such order had been made, it could not have operated to validate a prior notice of appeal given by persons who were without authority to give it. We cannot assent to the proposition that the respondents by participating in the proceedings for new trial, and by accepting service of the notices of appeal, all without objection, are estopped to ask for a dismissal. The motion for new trial was properly made, and the notices of appeal properly given, by the cross-defendants other than Deiter, and the respondents were in no position to ignore either proceeding or to object to it. Futhermore, their action in no way misled the opposing counsel or the administratrix. In Moyle v. Landers, 78 Cal. 99, 20 Pac. 241, 12 Am. St. Rep. 22, the death of the respondent had been fraudulently concealed from the adverse party for the purpose of preventing an appeal. But there was nothing of the kind here. Deiter's administratrix and his attorneys were as well aware of the fact of his death as were the opposing counsel.

The motion to dismiss the appeals of the Brays is based on the ground that they have no interest in the action. The determination of this motion would require an examination of the entire record and of the merits of said appeals. We are not disposed to make such examination on a motion to dismiss presented in advance of a hearing on the merits. The motion may be renewed when the cause comes on for such hearing.

The motion to dismiss the appeals of Deiter from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial is granted.

The motion to dismiss the appeals of E. E. Bray and F. W. Bray is denied.

1. Sales (§ 240*)—Bona Fide Purchasers.

Though one buys property with notice of a latent equity in a third person, he is entitled to avail himself of the rights of his vendor, if the vendor was a bona fide holder without notice, and takes the property free from such equity.

2. Chattel Mortgages (§ 181*)—Property Subject of Mortgage—Creditors.

3. Chattel Mortgages (§ 197*)—Rights of Third Persons.

Under Civ. Code, § 2973, as added by St. 1905, c. 460, making certain chattel mortgages valid as to persons having actual notice thereof before parting with value, and section 2957, avoiding chattel mortgages as to creditors and bona fide purchasers, unless accompanied by a specified affidavit and acknowledged and recorded as required for grants of real property, a creditor who has no actual notice of a mortgage is not bound thereby and may levy thereon for his debt, unless it is made and recorded in compliance with the statute, and is upon property which section 2955 permits to be mortgaged.

4. Chattel Mortgages (§ 197*)—Rights of Third Persons.

Civ. Code, § 2973, as added by St. 1905, c. 460, making certain chattel mortgages valid as to persons with actual notice thereof, so far as applicable to creditors, applies only to subsequent creditors who have actual notice of the mortgage before parting with the consideration on which their debts were founded.

5. Chattel Mortgages (§ 14*) — Property Subject To—Furniture, Etc.

6. Chattel Mortgages (§ 14*) — Property Subject to—Effect of Amendatory Statute.

The amendment of Civ. Code, § 2955, by St. 1905, c. 40, by adding subdivision 22, so as to permit furniture and equipment usually found in a hotel to be mortgaged, did not affect subdivision 8, permitting upholstery, furniture, and household goods generally to be mortgaged.

7. Chattel Mortgages (§ 74*) — Property Partly Subject to Mortgage.

8. Execution (§ 37*)—Rights of Third Persons — Property Not Subject to Mortgage.

Company against W. A. White. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Transferred to the Supreme Court from the District Court of Appeal for the Second District. Judgment reversed.

Louis W. Myers and F. A. Stephenson, for appellant. W. R. Bacon and G. P. Adams, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This appeal was originally taken to the District Court of Appeal for the Second District. Judgment in the trial court was for the defendant and the plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll alone. The decision of the district court was vacated, and the cause transferred to the Supreme Court for reconsideration. The action was to recover damages from the defendant, as sheriff, for levying an execution upon certain personal property upon which the plaintiff held a mortgage, without paying the mortgage debt. The mortgage was executed to plaintiff by J. H. Scales and C. P. Halfhill on September 11, 1906, and was recorded on the same day. The trial court found that the property mortgaged consisted of furniture, tables, stoves, ranges, cooking utensils, and equipment contained and used in a certain restaurant, but that it was not in any manner connected with a hotel, although it was property of a kind usually found in hotels. The mortgage is set forth in the record, and the description of the property therein shows that it consists principally of tables, chairs, dishes, and other household and kitchen furniture of various kinds. The so-called judgment upon which the execution in question was issued was based on a complaint filed in the superior court on September 12, 1906, stating a cause of action in favor of James T. Cleary and against J. H. Scales and C. P. Halfhill upon a promissory note dated July 2, 1906, payable to W. R. Bacon, due 30 days after date, for $575, executed by J. H. Scales and C. P. Halfhill and assigned by Bacon to Cleary. Execution was issued to the defendant on September 12, 1906, and immediately levied upon the mortgaged property. No payment or offer to pay the mortgage debt was made. On September 13, 1906, the plaintiff served upon the defendant a demand that he either pay the amount of the mortgage debt or release the property from the levy.

The plaintiff claims that Cleary, the holder of the judgment, is bound by the mortgage, even if it was not executed as prescribed in the Civil Code, and even if the property is not of a class which, by the provisions of the code, was subject to mortgage at the time it was executed. This claim is based upon the provisions of section 2973 of the Civil Code. This section was added to the Code in 1905. St. 1905, p. 617. It reads as follows: "Mortgages of personal property, other than that mentioned in section 2955, and mortgages not made in conformity with the provisions of this article, are nevertheless valid between the parties, their heirs, legatees and personal representatives, and persons who, before parting with value, have actual notice thereof." The court found that Cleary had actual notice of the plaintiff's mortgage before he parted with value. From this it is claimed that the mortgage was valid as against him under the provisions of the aforesaid section. The contention of the respondent on this point is that Cleary is entitled to all the rights of his assignor, Bacon, and that Bacon did not have actual notice of the mortgage at the time he accepted the note and parted with the consideration thereof. Manifestly he could not have had such notice, since the note was given on July 2, 1906, and the mortgage was not executed until September 11th. It is a well-settled proposition that if one person purchase property, with notice of a latent equity in some third person, and his vendor is a bona fide holder without notice, such purchaser is entitled to avail himself of the rights of his vendor and takes the property free from the equities of the third person. This doctrine, we think, is applicable to cases like the one before us. The question thus presented is whether or not, under section 2973 aforesaid, a mortgage not made in accordance with the statute is valid as against previous creditors of the mortgagor. Section 2957 provides that mortgages on personal property are void "as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers of the property in good faith and for value," unless it is accompanied by the affidavit therein specified and is acknowledged and recorded as therein stated. Creditors are here placed in the class of persons who are protected against mortgages not made and recorded in accordance with the statute. It is also settled by the decisions that attaching creditors are classed among the persons who are protected against mortgages upon personal property which the statute does not authorize to be mortgaged. Glenn v. Arnold, 56 Cal. 631; Lemon v. Wolff, 121 Cal. 275, 53 Pac. 801. The provisions of section 2973 must be considered in connection with those of section 2957. The creditors, therefore, stand in the same category with reference to the validity of chattel mortgages as subsequent bona fide purchasers and incumbrancers. Mortgages not valid against the latter are not valid against the creditor, except under the same circumstances. It would follow, therefore, that a creditor who has no actual notice of the mortgage is not bound thereby, and may levy thereon for his debt, unless it is made and recorded in compliance with the statute and is upon property which the statute declares may be mortgaged. The result is that creditors whose debts existed prior to the execution of the mortgage are not affected by the provisions of section 2973. So far as the creditors are concerned, the provision regarding persons with actual notice can apply only to subsequent creditors who have actual notice of the mortgage before parting with the consideration upon which their debts are founded. Cleary is therefore not estopped by the provisions of section 2973.

Judgment in the court below was given for the defendant upon the theory that the property described was not subject to be mortgaged under the provisions of section 2955 of the Civil Code, as it existed at the time the mortgage was executed. St. 1905, p. 36. By that amendment three new clauses numbered 20, 21, and 22 were added to the section. So far as material here the section as amended in 1905 was as follows: "Mortgages may be made upon the following personal property and none other: * * * (8) Upholstery, furniture and household goods. * * * (22) The bedroom furniture, carpets, tables, stoves, ranges, cooking utensils, and all furniture and equipment usually found in a hotel." The court below was evidently of the opinion that clause 22 of the section was the only clause applicable to the case, and that as the property was contained and used in a restaurant, and was not in any manner connected with a hotel, it was not of a character which the statute allowed to be mortgaged. In Blaisdell v. McDowell, 91 Cal. 287, 27 Pac. 656 (25 Am. St. Rep. 178), the court referring to this section said: "The section of the Code in question should have a reasonable construction, with a view of executing the evident design of the Legislature in enacting it. While the language used should not be strained to include cases not clearly embraced by it, the meaning to be given to it should not be so narrowly circumscribed as to exclude cases clearly within it." Inasmuch as the amendment of 1905, re-enacted subdivision 8, without change, it could not reasonably be supposed that the Legislature intended that subdivision 22 should entirely supersede subdivision 8. As the section stood prior to that amendment, the right to mortgage upholstery, furniture, and household goods, under subdivision 8, was without qualification or limitation. A mortgage upon property of that description would be valid, if properly executed and recorded, as well where the property was stored in a warehouse or not devoted to any use, as where it was in actual use in a dwelling, lodging house, or hotel. We are of the opinion that no change was intended to be made in this particular, and that notwithstanding the addition of subdivision 22 property of the kind specified in subdivision 8 could be mortgaged under the amendment of 1905, regardless of its situation or its use, to the same extent as before that amendment was made. The purpose to be served by subdivision 22 was not to supersede subdivision 8, but to favor the hotel business by allowing the equipment of a hotel to be mortgaged as chattels, although not embraced in the classes described in subdivision 8. Its purpose was to extend the right so as to include other property, rather than to take away the right previously existing. This is shown by clauses 20 and 21 which allowed mortgages of chattels used in apiaries and oil refineries, a right not previously given. It is also well illustrated by the present case. The mortgaged property here consisted of a large number of articles of property which, as above stated, consisted principally of household goods, such as tables, chairs, and dishes. They were used in a restaurant, and in connection therewith were a number of other articles, constituting a part of the equipment of the restaurant. All of these articles were described as part of the property mortgaged. Among them were gas fixtures, moldings on the wall, an awning, some shelving in the pantry and kitchen, a large boiler and smokestack, and certain plumbing fixtures. These articles, if used in a hotel, would form a part of its equipment, and, if so, they could be mortgaged under subdivision 22, although some of them are clearly not furniture or household goods, and could not be mortgaged under subdivision 8. The fact that this mortgage included some articles which were not subject to be mortgaged in connection with other articles which the statute allows to be mortgaged does not make the mortgage invalid as to those which come within the statute. In re Fischer, 94 Cal. 523, 29 Pac. 961; San Francisco Breweries v. Schurtz, 104 Cal. 426, 38 Pac. 92. The effect of these rules is that the mortgage was good with respect to property included therein which the statute allows to be mortgaged, and that an execution creditor would be at liberty to levy upon the property described therein which did not come within the provisions of the statute, without paying or tendering the amount of the mortgage debt, but that he could not levy upon that part of the property lawfully mortgaged, except on condition that he paid the debt.

It is contended on behalf of the defendant that, as the property at the time of the levy was in possession of Scales and Halfhill, the defendants in the execution, he could justify under his writ by producing the writ alone, without establishing the existence of the judgment upon which it was founded. That this is the general rule cannot be disputed. The rule does not apply, however, when the officer executing the writ is infringing upon the rights of third persons in the property. Usually this exception to the rule consists of cases where the levy is made when the property is in the possession of a third person claiming title. But, in view of the principles upon which the exception is founded, we think it must apply also to any case in which third persons have an interest in the property levied upon which will be affected or destroyed by the levy. In Knox v. Marshall, 19 Cal. 622, it was held that the pledgee of the property was a third person within the exception, and that an officer levying upon such property could not justify without proving the existence of a judgment to support the writ. In Bickerstaff v. Doub, 19 Cal. 112, 79 Am. Dec. 204, the same principle was applied to a purchaser in possession who had not paid the price under a contract of purchase which provided that the title should remain in the vendor until the price was paid. The leading case on the subject in this state is Thornburgh v. Hand, 7 Cal. 562. In that case, referring to a levy upon property which had been sold to a third person, the court quotes the following from Noble v. Holmes, 5 Hill (N. Y.) 195: "The sale could not be impeached by a creditor at large. It must be a creditor having a judgment and execution, or some other process which authorized a seizure of the goods. As a general rule, process regular on its face is sufficient for the protection of the officer, although it may have been issued without authority. But when the officer attempts to overthrow a sale by the debtor, on the ground of fraud, he must go back of his process, and show authority for issuing it. If he act under an execution, he must show a judgment." And upon rehearing the court added: "It requires something more than a mere indebtedness between the parties to justify the taking of property from the possession of a third person. A mere creditor cannot, as before remarked, impeach the sale until he shows that he has a judgment or a lien. Neither can the officer who represents him do so. The debt of itself gives no right to seize the property, but the attachment, and it is essential for its validity that it should have been issued in conformity with the law. If the officer seizes the property of the debtor, and the writ be regular on its face, it is a sufficient justification to him; for the defendant may, if the attachment has been improvidently issued, move to have it quashed, or bring a suit upon the undertaking, but a third party, a stranger to the record, could not interfere, and therefore it would seem but justice that before any right could be established against him, by reason of a proceeding to which he was not a party that its regularity should be shown." This is based on substantially the same considerations of sound policy as the well-settled principle that a creditor who desires to impeach a transaction between the debtor and a third person, and take property of the debtor to satisfy his own debt to the prejudice of such third person, must show either that he has a lien upon the property, or that he has a judgment and execution and a return of nulla bona, or a levy upon the property itself. Castle v. Bader, 23 Cal. 75; Massey v. Gorton, 12 Minn. 145 (Gil. 83) 90 Am. Dec. 288, note. It is also in line with the proposition that the rule allowing an officer to justify by the production of the writ alone is one which operates solely for his protection, and that it cannot be used by him as a weapon of attack. Dunlap v. Hunting, 2 Denio (N. Y.) 643, 43 Am. Dec. 763; Earl v. Camp, 16 Wend. (N. Y.) 566; Horton v. Hendershot, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 119; 1 Freeman on Executions, § 101. From these doctrines, we think it necessarily follows that when the officer is attempting to make a levy upon mortgaged property, and intends to so far disregard the rights of the mortgagee as to undertake to levy upon the property without performing the statutory duty of making a previous payment of the mortgage debt, he is to that extent using his writ for the purpose of attack and not of defense, and that, when he seeks to justify under the writ and disregard the mortgagee's claims, he must support his execution by proving that it is founded upon a judgment.

In the case at bar the defendant failed to show the existence of any judgment. According to the findings, the complaint of Cleary against Scales and Halfhill was filed on September 12, 1906, and on the same day the defendants, Scales and Halfhill, signed and delivered to Cleary, and Cleary filed with the clerk, a document entitled in the cause, in which they admitted all the allegations of the complaint, entered their appearance to the action, consented and requested that the clerk should enter a judgment against them for the amount demanded in the complaint, and waived the right to answer. The finding is that this document was filed and recorded by the county clerk in the "judgment docket" of the records of his office, and that no other judgment was ever entered in the cause. The law requires that judgments be entered in the judgment book (Code Civ. Proc. § 668). Thereupon the judgment roll must be made up as provided in section 670, Code Civ. Proc., and immediately after filing such roll the clerk makes the proper entries of the judgment in the "docket kept by him" (section 671). This docket is described in section 672 (Code Civ. Proc.), as a book divided into columns in one of which under the head of "Judgment" the amount must be stated, if it is a money judgment; if not, "a memorandum of the general character of the relief granted" must be stated therein. This "docket" is not the book in which judgments are to be entered. Even if it were, the paper said to be recorded therein was not a judgment. The recording in this "docket" of a document, signed by the defendants, declaring their consent to the entry of a judgment, could not constitute a judgment, and, as no other judgment was entered in the cause, we must conclude that no judgment existed. The proceeding there attempted to be followed was that provided in section 997 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under that section, the defendant at any time before trial may serve upon the plaintiff an offer to allow judgment to be taken against him for a specified sum. If the plaintiff accepts this offer, he may file the same and the clerk "must thereupon enter judgment accordingly." The rule as settled by the decisions in this state, with respect to such judgments, is that the clerk in entering them acts in a ministerial capacity only, and that he must follow closely the forms provided by law for the exercise of the power conferred upon him, otherwise his acts will be invalid. In Crane v. Hirshfelder, 17 Cal. 585, in considering this section, the court says: "The clerk has no general jurisdiction or power to render, or of his own motion, and as his act, to enter, judgments; and when in a few exceptional cases the statute confers a power of this sort, as he looks to the statute for the source of his authority, so he must pursue, at least substantially, the directions of the statute, in order to impart validity to his acts." In Kelly v. Van Austin, 17 Cal. 565, speaking of the power of a clerk to enter a judgment by default, the court says: "The clerk in entering judgments by default acts in a mere ministerial capacity. He exercises no judicial functions. The statute authorizes the judgment, and the clerk is only an agent by whom it is written out and placed upon the records of the court. He must, therefore, conform strictly to the provisions of the statute, or his proceedings will be without any binding force." See, also, Stearns v. Aguirre, 7 Cal. 449; Long v. Serrano, 55 Cal. 21; County of Sacramento v. C. P. R. R. Co., 61 Cal. 255. By the strict rules here required to be followed it is obvious that there is no judgment under section 997 if the clerk does not enter any judgment, but merely records in the judgment docket, in a place where the statute does not provide for the entry of judgments, a document signed by the parties to the action and consenting that a judgment may be entered.

As the judgment is to be reversed and a new trial may show different facts, it is proper to consider here the alleged defect in the affidavit of the parties to the mortgage. On behalf of the plaintiff the affidavit was made by J. F. Reynolds, its secretary. A corporation cannot take an oath. When an affidavit is required of a corporation, and no particular officer is designated in the statute as the person who shall make it, it may be made by any one of its officers or agents in its behalf. The affidavit of Reynolds, Scales and Halfhill was as follows: "J. H. Scales and C. P. Halfhill, mortgagors in the foregoing mortgage named, and J. F. Reynolds, secretary of Old Settlers' Investment Company, a corporation, the mortgagee in said mortgage named, each being duly sworn, each for himself doth depose and say that the aforesaid mortgage is made in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor or creditors." It was duly signed and sworn to. The criticism is that Reynolds does not make oath to the fact that he was then the secretary of the corporation, but merely recites the fact in the preliminary statement which does not purport to have been made under oath. The statute makes no provision as to who shall make the affidavit when a corporation is a party to a chattel mortgage, and it does not require the person who makes it for the corporation to declare on oath his official position or relation. We think it is clearly sufficient if he declares it in the introductory statement describing the persons who make the affidavit. On the principle contended for by the defendant, it would be necessary for Scales and Halfhill to declare on oath that they are the mortgagors. True, the identity of names raises a disputable presumption to that effect, but it is mere evidence not having the sanction of an oath. The declaration, signed by Reynolds, that he is the secretary of the corporation mortgagee, is a similar decree of proof, and is sufficient to satisfy the law in this particular. See Modesto Bank v. Owens, 121 Cal. 226, 53 Pac. 552; Yost v. Bank, 94 Cal. 496, 29 Pac. 858.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that, if the defendant had been acting under a valid execution, he could not have lawfully levied upon all the property without previous payment of the mortgage debt, and that he was acting without authority in making the levy upon an execution not supported by any judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

(S. F. 5,258.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1041*)—Harmless Error—Erroneous Allowance of Amendments to Pleadings.

Where, in a suit involving the right to the water of a lake, the answer to the cross-complaint, setting up an exclusive ownership and right to the water, admitted the cross-complaint only so far as it was not inconsistent with the affirmative allegations of the answer that plaintiff had a right to and an interest in the water as an appropriator, and plaintiff claimed only as such appropriator, the error, if any, in allowing plaintiff to amend the answer by denying specifically the allegation of the cross-complaint, was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4106–4109; Dec. Dig. § 1041.*]

2. Evidence (§ 506*)—Opinion Evidence—Admissibility.

The question whether in the opinion of an expert a body of water is a lake is objectionable as calling for testimony on a matter not properly the subject of expert testimony, where the conditions observed by the expert are fully described, so that the jury, on proper instructions, may determine the fact.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 142*)—APPROPRIATION — NONCOMPLIANCE WITH STATUTES.

Actual appropriation of water without compliance with the Code gives to the appropriator a right as against any one who did not have at the time of his diversion a superior right, and, though it cannot devest prior rights, it is good as against a subsequent appropriator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 152; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 139*)—APPROPRIATION—COMPLIANCE WITH STATUTES.

Compliance with the Code as to the appropriation of water are important only in so far as the appropriator seeks to have his right relate back to the date of the posting of the notice of appropriation, as authorized by Civ. Code, § 1418, providing that by a compliance with the Code the appropriator's right to the water relates back to the time of the posting of the notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 127*)—APPROPRIATION—COMPLIANCE WITH STATUTES.

Compliance with the Code by an appropriator of water cuts off rights accruing between the date of the posting of notice of appropriation and the actual diversion for beneficial purposes; but, where no such rights have intervened, an actual appropriation may be made without following the Code.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 152*)—RIGHTS OF APPROPRIATORS—ISSUES.

Where, in a suit involving the right to the water of a lake, defendant alleged the diversion of 40 inches through a 15-inch pipe for the irrigation of lands and for an emergency supply, an amended pleading, alleging that it had connected the pipe with a reservoir connected with its system of pipes supplying a city for the purpose of appropriating the water for a reserve for emergency uses, did not show that it had a right to anything in excess of the 40 inches.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 152.*]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 158½*)—ISSUES—FINDINGS.

Where, in a suit involving the right to the water of a lake, defendant, a corporation, alleged a conveyance by the former owner of plaintiff's land of riparian and water rights to third persons who conveyed such rights to defendant, it was entitled to a finding on the issue whether the third persons had conveyed such water rights to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 158½.*]

8. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 156*)—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—CONVEYANCES.

A conveyance by an owner of land of his riparian and water rights and privileges belonging to the land, except necessary water for domestic purposes, transfers to the grantee not only riparian rights, but all water rights which belong to the land, except the rights reserved, and transfers the right of the grantor to apply the waters to his land, except for the reserved uses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 156.*]

9. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 156*)—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—CONVEYANCES.

Where an owner of land conveyed his riparian and water rights and privileges belonging to the land, except necessary water for domestic uses, and subsequently conveyed the land to a third person, the latter was estopped from asserting any right in conflict with the right of the grantees of the riparian and water rights, and the fact that the third person based a claim to water on an appropriation made subsequent to the deed was immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 156.*]

10. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 142*)—APPROPRIATION—RIGHTS ACQUIRED.

An appropriation of water under the statute gives the appropriator a right superior to that of any subsequent appropriator on the same stream; but he does not acquire a right as against existing rights in the water.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by S. J. Duckworth and another, substituted for Flora McKinley Duckworth, against the Watsonville Water & Light Company and others. From a judgment granting relief to both parties, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Charles A. Shurtleff and H. C. Wyckoff, for appellants. Netherton & Torchiana, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The first trial of this action, which involves the rights of the parties to the waters of Pinto Lake, in Santa Cruz county, resulted in a judgment declaring that the plaintiffs had a prior right to take as much water as they could benefically use upon their land, not exceeding a continuous flow of 250 miners' inches. Upon an appeal to this court, the judgment was reversed for reasons stated in an opinion reported in 150 Cal. 520, 89 Pac. 338. The facts giving rise to the controversy, and the relative situations of the parties and their property, are set forth in that opinion, and need not be restated here. Upon a second trial, the superior court gave judgment declaring that the Watsonville Water & Light Company has the right, as riparian owner, to divert and apply on its land riparian to said lake 10 miners' inches of water; that it has the right, by virtue of appropriation, to divert 40 miners' inches for a beneficial purpose or use; and that, subject to these rights of the said water and light company, the plaintiff S. J. Duckworth has the right to divert 142 miners' inches of water from Pinto Lake for beneficial purposes. Each of the said parties is enjoined from interfering with the rights of the other as above defined. The defendants now appeal from this judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

A preliminary question should be disposed of before proceeding to a consideration of the merits. In its cross-complaint, the Watsonville Water & Light Company alleged that it was the owner and entitled to the exclusive use of all the waters contained and flowing in Pinto Lake. The plaintiff answered this allegation in a form that was declared by this court, on the former appeal, to be, to a certain extent, evasive. The appellants now complain of the action of the court below in making an ex parte order, after the reversal of the first judgment by this court, permitting the plaintiffs to amend their answer to the cross-complaint by denying specifically the aforesaid allegation. It is unnecessary to consider whether this order was erroneous. The amendment made no material change in the issues. Under the original answer, the allegation that the cross-complainant owned all the water of the lake was, as is pointed out in the former opinion, admitted only in so far as such allegation was not "inconsistent with the affirmative allegations of the answer." See 150 Cal. 530, 89 Pac. 343. One of these allegations was that plaintiff S. J. Duckworth "has a right to and an interest in said waters * * * as an appropriator." He claims here only as such appropriator, and the order permitting him to amend was, therefore, if error, harmless.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The appellants attack the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a finding "that Pinto Lake, its tributaries and outlet, is part of a running stream." This finding followed the verdict of an advisory jury to which certain special issues had been submitted. A similar finding had been made at the first trial. Upon the former appeal we said, in answer to an objection like the one now made, that we could not "agree with the appellant in his contention that the finding that the lake, or its tributaries, constituted a running stream, is not sustained by the evidence." The showing in support of the finding contained in the present record is quite as strong as that before this court on the earlier appeal. Without giving to the view heretofore expressed by us binding force as the "law of the case" (see Allen v. Bryant, 155 Cal. 256, 100 Pac. 704, and cases cited), we are, after reconsideration, satisfied with that view, and shall apply it to the present appeal.

In disposing of this point, it may be well to advert to the alleged error of the trial court in declining to permit appellants' witnesses to state whether, in their opinions, "Pinto Lake is a lake." We think that the objection that the question called for expert testimony on a matter not properly the subject of expert testimony was well taken. The facts and conditions observed by the witnesses had been fully described. Whether the subject of their observation and testimony constituted a water course or a body of standing water was a question which could be answered by any one who was properly informed regarding the definitions of the respective terms. The distinction between a stream and a lake was, presumably, correctly declared to the jury as matter of law. The ultimate question whether or not there was a running stream was to be answered by the jury, acting under proper instructions, or by the court itself.

The court found that the Watsonville Water & Light Company is the riparian owner of a strip of land bordering the lake; that 5½ acres of said land is capable of cultivation; and that not more than 10 inches of water could be used for the irrigation of this land. It found, further, that since 1901 the said company has diverted 40 inches of water from Pinto Lake, and that this water has been sold by the company and applied to lands nonriparian to Pinto Lake. The plaintiff S. J. Duckworth has succeeded to the interest of his wife, Flora McKinley Duckworth, who was originally joined with him as plaintiff. It is found that, prior to the commencement of the action, said S. J. Duckworth posted on the bank of the lake a notice of appropriation, giving notice that he proposed to appropriate 250 inches of water from said lake. The recording of the notice and the commencement and prosecution of the necessary work are found. There is a finding that plaintiff has actually appropriated and diverted from the lake 142 inches of water, and applied it to the beneficial purpose of irrigating a portion of his land, and that this diversion has not materially increased the cost to the water and light company of taking water from the lake.

If these findings stood alone, and if all of them were sustained by the evidence, the judgment establishing the rights of the parties as hereinabove stated would appear to be free from objection. The appellants question the sufficiency of the evidence to support some of these findings. It is claimed, in the first place, that there is no evidence that the plaintiff's notice of appropriation was ever recorded. This claim appears to be well founded. An examination of the bill of exceptions fails to disclose any showing on this point. A further attack on the sufficiency of plaintiff's appropriation is that the notice designated a 6-inch pipe as the means of diversion; whereas, the diversion was in fact made through a 12-inch pipe. On the former appeal the question whether the use of a larger conduit than the one specified would vitiate a notice of appropriation was expressly left open for the reason that it was not presented by the record. We do not think a decision of this question is required by the state of the case as it now appears. Let us assume that no rights can be founded on the notice, whether for want of recording or for failure to state correctly the size of the pipe through which water was to be diverted. Civ. Code, § 1415. The plaintiff did, however, actually divert and apply to a beneficial use 142 inches of water, as is found by the court on sufficient evidence. Such actual appropriation, without compliance with the Code provisions, is enough to give him a right as against any one who did not have, at the time of the diversion, a superior right. It cannot divest prior rights, but it will be good as against a subsequent appropriator. Wells v. Mantes, 99 Cal. 583, 34 Pac. 324; Watterson v. Saldunbehere, 101 Cal. 107, 35 Pac. 432. Compliance with the sections of the Code relative to appropriation are important only in so far as the claimant seeks to have his right relate back to the date of posting. Civ. Code, § 1418. Such compliance will cut off rights accruing between the date of posting and the actual diversion for beneficial purposes. If no such rights have intervened, the actual appropriation may be made without following the provisions of the Code. De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. 563, 22 Pac. 198; Burrows v. Burrows, 82 Cal. 564, 23 Pac. 146; Wells v. Mantes, supra. In the case at bar the prior rights of the water company as riparian owner and senior appropriator, so far as it was found to have such rights, were fully recognized and preserved by the decree. The company claimed no right accruing between the posting of the notice and the actual diversion and use by Duckworth. The failure to follow the Code provisions is therefore immaterial.

The appellant water company claims, however, that under its prior appropriation it was entitled, not only to the 40 inches of water which it had actually diverted and applied to beneficial uses, but to a further quantity as a reserve or emergency supply for the city of Watsonville to be drawn on in case of accident to the pipe line from which said city is usually supplied. By an amendment to the answer the defendants alleged that the water company had connected the pipe leading from the lake with a reservoir connecting with its system of pipes supplying the city of Watsonville for the purpose of appropriating the waters of the lake for the furnishing a reserve for such emergency uses. We do not see that this fact in and of itself could give the company a right to anything in excess of the 40 inches. The only diversion alleged was one of 40 inches through a 15-inch pipe, and the water taken through such pipe was applied, as the answer states, to two beneficial purposes, i. e., the irrigation of lands and a reserve or emergency supply. But the total amount claimed to have been diverted for both purposes was 40 inches, and the company's prior right to take this amount is recognized by the decree.

The appellant water company claims further that it had, by virtue of certain deeds, rights which were prior and superior to any right of Duckworth to use the waters of Pinto Lake on his land except for domestic purposes and the watering of stock. The answer avers that in 1885, while Carmen Amesti De McKinley was the owner of the land now owned by plaintiff and upon which he is applying the water claimed by him as appropriator, she conveyed to the defendants Smith and Montague all and singular the water and riparian rights and water rights and privileges of every kind, character, and description, which belong or in any manner pertain to said land, save and except the necessary water for domestic and culinary purposes and the watering of stock. The court made a finding in support of this allegation. There is, however, no finding upon the further averment of the answer that in January, 1897, Smith and Montague conveyed to the Watsonville Water & Light Company all the rights so conveyed to them by Mrs. McKinley. The defendant corporation was entitled to a finding on this issue, and, if the finding was in its favor, to have the rights vested in it under said deed protected by the decree. The plaintiff claims title as successor in interest to Mrs. McKinley, and, as owner of the land, is bound by her deed to the same extent that she was. The purpose and effect of the conveyance was to transfer to the grantees whatever right the grantor had to apply the waters of Pinto Lake to the land of the grantor, except for domestic uses and irrigation of stock. The instrument conveys not only riparian rights, but all water and water rights and privileges of every kind, character, and description which belong or in any manner pertain to said land. The right, or one of the rights, now asserted by Duckworth, is to apply the waters of Pinto Lake to the irrigation of the same land. This is a right which has been transferred by his predecessor in interest to the defendant, and he is, by virtue of her deed, estopped from asserting it in antagonism to her grantees. It is of no consequence that he bases his claim upon a so-called "appropriation," made subsequent to the deed. An appropriation, under our statute, has only the effect of giving the appropriator "a right superior to that of any subsequent appropriator on the same stream. But he acquires thereby no right whatever as against rights existing in the water at the time his appropriation was begun. An appropriation does not of itself deprive any private person of his rights; it merely vests in the appropriator such rights as have not previously become vested in private ownership. * * *" Duckworth v. Watsonville, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 520, 531, 89 Pac. 338, 343. But if Duckworth, in applying waters for the benefit of his lands, were to be given priority over the use of the same waters by the Watsonville Water & Light Company, his appropriation would have the effect of taking away from said company a part of the very right which had been transferred by plaintiff's predecessor, so far as she was capable of transferring it. That grant was, of course, not effective to convey any right not owned by the grantor or owned by third parties. It was, however, effective as an estoppel on the grantor and her successors, preventing them from objecting to any use by the water company of water which might, in the absence of the deed, have been applied for the benefit of the McKinley land. That it operated as such estoppel, so far as plaintiff's riparian right is concerned, was expressly held on the former appeal, where we said that, because of said deeds, "the water company can use the water for any purpose, at any place, and in any quantity which leaves plaintiffs enough for stock and domestic purposes." It is true that in the same opinion we said that "Duckworth claims a right to a part of the water by appropriation, and with respect to the right thus claimed he has a status which entitles him to challenge the right of the water company. His privity with the McKinley deed does not estop him from making an appropriation of any water in the lake that may be subject to appropriation, nor from demanding that the water company shall not make a greater use of the water than it is authorized to do by the rights which it is shown to have, if such use interferes with an appropriative right by him." But in this passage we were speaking of the general right to appropriate water for use upon land, other than that owned by the grantor of the deeds. It was intended to declare merely that the making of the deeds did not prevent the maker or her successors from appropriating water. Whether Duckworth had any right as appropriator was not decided, nor was it decided that he could, notwithstanding the grant of all water and water rights belonging or pertaining to certain land, make an appropriation for use upon that very land, which should be good as against the grantees or their successors. For the reasons above stated, we think it must be held that he could not appropriate for that purpose. The right which he claims is the right to take water and use it upon his land. That right has been conveyed to the defendant, and the plaintiff cannot, in the face of his predecessor's deed, be permitted to revive it, or retake it by the mere device of entitling his taking an "appropriation."

If, upon another trial, it should be found that the rights conveyed to Smith and Montague are now vested in the water company, the latter is entitled to a decree declaring that it has a right, superior to any claim of plaintiff to use water on the land mentioned in the deeds, to take water from the lake in any quantity and for any purpose, provided enough is left for domestic purposes and stock on plaintiff's land. This right extends not only to the water actually heretofore taken by the water company, but to all which it may hereafter divert and apply to beneficial use.

As a new trial will be necessary, we express no opinion upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that the cost to the water company of taking water has not materially increased since the diversion of 142 inches of water by plaintiff. The issue will have to be tried again, and the evidence relating to it may differ from that now before us.

It may, perhaps, be unnecessary to add that the foregoing discussion has reference simply to the rights of the parties inter se. The right of third parties to take a part of the water of the lake, or to complain of a diversion by any of the parties to this action, is not here involved, and cannot be affected by anything here decided.

Under the views herein expressed, the further points made by appellants do not, we think, require attention.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; LORIGAN, J.

SHAW, J. I concur. There appears to have been some misapprehension by counsel concerning the passage in the opinion upon the former appeal in this case relating to the status of Duckworth as an appropriator or user of water not taken under any claim of riparian rights. Having written that opinion, I take this occasion to state more fully what I conceive to be the true doctrine on that point.

Duckworth was not, at the time of the first trial, the owner of the McKinley lands, but held a lease thereon. The notices of appropriation posted by him stated that he proposed to use the water upon other lands, as well as upon that land. This reference to other lands may have been insufficient, under the Code, as a designation of the place of intended use, and for that reason his notice of appropriation may have been void, as to use on such other lands, or in toto, as a proceeding under the statute; but it was sufficient to show that he was claiming a right to divert water for use on lands other than the McKinley lands, which might ripen into a right by prescription, and as to these other lands he would not be estopped by the McKinley deeds to Smith and Montague. Now if Duckworth was at the time actually diverting water from the lake and using it on such other lands, not riparian, and the defendant company was also diverting water therefrom for use on nonriparian land, which, for the purposes of the discussion to which the passage from the former opinion was devoted, might have been the case as between them, in such a case the law is thoroughly settled that the one first in time is first in right. With respect to these possible antagonistic claims, therefore, Duckworth had the right to show, if he could, that his diversion and use on such other lands antedated that of the defendant, or any recent enlargement of its use by the defendant. We were then considering, not the actual case, but the case as it might possibly develop under the pleadings, and it was this claim of right which was referred to in the former opinion in the expression, "with respect to the right thus claimed he has a status which entitles him to challenge the right of the water company." We did not say that he was entitled to prevail over the water company, but that he was in a position, with regard to or by virtue of the pleadings, to attack or to challenge the alleged right of the defendant, a position which made their alleged rights as users of water on nonriparian lands a material issue in the case, as presented in the pleadings. It seems from the record before the court on the present appeal that he does not now claim the right to use the water, except on the McKinley lands. This being the case, all that was said on this subject on the previous appeal is inapplicable to the present case.

Perhaps something more should be said regarding the effect of a conveyance, by the owner of riparian land, of his riparian right therein, to another for nonriparian use. The court below seems to have been of the opinion that the riparian right consisted of the ownership of a definite quantity of the water of the lake, a quantity equal only to the amount which could be beneficially used on the riparian land concerned, and that the conveyance merely transferred to the grantees that quantity from the lake, leaving the riparian grantor free to take thereafter an equal or greater quantity therefrom and use it on the identical land, provided only that he must leave enough to furnish to the grantees the definite quantity which, by this theory, was conveyed, or, if the grantees were using less, then enough to provide for their actual use from time to time. This was not the legal effect of the conveyance. The riparian right exists solely because the land abuts upon the water. It is parcel of the land. It extends to all the water which may be reached from the land, and not to any specific particles or definite quantity or area of it. It is the right to make reasonable use and consumption of the water on the adjoining land and to a reasonable use of the water, in place, in connection with and for the benefit of the land. The water cannot be severed from the land and transferred to a third person so as to give him the title and right to remove it, as against other riparian owners. The grantor alone will be estopped by such a conveyance. The estoppel against him, with respect to the use and consumption of the water, or diversion from its natural position, must be as complete and extensive as was the right he conveyed. The McKinley deeds conveyed the entire right to use this water for irrigation on these lands to the defendant's predecessors, and it now belongs to the defendant, and not to Duckworth. A man may not eat his cake and have it. A man who sells a right to do a thing cannot thereafter exercise the right himself, except by permission of the buyer, and it is immaterial that the buyer may not be using or exercising it. If the water company had obtained similar deeds from the owners of all the lands abutting upon the lake and its tributaries, it would have obtained a complete estoppel against such landowners which would have prevented them from interfering with any use it saw fit to make of the water, and such estoppel would undoubtedly extend to all the water of the lake. If, having this right of estoppel, it chose to use only a part of the water, or none of it, this neglect to use it would not give any of the owners the right to take that which the company suffered to remain unused. A judgment which purported to give such owners the unqualified right to use the water on their respective tracts, as against the company, would operate to deprive the company of the property which it had bought and paid for and to return that property to the person who sold it and received payment of the price. The same principle must apply when the estoppel has been obtained as to one, only, of the riparian owners. He is absolutely estopped to use any part of the water on the land, except as specified in the deed by which he is bound. These propositions are fully established by the following authorities: Alhambra, etc., Co. v. Mayberry, 88 Cal. 74, 25 Pac. 1101; Gould v. Stafford, 91 Cal. 155, 27 Pac. 543; Gould v. Eaton, 117 Cal. 542, 49 Pac. 577, 38 L. R. A. 181; Yocco v. Conroy, 104 Cal. 471, 38 Pac. 107; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 300, 310, 392, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674; St. Helena W. Co. v. Forbes, 62 Cal. 184, 45 Am. Rep. 659; Zimmler v. San Luis W. Co., 57 Cal. 222; Farnham on Waters, §§ 462, 463; Gould on Waters, §§ 207, 215.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1910.)

1. Quieting Title (§ 44*)—Burden of Proof—Ownership and Possession.

In a suit to set aside a deed and to quiet title, plaintiff must establish his ownership and possession of the property.

2. Pleading (§ 345*)—Judgment On—Effect of Denial of Allegations.

Where the complaint in a suit to quiet title alleged ownership and possession, and the answer denied this allegation, judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings should not have been given.

Thomas S. Ford and Ed. V. Henley, for appellants. J. M. Walling, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In the court below, upon motion of the plaintiff, judgment was entered upon the pleadings in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants with respect to the mining claim designated as the "Gold Ridge Gravel mine." Defendants appeal from this part of the judgment. The complaint asserted title to another mining claim known as the Gold Ridge Extension Gravel mine, but plaintiff afterwards disclaimed any interest therein, and judgment was given in favor of the defendants with respect to that mine. As to that part of the judgment no controversy arises; the appeal being solely from the other part thereof.

The complaint was in two counts; the first count alleging that the plaintiff was the owner of an undivided one-fourth interest in the Gold Ridge Gravel mine described therein, and that the defendants claimed and asserted an interest therein adverse to the plaintiffs, which claims of the defendants were without right. The second count averred that the plaintiff was the owner and in possession of the same interest in the same mining claim; that the defendant Pelligrini Ozalli, claiming to act under an invalid power of attorney from the plaintiff, had executed to his codefendant, Teluida Ozalli, a deed purporting to convey the plaintiff's interest therein to said Teluida Ozalli; and that this deed was ineffective to convey the plaintiff's interest, but that, nevertheless, the said defendant claims title thereunder. The prayer was that the deed be declared invalid, and that the plaintiff's title be quieted against the claims of the defendants. The answer, with respect to the first count, denied that the plaintiff is or ever was the owner of the mining claim described. As to the second count, it denied that the plaintiff is or ever was the owner, or in possession, or entitled to the possession of the mining claim, or any interest therein, or any portion thereof.

The allegation that the plaintiff was the owner and in possession of the interest in the mining claim described was an allegation of facts material to the cause of action of the plaintiff. Payne v. Treadwell. 16 Cal. 243; McCarthy v. Yale, 39 Cal. 586; Johnson v. Vance, 86 Cal. 130, 24 Pac. 863. It was necessary for the plaintiff to establish ownership or possession, either by proof or admission, in order to entitle him to recover. The denial in the answer that he was either the owner or in possession of this, or of any, interest in the mining claim, put these facts directly in issue and made it necessary for the plaintiff to introduce evidence thereof before he could become entitled to judgment. In this condition of the pleadings it was error to grant a motion for judgment on the pleadings. Nudd v. Thompson, 34 Cal. 47; Prost v. More, 40 Cal. 347; Amador Co. v. Butterfield, 51 Cal. 526; Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 17, 27 Pac. 942, 49 Am. Rep. 679; Botto v. Vandament, 67 Cal. 333, 7 Pac. 753; Martin v. Porter, 84 Cal. 479, 24 Pac. 109; Derby v. Jackman, 89 Cal. 3, 26 Pac. 610; Norris v. Lilly, 147 Cal. 757, 82 Pac. 425, 109 Am. St. Rep. 188. Because of this error, it is necessary that the part of the judgment involved in the appeal be reversed. The portion thereof declaring the defendants the owners of the undivided one-fourth interest in the Gold Ridge Extension Gravel mine will not be affected by this reversal.

The judgment in favor of the plaintiff with respect to the Gold Ridge Gravel mine is reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 2, 1910.)

1. Highways (§ 113*) — Improvement — Report of Highway Commissioners—Sufficiency.

The preliminary report of the highway commission required by St. 1907, c. 349, to ascertain the kind of improvement to be made on a road, and to make a report describing generally the kind of improvements, need not go into detail, and a reasonable departure therefrom in the final specifications for the doing of the work does not render the contract therefor void, though the improvement described in the report must be adhered to.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348–350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

2. Highways (§ 113*) — Improvement — Report of Highway Commissioners—Sufficiency.

The variance between the preliminary report of the highway commission for the improvement of roads under St. 1907, c. 349, which stated that, where an asphaltic macadam pavement was to be made, it should be composed of a mixture of the best grade of hard, tough crushed stone, the best asphalt and other materials which would insure a pavement capable of sustaining heavy traffic, and the specifications for the work which allowed either gravel or crushed rock to be used in the composition of the asphaltic macadam at the option of the contractor, subject to requirements as to the quality and to the approval of the engineer of the commission, was not fatal to the contract for the work called for by the specifications.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348–350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

3. Highways (§ 113*) — Improvement — Report of Highway Commissioners—Sufficiency.

The specifications for public work to be let to the lowest bidder must be sufficiently definite on all the details materially affecting the cost of the work to apprise bidders of the essential and substantial parts of the work and enable them to know with reasonable accuracy the cost of the work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348–350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

4. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*) — IMPROVEMENT — REPORT OF HIGHWAY COMMISSIONERS—SUFFICIENCY.

This rule as to definiteness applies where the cost is to be paid with money already raised by taxation or by the sale of bonds, as well as where the cost is to be raised after the work is done by assessment on property benefited.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348-350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

5. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*) — IMPROVEMENT — REPORT OF HIGHWAY COMMISSIONERS—SUFFICIENCY.

But the rule does not apply in the case of details of construction which do not appear and cannot with reasonable diligence and cost be ascertained in advance or which will be disclosed only by the doing of the work, or any contingency which reasonable care will not foresee, and such things must be left to be adjusted in accordance with the general provisions of the contract for the work, or by the discretion of the person supervising its performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348-350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

6. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—IMPROVEMENT—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY.

Provisions in a contract for the construction of a road which requires the contractor to grade the connections with intersecting roads to the satisfaction of the engineer of the highway commission, which allows the contractor to take water from the county wells along the road, and, when that is insufficient, to obtain the necessary quantity from other sources at his own expense, and which recommends a method of mixing the asphaltic cement, but which permits any other method, provided it will result in coating every particle of the stone, sand, and dust, and which requires the contractor, in case he is compelled to cease work temporarily, to leave in a passable condition the part of the road on which he has worked, etc., do not make the contract void because the specifications do not include such provisions, since they relate to details of construction which do not appear, and cannot with reasonable diligence be ascertained in advance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348-350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

7. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—CONSTRUCTION—CONTRACTS.

The strictness of construction against the validity of contracts made in proceedings in invitum will not be observed in proceedings for the construction of a public road where the property owners have consented to the raising of the money by taxation to pay the cost thereof, and the officers are charged with the duty of expending it lawfully and in good faith for the purposes designated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways. Cent. Dig. §§ 348-350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

8. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*) — PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY.

A provision in a contract to construct a road that the fills and approaches to bridges, culverts, and drains are to be graded to the elevations shown on the plans or to elevations which may be given by the engineer, and which reserves to the county board of supervisors power to change the plans for the cuts, fills, slopes, etc., does not give the engineer authority to change the elevations of his own motion, but requires the contractor to take the engineer's elevations so far as they apply to changes made by the supervisors under the reserved power, and the provision so construed is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348-350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

9. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—IMPROVEMENT—SPECIFICATIONS—COMPETITIVE BIDDING.

A provision in the specifications for the construction of a road that crushed rock or gravel at the option of the contractor may be used in the composition of asphaltic macadam, when considered in connection with the accompanying conditions prescribing the qualities and characteristics necessary to each kind of material to make it fit for the purpose, and authorizing the engineer of the highway commission to see that the material used is up to the standard specified, tends to favor competition in bidding rather than to hinder it, as the bidders are informed of the requirements in either case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348-350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

10. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—IMPROVEMENT—SPECIFICATIONS—COMPETITIVE BIDDING.

A provision requiring the contractor to give a bond to secure the county against loss by reason of suits which may be brought by any person claiming patent rights covering the class of pavements specified, unless the contractor proves that he has a license from such patentee. is within the discretion of the county board of supervisors, and is not invalid as hindering competitive bidding, in the absence of a showing that the license to use the patent is not available to any person who will pay the royalty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348-350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

11. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—IMPROVEMENT—SPECIFICATIONS—COMPETITIVE BIDDING.

A provision that the pavement shall in general have a uniform thickness of four inches and that the contractor shall not reduce it without the consent of the engineer does not affect the validity of the contract for the work, in the absence of any claim that there is any material difference in the profits of the contractor in laying macadam of one thickness over that to be made in the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348-350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

12. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—IMPROVEMENT—SPECIFICATIONS—COMPETITIVE BIDDING.

A provision directing the liquid surface coating to be applied on the whole road or any part of it as the engineer may decide is not unlawful where the contract for the work provides that the payment is to be made by the square foot for the amount actually applied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348-350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

13. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—IMPROVEMENT—SPECIFICATIONS—COMPETITIVE BIDDING.

Profile and cross-sections for the pavement of a road showed that the gravel foundation or the pavement itself, where gravel foundations were not required, was to be laid, in general, on the existing surface of the road. It was to be rolled with a heavy roller, and, where a subgrade was to be made by excavation, that was also to be rolled. Soft spots developed under the rolling were to be excavated to a depth of two feet, and then filled with clean dry earth or gravel. The foundation was to be of gravel wherever directed by the engineer, and was to be not less than three inches thick after compacting, or thicker, if so directed by the engineer. Held, that the provisions in the specifications for extra work in excavating the soft spots which might be developed by rolling were within the rule regarding unforeseen contingencies in the construction of a public work, and were valid.

14. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—IMPROVEMENT—SPECIFICATIONS—COMPETITIVE BIDDING.

A provision in specifications for the pavement of a road that the engineer shall decide where the gravel foundation shall be laid, and its thickness is not objectionable where by the contract the contractor is to be paid for laying such foundation at a fixed price per ton for the amount of gravel used therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348–350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

15. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—IMPROVEMENT—CONTRACTS—EXTRA WORK.

Under St. 1907, c. 349, providing for the improvement of roads, giving the county supervisors power to authorize the highway commission to contract for any work without letting it to bidders where the cost does not exceed $1,000, and empowering the board in their discretion to authorize the highway commission to purchase the necessary material, purchase or hire tools and appliances, and hire labor and do the work without letting any contract, the board may agree for the performance of extra work in paving a road without the formality of letting it to bidders where it does not exceed $1,000 in cost, and for that purpose the board may agree in advance with a contractor that he shall do the extra work at a price to be agreed on where it does not exceed $1,000, or the board may authorize the commission to agree with the contractor to do the extra work under the supervision of the commission, though it costs more than $1,000.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348–350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

16. EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—PRESUMPTIONS—REGULARITY OF OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

The court cannot assume that the board of supervisors of a county by the provision in the specifications for the pavement of a road, as authorized by St. 1907, c. 349, reserving the power to change, at the recommendation of the highway commission, any cuts, fills, slopes, etc., from those specified on the plans, etc., contemplated the doing of extra work in any unlawful manner, as the statute gives the board power to accomplish it lawfully in a specified mode, and the court must presume that the board intended to proceed lawfully and within their powers.

17. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—IMPROVEMENT—SPECIFICATIONS—VALIDITY.

A provision in the specifications for the pavement of a road that reserves the power to change the cuts, fills, dimensions, and alignments, and which provides that the county board of supervisors and the highway commission shall have power to agree with the contractor on a price over that named in the contract for such additional work where the changes entail an additional expense on the contractor of that contemplated by him, does not tend to prevent competition in bidding, because, if an alteration in the plans causes a material reduction in the amount of the work, the contractor is not entitled to the full price, but the county is entitled to a reduction in the price in proportion to the decrease of the work computed at the contract rate as far as possible, while, if an alteration causes additional work, the contractor is entitled to the reasonable value thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348–350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

18. WORK AND LABOR (§ 13*)—BUILDING CONTRACTS—EXTRA WORK—COMPENSATION.

Where extra work is caused by authorized deviations from a building contract and no agreement is made regarding the price thereof or payment therefor, the law implies an agreement by the owner to pay the reasonable value of the extra work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

19. CONTRACTS (§ 234*)—BUILDING CONTRACTS—COMPENSATION—DEDUCTIONS.

Where the consent of the parties to an alteration in the work contracted for is secured by a reservation of power in the employer to make such changes inserted in the contract, the employer may make a reasonable deduction from the contract price if the changes made materially lessen the cost of the work required by the contract, and such deduction is properly made at the contract rate for the work omitted as far as practicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1099, 1100; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

20. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—IMPROVEMENT—SPECIFICATIONS—VALIDITY.

Under Const. art. 1, §§ 1, 17, giving foreigners who are bona fide residents the same right to acquire property as native-born citizens, etc., and under St. 1907, c. 349, providing for the improvement of roads, requiring the county board of supervisors to administer the scheme for building roads, without conferring power to enforce a provision that unnaturalized aliens shall not be employed in the work, a provision in the specifications for the pavement of a road that no unnaturalized alien shall be employed in the work is invalid, and a violation thereof by the contractor does not defeat his right to recover the contract price on performance of the work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 348–350; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

21. HIGHWAYS (§ 113*)—IMPROVEMENT—SPECIFICATIONS—VALIDITY.

Where the void provision in the specifications for a public work that no unnaturalized alien should be employed on the work did not have any effect on the bids for the work, and it did not appear that alien laborers were at hand to do the work at less expense than naturalized or native-born laborers, and the contractor performed the work in good faith, he was entitled to his compensation notwithstanding the void provision.

In Bank. Mandamus by the City Street Improvement Company against James H. Kroh, County Auditor of San Joaquin County, to compel respondent to draw a warrant in favor of petitioner. Writ issued.

J. A. Plummer, Bishop, Hoefler, Cook & Harwood, and Clary & Louttit, for petitioner. Arthur L. Levinsky, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant is the county auditor of San Joaquin county. The petition prays that a writ of mandate issue from this court directing the defendant, as such auditor, to draw a warrant on the county treasurer in favor of petitioner for the amount of a certain claim allowed by the board of supervisors of the county payable out of the "highway improvement fund" for work done in the construction of a road in said county in performing a contract made by the board of supervisors with the petitioner under the provisions of the statute of March 19, 1907, known as the "Good Roads Law." St. 1907, p. 666. Sections 4, 10, and 11 of the act were amended in 1909. St. 1909, p. 154. These proceedings were begun before the amendments took effect, and were concluded afterwards, but the changes made in the law do not affect the validity of the contract in question.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The defendant claims that the proceedings upon which the contract rests were defective in particulars of such substantial importance that the contract is thereby rendered invalid. The force of the objections to the validity of the proceedings will be better understood by a preliminary statement of the provisions of the act. It provides for the appointment by the county board of supervisors of a "highway commission" of three members. This commission is empowered to ascertain which of the main public highways of the county should be improved and to determine what new highways are necessary and the kind of improvement to be made thereon, and to estimate the cost of the respective improvements and new roads and make maps thereof showing the connecting roads. It must thereupon make a report to the supervisors showing the roads to be improved or made "describing generally the kind of improvements to be made thereon" stating the estimated cost and the amount to be raised by bonds thereon, and praying the supervisors "to call an election for the issuance of bonds of the county therefor, for the estimated amount." The supervisors, if they adopt the report, are required to call an election to determine whether bonds shall be issued. Any defect or irregularity in the proceedings prior to calling the election shall not affect the validity of the bonds. The money derived from the sale of the bonds is denominated the "highway improvement fund," and must be used solely for the purposes authorized by the act. The work for which the bonds are voted is to be done under the direction of the highway commission, but final acceptance is committed to the supervisors. These provisions are contained in the first eight sections of the act. The remaining sections provide for the actual work of construction or improvement.

If the bonds are authorized and sold, the commission is required to prepare detailed specifications, plans, and profiles for the work, or such part as it deems it desirable to have done separately, and present the same to the supervisors who shall either adopt or reject the same as presented. If adopted, the supervisors may then advertise for bids for the work in accordance with the plans, profiles, and specifications, and the contract shall be let to the lowest bidder who will give a good bond. The supervisors may authorize the highway commission to buy the material, hire the labor, and have the work done without a general contract, but in that case all contracts for the purchase of materials, tools, or appliances, amounting to more than $1,000, shall be let to the lowest bidder upon due notice. Any part of the work which does not cost more than $1,000 the board of supervisors may authorize the commission to do by contract without advertisement for bids. Section 9. The board of supervisors of San Joaquin county appointed a highway commission for that county as provided in the act. On February 11, 1909, the commission made and filed a report to the supervisors recommending the improvement of 23 roads, designated as main public highways and described by their termini and general courses, and stating generally the kind of improvements to be made thereon. The supervisors adopted the report. The estimated cost of the proposed improvements was $1,890,000. An election was duly called and held and bonds to that amount were thereby authorized. Sales of part of these bonds were made for the sum of $320,512, which was placed in the county treasury and set apart as the "highway improvement fund." The commission thereupon decided to have the work on one of the roads, known as the lower Sacramento road, done separately, and prepared and presented to the supervisors detailed plans, profiles, and specifications thereof. On September 20, 1909, the supervisors adopted the same. Notices were duly given for bids and the contract for that work was duly let to the plaintiff, and on October 11, 1909, the same was executed, and the plaintiff gave the required bond. The plaintiff proceeded to do the work, and on December 30, 1909, there became due to it, by the terms of the contract, for work done thereunder, the sum of $4,969.03, for which the claim in question was made and allowed. The preliminary report made by the commission on February 11th and adopted by the supervisors in "describing generally the kind of improvement to be made" on the roads mentioned stated that, where an asphaltic macadam pavement was made, it should be "composed of a mixture of the best grade of hard, tough crushed stone, the best asphalt and other materials which will insure a pavement capable of sustaining in satisfactory manner the exceedingly heavy traffic to which it will be subjected." Also that "in general" the macadam would not exceed seven inches nor be less than four inches in thickness on soil which furnished a good foundation. The specifications afterwards made by the commission and adopted by the supervisors for the work to be done on the lower Sacramento road, as provided in section 9 of the act, allows either gravel or crushed rock to be used in the composition of the asphaltic macadam, at the option of the contractor, subject, however, to certain requirements as to quality and to the approval of the engineer employed by the commission. Other slight deviations from the preliminary report were made, but it is not necessary to state them further.

The defendant contends that these discrepancies between the preliminary report and estimate on which the bonds were voted and the detailed specifications for the particular road improved, as afterwards prepared and adopted before letting the contract, made the entire proceeding void. We do not so understand the law. The preliminary investigation, statement of improvements to be made and estimate of the cost are intended to be general in terms; the purpose being merely to give information to the supervisors and the voters as to the general character of the work for which bonds were supposed to be necessary. The commission is required to ascertain "the kind of improvement to be made" (section 4), and, having done so, to make a report "describing generally the kind of improvements to be made." Section 6. It was never intended that this report should go into detail, or that a slight or reasonable departure therefrom in the final specifications for the doing of the work, not destructive of the general plan proposed, should render the contract void. The main purpose of this report is served when the election is called and held. If the bonds are authorized and the money obtained thereon, the supervisors and the commission have power to expend it for the improvement of the roads mentioned in the report. They must adhere to the improvement mentioned in the general plan recommended and described in the report, but it would require a radical departure from that description to invalidate a contract thereafter made in good faith. No mere variation in the details constituting the same kind of an improvement would produce that result. We have nothing more serious here.

It is contended that the contract is invalid because of certain provisions incorporated in it, and because it was not let in the manner required in the act. The statute gives the supervisors power, where the cost exceeds $1,000, to have the improvement made in either one of two modes—either by letting it on contract to the lowest bidder, or by authorizing the commission to do it directly without a general contract, in which case, however, contracts for materials to an amount exceeding $1,000 must be let to bidders after due notice. The contract method was adopted. The statute requires an advertisement for proposals to do the work in accordance with the plans, profiles, and specifications adopted by the supervisors. It is a general principle of law applying to the letting of contracts for public work to the lowest bidder, upon plans and specifications previously adopted, that they must be sufficiently certain and definite, upon all the details of the work which materially affect its cost, to apprise bidders of all the essential and substantial parts of the work and enable them to know with reasonable accuracy the outlay they will have to make in performing the work to be contracted for. This is thoroughly established in the case of public improvements of streets, where the cost is raised by assessment upon the property of owners within the district specially benefited thereby. Piedmont P. Co. v. Allman, 136 Cal. 89, 68 Pac. 493; California I. Co. v. Reynolds, 123 Cal. 92, 55 Pac. 802; Grant v. Barber, 135 Cal. 191, 67 Pac. 127; Stansbury v. White, 121 Cal. 437, 53 Pac. 940; Chase v. Scheerer, 136 Cal. 251, 66 Pac. 768; Perine v. Pasadena, 116 Cal. 9, 47 Pac. 777; Warren v. Chandos, 115 Cal. 385, 47 Pac. 132. The reason for the rule, as applied to such work, is in part because such uncertainty deprives the property owners of the knowledge necessary to enable them to undertake the work themselves, as the statute provides they may, and in part because it deprives bidders of like knowledge, and thereby tends to prevent the fair competition and resulting low cost of the work, which is the principal object of the provision.

The latter reason is as persuasive as the first, it is sufficient to support the rule, and it applies as well where the cost is to be paid with money already raised by taxation or by the sale of bonds, as where it is to be raised after the work is done by assessment upon the benefited property. W. 622; Fones Bros. Co. v. Erb, 54 Ark. 645, 17 S. W. 7, 13 L. R. A. 353; Andrews v. Board, 7 Idaho, 457, 63 Pac. 592; Gage v. New York, 110 App. Div. 403, 97 N. Y. Supp. 157; McBrian v. Grand Rapids, 56 Mich. 99, 22 N. W. 206; 11 Cyc. 481; 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1167. There is a well-recognized exception to this rule in the case of details of construction which do not appear and cannot with reasonable diligence and cost be ascertained in advance, or which will be disclosed only by the doing of the work, or any contingency which reasonable care and consideration would not foresee. Such things may occur in every work of any considerable magnitude, and they must be left to be adjusted in accordance with general provisions of the contract, or by the discretion of the person or board supervising its performance. Examples of such details, and of lawful provisions for their determination, were considered in Haughawout v. Hubbard, 131 Cal. 679, 63 Pac. 1078; Belser v. Allman, 134 Cal. 400, 66 Pac. 492; Banaz v. Smith, 133 Cal. 106, 65 Pac. 309; Haughawout v. Raymond, 148 Cal. 311, 83 Pac. 53; Chase v. Scheerer, supra, and McCaleb v. Dreyfus, 156 Cal. 204, 103 Pac. 924. Of the provisions objected to in this case, the following come within this class, and do not invalidate the contract. The contractor must grade the connections with intersecting roads to the satisfaction of the engineer employed by the commission. He was allowed to take water from the county wells and tanks along the road, but, if that was insufficient, he was required to obtain the necessary quantity from other sources at his own expense. A method of mixing the asphaltic cement was recommended, but any other method was permitted, provided it would result in coating every particle of the stone, sand, and dust with the asphaltic cement. If compelled to cease work temporarily, the contractor was required to leave in a passable condition during the winter the part of the road upon which he had worked. The statute limits the width of the roadway made with these funds to 16 feet. Public roads must be at least 40 feet wide. The sole purpose of this clause is to secure a way for public travel, and it would be substantially complied with if the portion of the public road not occupied by the pavement was made fit for that purpose. During the progress of the work he must maintain a roadway for traffic, either alongside the pavement on the highway, or on private land adjoining, "unless in the judgment of the engineer it is a physical impossibility to do so." Soft material encountered was to be removed as directed by the engineer. The earth for embankments and shoulders was to be of a quality satisfactory to the engineer. All of these provisions come within the exception above stated. They do not make the contract void.

In connection with the provisions to be now considered, it is to be observed that the rules for the interpretation of contracts declare that "the whole of a contract is to be taken together, so as to give effect to every part, if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other," and that "a contract must receive such an interpretation as will make it lawful, operative, definite, reasonable and capable of being carried into effect, if it can be done without violating the intentions of the parties." Civ. Code, §§ 1641, 1643. Another consideration applicable to this case is that it is not, strictly speaking, a proceeding in invitum. The property owners have been consulted and have by their votes sanctioned and approved the proposed improvement. It is not being made without their previous consent or against their will. The extreme strictness of construction against the validity of contracts made in proceedings in invitum, whether in all cases justifiable or not, is not to be observed in proceedings of this character, where the property owners have already consented to the raising of the money by taxation of their property and the officers are simply charged with the duty of expending it lawfully and in good faith for the purposes designated. The fills and approaches to all bridges, culverts, and drains were to be graded to the elevations shown upon the plans, "or to elevations which may be given by the engineer." Another clause reserves to the supervisors power to change the plans for the cuts, fills, slopes, and dimensions. If a change was made under this authority, the engineer would necessarily have to furnish the new elevations required by the change. The provision quoted does not give the engineer authority to change the elevations of his own motion, but requires the contractor to take the engineer's elevations so far as they apply to changes made by the supervisors under this reservation of power. Thus understood, the provision is within the law. The provision that crushed rock, or gravel, at the option of the contractor, may be used in the composition of the asphaltic macadam, must be considered in connection with the accompanying conditions prescribing the qualities and characteristics necessary to each kind of material to make it fit for the purpose, and authorizing the engineer of the commission to see that the material used is up to the standard specified. The bidders were thus informed of the requirements in either case. The provision tended to favor competition, rather than to hinder it.

In addition to the bond for the faithful performance of the contract, which the statute requires, the specifications provided that the contractor should give a bond in a sum equal to 50 cents for each square yard of asphaltic macadam to be laid, to secure the county against loss by reason of suits which might be brought within two years after final payment for the work, by any person claiming patent rights covering the class of pavements specified. The bond was not to be required if the contractor satisfactorily proved that he had a license from such patentee. It is not shown or suggested that the license to use such patent, if there was any, was not available to any person who would pay the royalty. It was within the discretion of the supervisors to take such precautions for the protection of the county, and it does not appear that the provision would favor one bidder above another, or tend to prevent fair competition. The bidders were required to submit bids specifying separately the prices for which they would do separate parts of the work, as follows: "I. Grading in lump sum for the whole work. II. Gravel in place—per ton. III. Asphaltic macadam pavement, per square foot: (1) Three inches in thickness; (2) four inches in thickness; (3) five inches in thickness. IV. Surface coating, per square foot." The specifications also gave estimates of the respective amounts of each class of work required. The bids and the contract were made in accordance with the above provision. Many of the objections are fully answered by a consideration of the effect of this method of taking bids and making the contract. There is no foundation for the claim that there was any material difference in the profits to the contractor in laying macadam of one thickness over that to be made in the other. Hence the provision that the pavement should in general have a uniform thickness of four inches, and that the contractor should not reduce it without the consent of the engineer, does not affect the legality of the contract. So, also, with respect to the liquid surface coating, the direction that it was to be applied upon the whole road, or any part of it, as the engineer should decide, was not unlawful in view of the contract that the payment was to be by the square foot for the amount actually applied. The profile and cross-sections showed that the gravel foundation, or the pavement itself where gravel foundations were not required, was to be in general laid upon the existing surface of the road. This was to be rolled with a heavy roller weighing not less than 350 pounds per lineal inch. Where a subgrade was to be made by excavation, that also was to be rolled in like manner. If soft spots developed under such rolling, they were to be excavated to a depth of two feet, and then filled with clean dry earth or gravel. The foundation was to be of gravel wherever directed by the engineer and was to be not less than three inches thick after compacting, or thicker, if so directed by the engineer. The provisions for extra work in excavating the soft spots which might be developed when the heavy roller was applied comes within the rule regarding unforeseen contingencies, declared in Haughawout v. Hubbard and the other similar cases above cited. The specification that the engineer should decide where the gravel foundation should be laid and its thickness is not objectionable, since by the contract the contractor is to be paid for laying such foundation at a fixed price per ton for the amount of gravel used therein. The decision of the engineer could not injuriously affect him.

The specifications contained the following provisions regarding extra work: "Extra Work. The board of supervisors reserve the power to change, at the recommendation of the highway commission, during the progress of the work, any cuts, fills, slopes, dimensions and alignments from those specified or appearing upon the plans. If such changes should, in the judgment of the engineer, entail an additional expense upon the contractor above that contemplated by him, the board of supervisors and the commission shall have power to agree with the contractor upon a price over and above that named in the contract, for such additional work, and the contractor shall be paid for such additional work as if it had been included in the original bid upon the work." It is always a wise precaution, in making contracts of this magnitude, to insert provisions to control the case of extra work which may appear to be necessary or desirable while the construction is going on. As was remarked in Kitchel v. Union County, 123 Ind. 540, 24 N. E. 366: "No prudent individual would make a contract for the construction of a building of any magnitude without incorporating a provision somewhere making specific and definite arrangements concerning extra work." The statute gives the supervisors power to authorize the highway commission to contract for any work, or for any part of an improvement, without letting it out to bidders, provided the cost thereof does not exceed one thousand dollars. And they were empowered, in their discretion, "to authorize the highway commission to purchase the necessary material, purchase or hire tools and appliances, and hire laborers, and to do the work or any part thereof without letting any contract therefor." Section 9. Extra work is, of course, work not included in the contract. Under the above provisions, it was entirely lawful for the board to agree for the performance of such work without the formality of letting it out to bidders, if it did not exceed $1,000 in cost. And for that purpose it was within their power to agree in advance with the contractor that he should do the extra work at a price to be afterward agreed upon, if it did not exceed $1,000. Or they might, under the second provision of the statute above quoted, authorize the commission to agree with the contractor to do the extra work under the supervision of the commission, even if it cost more than $1,000. The only restriction upon this power is in the additional provision that in that event contracts for materials, tools, or appliances necessary and amounting to more than $1,000, must be advertised and let to the lowest bidder. We cannot assume that the supervisors by this provision in the specifications contemplated the doing of such extra work in any unlawful manner, when the statute clearly gives them power to accomplish it lawfully in a specified mode. We must presume that they intended to proceed lawfully and within their powers, and hence the contract in question is not made illegal by this specification so far as the extra work is concerned. If they should attempt to go beyond their powers, the taxpayers have other remedies and means to prevent it, and the possibility that this may be attempted does not invalidate the proceedings.

It is suggested that the power to change the cuts, fills, dimensions and alignments authorized changes which will greatly reduce the amount and cost of the work; that the specifications in question do not provide for any reduction in the price to correspond with such reduction in cost; that, in that event, the law would give the contractor the right to the full compensation named in the contract for full performance; and that this would open the door to gross frauds between the contractor and the supervisors, if they should act in collusion to reduce the cost without reducing the contract price. If this was the necessary effect of such power, there might be no answer to the argument. But we do not think this is the law. We are of the opinion that, if an alteration in the plans caused a material reduction in the amount of the work, the contractor would not be entitled to the full price, and that, to the contrary, the county would be entitled to a reduction in the price in proportion to the decrease in the work, such reduction to be computed at the contract rate so far as possible. With regard to everything except the grading the contract furnished the ready means for calculating the deduction from the price. The gravel was to be paid for at so much per ton for the amount used; the macadam at a price per square foot for the area laid; the surface coating in the same way. Any change in the plans operating to reduce these items would automatically work a deduction from the estimated contract price by the terms of the contract itself. There was no estimate of the amount of the grading, and the contract provided that the lump sum of $18,000 was to be paid therefor. The plans, profiles, and specifications, however, showed the elevations of the various grades above or below the natural surface, their length, width, and slope, and from these data the number of cubic yards of excavation or fill required could be readily calculated and the average price per yard ascertained. The reasonable value of grading work omitted by reason of any alteration could be determined. In cases where extra work is caused by authorized deviations from a building contract, and no agreement is made regarding the price thereof, or payment therefor, the law implies an agreement by the owner to pay the reasonable value of the extra work. In Dubois v. Del. & H. C. Co., 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 291, it is said: "Where work is done under a special contract at estimated (stipulated) prices, and there is a deviation from the original plan by the consent of the parties, the estimate is not excluded, but is to be the rule of payment as far as the special contract can be traced; and for the extra labor the party is entitled to his quantum meruit." This rule is supported by the following cases: Aikin v. Bloodgood, 12 Ala. 224; Clark v. Mayor, 4 N. Y. 343, 53 Am. Dec. 379; Reed v. Phillips, 4 Scam. (Ill.) 42; H. E., etc., Ry. Co. v. Snelling, 59 Tex. 119; Wright v. Wright, 11 Ky. 180; Jones v. Adams, 12 La. Ann. 621; Holmes v. Stummel, 17 Ill. 455; Goldsmith v. Hand, 26 Ohio St. 107; Jewett v Weston, 11 Me. 349; White v. Oliver, 36 Me. 92; Hayward v. Leonard, 7 Pick. (Mass.) 187, 19 Am. Dec. 268; Jones v. Woodbury, 11 B. Mon. (Ky.) 169; Hood v. Smiley, 5 Wyo. 70, 36 Pac. 856; De Boom v. Priestly, 1 Cal. 206; O'Connor v. Dingley, 26 Cal. 21; Mowry v. Starbuck, 4 Cal. 274; McCormick v. Connoly, 2 Bay (S. C.) 404; 3 Sutherland on Damages, § 707; 2 Sedgwick on Damages (8th Ed.) § 655. In H. E., etc., Co. v. Snelling, supra, in which there was a contract for the construction of a railroad, the court says: "If the line of the road was changed after the contract was made, and Snelling was required to construct it upon the new line, and did so, the law would imply an agreement to compensate him for such additional cost of construction as the new line imposed, in the absence of some agreement to the contrary. But in case of such deviation from the contract, by consent, which completion of the new line by the contractor, without protest, would seem to imply, it would seem that the original contract, so far as can be, should regulate the price for the work."

Where the consent of the parties to an alteration is secured by a reservation of power in the employer to make such changes inserted in the original contract, the rule must necessarily be the same with respect to the right to compensation for extra work caused thereby, or to a deduction from the price for work omitted thereby, as when the alteration is made by consent after the work is begun. It is established that in such cases the contractor is entitled to charge and receive the reasonable value or cost of the extra work caused by the alteration. Upon the same principles, it must also be held that the employer or owner is entitled to a reasonable deduction from the contract price, if the changes thus made by authority or consent have materially lessened the amount and cost of the work required by the original contract, and that such deduction should be made at the contract rate for the work omitted, so far as practicable. The rule is thus stated in 3 Sutherland on Damages, § 709: "It often occurs that a partial rescission results from deviations from the original plan and contract made by deliberate and explicit direction of the employer, or with his consent and acquiescence, and by such departures other work is substituted with other prices agreed to, or implied. In such cases the omission of the particular work excluded by the substitution is not a violation of, but is dispensed with by modifying, the contract. * * * The contractor may then be entitled to recover the contract price with increase or subject to such diminution as is produced by the change of plan, on a quantum meruit." The following cases hold that in case the work is materially diminished by such alteration the employer is entitled to have the contract price proportionately reduced. Holmes v. Stummel, supra; Goldsmith v. Hand, supra; Jewett v. Weston, supra; White v. Oliver, supra; Wright v. Wright, supra. The reason of this rule is practically the same as in the numerous cases holding that a slight failure of the contractor to make complete performance is not sufficient to defeat his right to recover the contract price, less a reasonable deduction for the imperfections. This is the rule where the imperfections are not fraudulent, but are made by accident or inadvertence, and are not of sufficient extent to constitute a substantial departure from the original plan. The employer is presumed to agree to take the completed structure as it is, with the implied agreement by the contractor to make the proper deduction from the price, and the recovery is upon the contract, and not upon the quantum meruit. See Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 308, 38 Pac. 740; Marchant v. Hayes, 117 Cal. 672, 49 Pac. 840; Elliott v. Caldwell, 43 Minn. 361, 45 N. W. 845, 9 L. R. A. 52; Crouch v. Gutmann, 134 N. Y. 45, 31 N. E. 271, 30 Am. St. Rep. 608. An alteration from the original plan, decreasing the grading, under the contract in the case at bar, could not be said to be a breach of the contract, since the contract authorizes it. But, as it does not provide for a decrease of the price corresponding to the decrease in the grading, it would be necessary to resort to the general principles of the law of implied contracts. The county in that event would be entitled to deduct from the contract price for the grading a proportion thereof equal to the proportion which the omitted portion of the work of grading would bear to the whole work, with reasonable allowances to either party for any material variations in the expense of such omitted grading arising from conditions different from the average. This being the rule, the provision for extra work is fair to all parties, and cannot be supposed to have had a tendency to prevent competition in bidding.

The provision of the specifications to the effect that except by permission of the highway commission no unnaturalized alien shall be employed in the work is invalid and unenforceable when attempted by public authorities. The Constitution provides that all men have the inalienable right of enjoying liberty and acquiring property, and that foreigners of the white race, eligible to citizenship, while bona fide residents of the state, shall have the same right to acquire property as native-born citizens. Const. art. 1, §§ 1, 17. Laws forbidding the employment of aliens have been held invalid. Chicago v. Hulbert, 205 Ill. 363, 68 N. E. 786; People v. Warren, 34 N. Y. Supp. 943, 13 Misc. Rep. 615. Such a law would violate the treaties with almost all the nations from which this country receives immigrants. See Estate of Ghio, 108 Pac. 516. The statute in question charges the supervisors with the duty of administering the scheme for building roads, but it does not purport to confer power to make or enforce a provision of this character. They have, no doubt, a wide discretion as to the manner of carrying on the work, and may adopt any measure reasonably tending to facilitate the same, or perhaps any which may incidentally further any laudable public purpose. But they are not given authority to put restrictions upon the contractor which can only hinder the work, which make it more expensive, and which have no relation whatever to the thing to be done, or to any conceivable legislative purpose disclosed in the statute, and which would be a direct attempt to discriminate against one class of bona fide residents of the state and favor another, a violation of treaty obligations, and contrary to the principles of the Constitution. No express authority for such a provision is given, and we are satisfied that the supervisors have no implied power to impose such a mischievous and burdensome restriction. A violation of it by the contractor would not defeat his right to recover the contract price upon performance of the work.

It is not alleged or claimed that there were alien laborers at hand to do the work at less expense, or at all. It may be that if a taxpayer had endeavored to enjoin the letting of the contract, on the ground that this limitation of the specifications was void and that it tended to discourage bidders and make the work more expensive, the suit could have been maintained, or it may be that in a proceeding in invitum, where a stricter rule prevails, where the consent of the taxpayers has not been previously obtained and the money is yet to be raised from them by assessment, such a clause in the specifications would be fatal to the validity of the contract. This may be conceded, but we need not determine it. This case is not of that kind. The contract has been let, the work involved in this demand has been performed under it in good faith, and the people have voted the bonds and the money has been realized therefrom. No facts are shown to indicate that this clause had any effect whatever upon the bids. In People v. Featherstonhaugh, 172 N. Y. 112, 64 N. E. 802, 60 L. R. A. 768, where a similar case was presented, the court held that the contractor must be presumed to have known that the clause in the specifications was void, and to have made his bid with that understanding, and that he was entitled to payment under the contract, notwithstanding such invalid clause in the specifications and contract. It appeared in that case that the courts had previously decided that the provision was void and that this was actually known to the successful bidder. But the court distinctly declares that the rule would be the same in the absence of such decision. In People v. Coler, 166 N. Y. 1, 59 N. E. 716, 52 L. R. A. 814, 82 Am. St. Rep. 605, a similar clause in the contract was held to be invalid. But it was further held that the contract was not void, and that, when such a contract has been made and has been performed by the contractor, the fact that he has violated the invalid provision is no defense to an action by him to enforce payment of the contract price. The same conclusion was declared in Chicago v. Hulbert, supra; Marshall v. Nashville, 109 Tenn. 513, 71 S. W. 815; Cleveland v. Clements, 67 Ohio St. 197, 65 N. E. 885, 59 L. R. A. 775, 93 Am. St. Rep. 670. In Inge v. Board, 135 Ala. 202, 33 South. 678, 93 Am. St. Rep. 20, the work had not been performed, and the suit was instituted by taxpayers to restrain its performance. It was an ordinary street improvement proceeding. There was a similar clause in the specifications, and it was held that this prevented fair bidding and made the contract void. The point that it should be presumed to have been disregarded was not raised or considered. We think that the cases first cited above apply the better rule to be followed here. The void provision did not in any respect concern or affect the character of the improvement to be made, but was wholly collateral thereto. The case does not come within the scope of the rule that public corporations are not estopped by benefits received from the actual performance of an ultra vires contract, as in Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 81 Am. Dec. 96, and the numerous cases following the rule there stated. The presumption being that the parties all disregarded the collateral and invalid specification and there being nothing tending to prove or to indicate the contrary, the conclusion logically follows that, so far as this point is concerned, the contract was properly awarded and lawfully made.

Some other supposed defects are alleged in the answer, but they were not urged upon the argument, and we will assume that they are not of sufficient importance to merit consideration.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1910.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 268*)—CORPORATE DEBTS —LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS.

Under Civ. Code, § 322, measuring the liability of each stockholder of a corporation for its debts by the proportion which his stock bears to the whole of the subscribed stock, the complaint in an action to enforce a stockholder's liability must allege the amount of the subscribed stock.

2. PLEADING (§§ 207, 433*)—AIDER BY JUDGMENT.

A complaint in an action to enforce a stockholder's liability for corporate debts, which alleges that at the time the debts were incurred the total number of shares of stock then "outstanding" was a specified amount, sufficiently alleges, after judgment, the total amount of stock subscribed and the defect in the use of the word "outstanding" in place of the word "subscribed" may be reached only by demurrer pointing out the special objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 511, 512, 1451–1477; Dec. Dig. §§ 207, 433.*]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 216*)—CORPORATE DEBTS —LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS.

The liability of stockholders for corporate debts rests on contract ordinarily ascertained from the articles of incorporation read in the light of the statute authorizing the creation of the corporation, but where a corporation is formed in one state, and by the express terms of its charter it is created for doing business in another state, and business is done in that state, it must be assumed that the charter contract was made with reference to the laws of such state, and the liabilities which those laws impose will attend the transaction of such business.

4. CONTRACTS (§ 144*)—LIABILITY OF PARTIES —WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

The parties to a contract made with reference to the laws of a jurisdiction other than that of the place of contracting are deemed to have incorporated into the contract the law of such jurisdiction.

5. CORPORATIONS (§ 216*) — STOCKHOLDERS— LIABILITY FOR CORPORATE DEBTS.

The rule that, where a corporation is formed in one state with the intent of doing business in another state and business is done, there it must be assumed that the charter contract was made with reference to the laws of that state, applies whether the corporators intend to do all or only a part of their business in such state, and their relations to the state into which they come with regard to business there done is not affected by the circumstance that they also intend to or do transact business elsewhere.

6. CORPORATIONS (§ 216*) — STOCKHOLDERS — LIABILITY FOR CORPORATE DEBTS.

Under Const. art. 12, § 15, providing that foreign corporations shall not be allowed to transact business in the state on more favorable conditions than are prescribed to domestic corporations, and Civ. Code, § 322, declaring that the liability of each stockholder of a foreign corporation is the same as the liability of a stockholder of a domestic corporation, the stockholders of a corporation organized under the laws of a sister state authorizing corporations to exempt the property of its members from liability for corporate debts are liable for corporate debts incurred in doing business in California, where the stockholders formed the corporation with the intent of doing business in California, though the articles of incorporation filed in California exempted the stockholders from such liability.

Action by Frank N. Thomas against the Wentworth Hotel Company and another. From a judgment against defendant F. A. Warner, he appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Wright, for appellant. Porter, Sutton & Cruickshank, for respondent. J. R. Scott, amicus curiæ.

SLOSS, J. The defendant Warner, a stockholder of the Wentworth Hotel Company, a corporation, appeals from a judgment against him for his proportionate share of the indebtedness of the corporation evidenced by two promissory notes executed, and by their terms payable, in this state. The appeal is on the judgment roll alone.

The appellant contends that each of the two counts is defective in failing to allege the number of shares of stock of the corporation which had been subscribed. Since the liability of each stockholder is measured by the proportion which his stock bears to the "whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation" (Civ. Code, § 322), it is plain that an averment of the amount of such subscribed stock is an essential part of the cause of action. Without it there is no showing of one of the elements necessary for the computation of the "proportion" of the debt for which the defendant is liable. Bidwell v. Babcock, 87 Cal. 29, 25 Pac. 752; Roebling's Sons Co. v. Butler, 112 Cal. 677, 45 Pac. 6.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The allegation of the complaint before us is that at the time the indebtedness was incurred "the total number of shares of the capital stock of the said defendant, Wentworth Hotel Company, then outstanding was thirty-five hundred." The word "outstanding" can hardly be said to be the exact equivalent of "subscribed," and its use in a pleading of this character is not to be commended. At the same time it is no stretch of construction to say that, in view of the purpose of the action, the pleader was endeavoring, by means of the allegation quoted, to set forth the amount of the total subscribed stock. In one of our own decisions (Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 629, 40 Pac. 1047), the word "outstanding" was used in the sense here indicated. In speaking of an action to enforce the liability of stockholders, the court, per Temple, J., stated that "it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove the whole amount of stock outstanding to enable the court to determine the liability." That this mode of expression is found in the course of the argument in an opinion is, of course, no ground for saying that it is sufficient for the purposes of a pleading. We may, however, take it as furnishing some basis for the contention that the word "outstanding," as applied to shares of stock, may bear the meaning of "subscribed." If this be so, there is not a total failure to allege the necessary fact, but rather an imperfect or ambiguous averment. Such defect should be reached by a demurrer pointing out the special objection. Ryan v. Jacques, 103 Cal. 280, 37 Pac. 186. No demurrer, general or special, was interposed here, and we think that after trial and judgment this should be treated as "a case of defective pleading which may be waived, and not an entire omission to plead a material fact which is fatal." Kimball v. Richardson-Kimball Co., 111 Cal. 386, 43 Pac. 1111.

The appellant makes the further point that, under the facts shown by the pleadings and the findings, there is no liability on his part. The Wentworth Hotel Company was incorporated under the laws of the territory of Arizona. The complaint alleges that it was organized for the purpose, among other things, of transacting business in the county of Los Angeles, state of California. The answer does not undertake to deny this otherwise than by the averment that "the only words in the articles of incorporation of said defendant company which concern its possible purpose of doing business outside of the territory of Arizona, are as follows," quoting provisions of the articles to the effect that the principal place of business in Arizona is Tucson, and the principal place of business outside of Arizona shall be in the city of Los Angeles, or at the option of the board of directors, the city of Pasadena, California, at which place meetings of stockholders or directors shall be held, and quoting further provisions of the articles describing the business to be transacted in very comprehensive terms. The findings follow the averment of the complaint that the corporation was organized for the purpose, in part, of doing business in Los Angeles county, but state, further, that the articles of incorporation contain nothing concerning the intent to do business, outside of Arizona beyond the matter quoted in defendant's answer. This last finding does not, however, modify the finding that the purpose was, in part, to transact business in Los Angeles. The answer raised no substantial issue in this regard. The articles, so far as set forth in the defendant's pleading, plainly declared the purpose of transacting some, if not the principal part of the corporate business in Los Angeles county. The court found, further, that at the time the liabilities upon which the action is based were incurred the corporation was actually doing business in said county and the appellant was a resident of this state.

The appellant's claim of exemption is based upon the following allegations of his answer, which were found by the court to be true. The laws of Arizona, under which the Wentworth Hotel Company was incorporated, provide for the formation of corporations for the transaction of any lawful business, and that such corporations shall have power, among other things, "to exempt the private property of members from liability for corporate debts." The articles of incorporation are required to state whether private property is to be exempt from corporate debts. If not so exempted, stockholders are liable for the debts of the corporation in the proportion which their stock bears to the whole capital stock. The articles of incorporation of the Wentworth Hotel Company expressly declare that the stock shall be nonassessable, and that "the private property of the stockholders of this corporation shall be and is hereby made forever exempt from all liability for its debts or obligations." Certified copies of these articles were filed with the secretary of state of California and with the clerk of the county of Los Angeles. The facts so set up and found do not constitute any defense to the action—a conclusion which requires no support further than that afforded by a citation of the cases of Pinney v. Nelson, 183 U. S. 144, 22 Sup. Ct. 52, 46 L. Ed. 125, and Peck v. Noee, 154 Cal. 351, 97 Pac. 865. In the first of these cases it was held that stockholders of a Colorado corporation, whose articles of incorporation declared its purpose of doing part of its business in the state of California, were liable according to the provisions of section 322 of the Civil Code for liabilities incurred by the corporation in the latter state, notwithstanding the fact that under the laws of Colorado a stockholder is not liable for any portion of the corporate debt. In Peck v. Noee the rule was applied to the case of a corporation organized under the laws of Nevada, whose Constitution provided that "corporators of corporations formed under the laws of this state shall not be individually liable for the debts or liabilities of such corporations." The appellant has not succeeded in distinguishing the case at bar from those cited. It is true, as contended, that the liability of stockholders rests upon contract and that the terms of the contract between the incorporators are ordinarily to be ascertained from the articles of incorporation, read in the light of the statute which authorizes the creation of the corporate body. But, as is pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States in Pinney v. Nelson, supra, when a contract is made with reference to the laws of a jurisdiction other than that of the place of contracting, the parties will be deemed to have incorporated into their agreement the law of the jurisdiction with reference to which they were contracting. Accordingly, says the court, "when a corporation is formed in one state, and by the express terms of its charter it is created for doing business in another state, and business is done in that state, it must be assumed that the charter contract was made with reference to its laws; and the liabilities which those laws impose will attend the transaction of such business." It can make no difference that in Pinney v. Nelson and Peck v. Noee, the freedom from individual liability was declared by statute or constitution, whereas here it was, under the authority of the statute, declared in the articles. The provision of the articles can have no greater force than is to be attributed to the express law of the state creating the corporation. Such law is, for most purposes, imported into the contract of the association and forms a part of it, whether stated in the charter or not. But, in so far as the charter or articles declare an intent to do business in another state, the law of that state becomes, so far as concerns business there done, a part of the contract. The articles, like the law itself, are not to be read as providing for exemption from stockholders' liability for debts to be incurred in a state which permits foreign corporations to come in only upon condition that the stockholders shall be liable for the corporate debts. And here is the answer to the suggestion that the filing, in this state, of certified copies of the articles conveyed to creditors constructive notice of the fact that the contract of the corporators exempted them from liability and estopped the creditors from claiming such liability. The contract, properly construed, does not purport to apply such exemption to business done in California, and there is no ground therefore for the operation of an estoppel.

The appellant argues in his brief that in both of the cases relied on by the plaintiff the articles showed an intent to do the entire corporate business in California, whereas here the articles indicate an intent to do a part of the business of the corporation in other places. The supposed distinction does not really exist. The articles of incorporation in the Pinney Case declared merely a purpose of carrying on part of the business beyond the limits of Colorado, the state of incorporation, and provided for an office and place of business in Colorado. In this respect the articles are very similar to those of the corporation here involved. But, if the fact were as suggested, it would present no valid ground of discrimination. The fact that a corporation is formed in one state with the declared purpose of doing business in another justifies, as we have seen, the assumption that, with regard to the business to be done in such other state, the corporators agree to be bound by its laws. It can make no difference whether they intend to do all or only a part of their business in such state. Their relations to the state into which they come, with regard to business there done, cannot be affected by the circumstance that they also intend to, or do, transact some business elsewhere. There is no injustice or hardship in this result. The law of this state declares in express terms that "the liability of each stockholder of a corporation formed under the laws of any other state or territory of the United States, or of any foreign country, and doing business within this state, is the same as the liability of a stockholder of a corporation created under the constitution and laws of this state." Civ. Code, § 322. This statute carries out the constitutional mandate that foreign corporations shall not be "allowed to transact business within this state on more favorable conditions than are prescribed by law to similar corporations organized under the laws of this state." Const. Cal. art. 12, § 15. These provisions existed when this corporation was formed for the express purpose of doing business in California. The stockholders, seeking to avail themselves of the permission granted by this state to foreign corporations to do business here, knew, or should have known, the terms upon which this privilege was tendered. They should not be allowed to take advantage of the benefits afforded by our law, at the same time repudiating the accompanying burdens.

The judgment is affirmed.

MUNCY v. BRAIN. (L. A. 2,516.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 1, 1910. Rehearing Denied Sept. 29, 1910.)

1. SALES (§§ 477, 479*)—CONDITIONAL—FAILURE OF PAYMENT—POSSESSION.

Where a contract of conditional sale of an automobile provides that, on failure of payment by a certain date, the seller should have possession, on default the seller may both obtain possession and retain the proceeds from the sale of security given for the price, but must return the automobile on the buyer's payment of the balance due, since the retention of the proceeds of the security was a waiver of the right to require payment on the date specified.

2. SALES (§ 479*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—FAILURE OF PAYMENT—RIGHTS OF LESSOR.

Under the contract of lease of an automobile, whereby the lessor should have the right to possession on default in any of the payments of rent for which security was given, he could on default both obtain possession of the automobile and for the rent retain the proceeds from the sale of the security.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 479.*]

3. SALES (§ 479*)—CONDITIONAL—FAILURE OF PAYMENT—RIGHTS OF SELLER.

Where a conditional sale contract provides that the seller may regain possession on default, he may elect whether to take the property or require payment, but cannot do both.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by R. E. Muncy against W. C. Brain. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

SHAW, J. Appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone.

The plaintiff sued to recover damages in the sum of $10,000 for an alleged conversion to his own use by the defendant of 5,000 shares of corporate stock, alleged to belong to the plaintiff. On December 18, 1907, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a series of contracts concerning an automobile belonging to the defendant. There were three documents, each dated and signed and appearing to be separate and distinct contracts, but they were executed simultaneously, as part of the same transaction, they bear the same date, and they must all be considered together as constituting the entire contract between the parties.

By the document which we will designate as the first agreement, Muncy leased or hired of Brain the automobile in question for a term ending on June 30, 1908. Muncy paid to Brain $29.20 at the execution of the agreement, and agreed therein to pay him the further sums of $25 on January 16, 1908, $37.50 on March 16, 1908, and $2,537.50 on June 25, 1908, all of which the agreement expressly declared were paid and to be paid for the rental, hire, and use of said automobile. It further provided that if Muncy failed to pay said rent, or any part thereof when due, or to perform any of the agreements, conditions, or undertakings contained in that instrument, Brain might "demand, take and repossess said automobile, with or without process of law," and that at the expiration of said term Muncy would return and deliver the same to Brain in good order. The last clause in this document was as follows: "It is further understood by the parties hereto, that in the event said party of the second part (Muncy) complies with all the terms of this agreement, the second party shall then (but not otherwise) have the right to purchase said automobile, and the said first party shall be required to transfer and sell said automobile to said party of the second part, as hereinafter agreed and set forth." This was immediately followed by an attestation and date and the signatures of the two parties as in execution of the agreement.

The second agreement, the one referred to in the first one by the words "as hereinafter agreed and set forth," is as follows: "In consideration of one dollar and other good and valuable considerations to me in hand paid, I hereby agree to and with R. E. Muncy, the said party of the second part to the foregoing lease, that in the event he shall on his part well and truly perform and fulfill all the conditions of said lease and pay as they become due the different installments of rent, and all other sums therein and herein agreed to be paid, that he will on the 3rd day of July, 1908, provided the said R. E. Muncy shall so desire, sell and convey the said automobile described in said lease to the said R. E. Muncy, for the sum of $6.25 then in cash to be paid said undersigned as hereinbefore set out and agreed upon. It is expressly agreed and understood, however, that time shall be of the essence of this contract, and that unless all the conditions of the said foregoing lease shall have been fulfilled and performed by the said R. E. Muncy, and the said $6.25 paid as aforesaid, then the privilege to purchase said automobile hereby granted shall be waived and forfeited. Los Angeles, California, December 18th, 1907. W. C. Brain. R. E. Muncy. The conditions of the above agreement are hereby accepted. Los Angeles, California, December 18th, 1907. R. E. Muncy."

The third agreement appears from its terms and from the findings to have been indorsed on or attached to another instrument whereby Muncy became the owner of the stock in controversy. The first agreement aforesaid was attached to the said third agreement, and was referred to therein as "Exhibit A," and made a part thereof. This third agreement was, in effect, a pledge by Muncy to Brain of the 5,000 shares of stock as security for the payment of the sums of money which Muncy had by the first agreement agreed to pay to Brain; that is to say, the rental accruing for the use of the automobile during the term of the lease thereof. It was signed by Muncy alone.

Muncy paid the small sums falling due in January and March, but did not pay the $2,537.50 due on June 25th, or any part of it. Thereafter, on September 4, 1908, Brain sold the pledged stock at public auction in the manner required by law (Civ. Code, §§ 3000–3005) to satisfy his demand for the aforesaid unpaid rent. To whom it was sold does not expressly appear, but, as it is admitted that Brain was in possession of it after the sale, we may assume that he was himself the purchaser, if the fact is material. The value of the stock did not exceed the amount of rent unpaid. Muncy did not pay the $6.25 mentioned in the second agreement as the price to be paid by him for the automobile as a condition of the sale thereof by Brain to him on July 3, 1908, but at some time before this action was begun (September 26, 1908,) he offered to do so. On June 28, 1908, after Muncy's failure to pay the rent, Brain demanded possession thereof, which Muncy refused to deliver. He did not deliver the automobile to Brain on June 30, 1908, as the first agreement provided he should do, but retained possession thereof. On July 11, 1908, Brain, in an action of claim and delivery against Muncy, obtained possession thereof. Judgment in said action was given in favor of Brain. After Brain sued for possession of the automobile, Muncy demanded of him the possession of the pledged stock, which was refused. Thereupon Muncy, claiming this to be an unlawful conversion of the stock to his own use by Brain, began the present action to recover the value thereof as damages for the alleged conversion. Brain, by way of counterclaim, alleges that the stock sold for only $1,500 at the sale by him as pledgee, and that after applying this sum on the rent there remained unpaid a balance of $1,072.53, for which he asked judgment. The court made no findings on the facts stated in this counterclaim, but stated as a conclusion of law that defendant was not entitled to recover anything thereon, and gave judgment that plaintiff take nothing by his action and that each party pay his own costs.

It is not asserted that the execution of these contracts was induced or procured by any misapprehension of their effect, or by fraud, mistake, coercion, or undue influence. Muncy entered into the transaction, and signed them with accurate knowledge of their terms. His contention is that the several instruments, constituting, as they do, but one contract, did not provide for a lease of the automobile for a fixed term upon a certain rental, with an option, available only after, and in the event of, performance of the prescribed precedent condition, to buy the automobile for $6.25, but that, although in form of the effect just stated, their true legal effect was to provide for a conditional sale of the automobile for the price of $2,735.45, being the aggregate of the several sums named as rental and the $6.25 stated as the price in the third agreement. Upon this theory of the effect of the contracts he claims that Brain had but two alternatives upon a failure of performance by Muncy—he could either take the automobile back, or he could leave it with Muncy and obtain payment of the price by a sale of the pledged corporate stock, but could not, after having elected to retake the automobile, retain his right as pledgee, or recover the amount due by the contract nominally as rent, but really, as is claimed, as the price thereof.

The cases hold that where there is a contract which by its terms, or by the liberal interpretation sometimes to that end indulged by the courts, constitutes an agreement for the sale of personal property, the title to pass only upon the condition that the price is paid and not until then, the title in the meantime remaining in the seller, possession being given to the buyer, and providing that the seller may retake possession upon default in payment, the seller, upon such default, is put to his election either to retake possession and relinquish all right to the price, or to recover the price and relinquish the right to retake possession, and that, if he pursues one remedy, he loses his right to the other. Parke & Lacy Co. v. White River L. Co., 101 Cal. 37, 35 Pac. 442; Holt Mfg. Co. v. Ewing, 109 Cal. 353, 42 Pac. 435.

The question whether or not the transaction was in legal effect a lease or a conditional sale is not necessarily involved in the determination of this appeal, and therefore we need not consider it. Conceding, for the sake of the argument, that it was a conditional sale, it would nevertheless be a sale upon the conditions stated in the contracts, and not upon any other terms or conditions. Although Muncy may even now have the right to buy, he can only do so upon the terms and at the price fixed by the contract, and in the meantime his right to possession of the automobile, his obligations to pay the sums agreed on, and the rights of Brain concerning the same, are all to be determined by the provisions of the contract in that behalf. The sum of $2,537.50 was to be paid on June 25th. The obligation to pay it at that time was not dependent on any conditions, concurrent or otherwise, but was absolute, and such payment did not operate to transfer title. Immediately upon default in such payment, Brain became entitled to enforce payment, and this right was neither dependent nor concurrent upon the delivery or retention of the possession of the automobile, nor upon any other act or event. Brain was therefore within his contract rights when he enforced payment pro tanto by a lawful sale of the pledged stock. With regard to the possession of the automobile, the provision was that it should be delivered to Brain on June 30th. Muncy's right of possession ceased on that day absolutely and unconditionally. The prompt payment of the $2,537.50 on June 25th would not relieve him from the obligation to deliver the automobile in good order to Brain on June 30th. He could not, under the conditions of the contract, again acquire a right to possession until July 3d in any event, and then only upon full payment of the price and an exercise of the option given by the second instrument. He does not claim that he offered to exercise that option prior to the suit of Brain in claim and delivery, or that he ever, under the terms of the contract, gained a right to exercise it. Hence he never was entitled to the possession after June 30th, and Brain was, from and after that day, entitled thereto. His conduct in retaking possession, whether by suit or not, was not a violation of the rights of Muncy under the contract. Nor was it inconsistent with Muncy's right to purchase. Miller v. Steen, 30 Cal. 407, 89 Am. Dec. 124; Liver v. Mills, 155 Cal. 463, 101 Pac. 299. A right of the buyer to complete a purchase may exist, notwithstanding the fact that the seller has possession. If the provisions making time of the essence of the contract, and limiting the right to buy to the very day fixed, are to be taken literally and strictly enforced, then the other provisions are to be given like force, and there was no agreement of sale at all, but a lease, accompanied by a mere option to buy, and option never exercised and dependent upon conditions which have never occurred, in which case the money would be due absolutely as rent and not upon a purchase, and Brain would have a clear right to sell the pledged stock for its payment. If they are not to be so construed or enforced, but taken as a conditional sale, then the provisions making time of the essence, and requiring the option to be exercised on the precise day fixed, were waived by Brain when he elected to take the price, after it was past due, and, although he was entitled to possession of the automobile after June 30th by virtue of the provision to that effect, he would hold it subject to the right of Muncy to complete his purchase by paying the balance due Brain upon the price after deducting the sum realized by the sale of the pledged stock. Liver v. Mills, supra; Miller v. Steen, supra. In either alternative the sale by Brain of the pledged stock was lawful and not inconsistent with his right to take possession of the automobile and hold it, at least until a proper offer to buy was made by Muncy. The rule laid down in the decisions first above cited, that upon a conditional sale the seller cannot retake the property and also recover the contract price, applies where the property is given into the buyer's possession by virtue of the contract of sale until the time when payment is to be completed and the passing of the title to the buyer is concurrent with and dependent upon the payment of the price. It does not apply where the contract declares that the seller shall retain the possession, or where, as here, it provides for its redelivery to him at a fixed date, different from the time for the completion of the sale and passing of title, and not dependent thereon. In cases of the latter character the seller may recover the price and retain possession until full payment thereof is made. There was therefore no unlawful conversion of the stock.

The judgment is affirmed.

BOONE v. TEMPLEMAN et al. (S. F. 4,995.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1910.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 187*)—DEFAULT BY PURCHASER—WAIVER.

Acceptance by the vendor of installments on the price without objection long after they fell due was a waiver of all previous breaches.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 375; Dec. Dig. § 187.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 95*)—DEFAULT BY PURCHASER—WAIVER.

Mere acceptance by the vendor of one payment after its maturity does not waive the right to declare a forfeiture if default occurs in subsequent installments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 159; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 95*)—DEFAULT BY PURCHASER—WAIVER.

The vendor waived the right to forfeit for nonpayment of installments of the price on time where, while the purchaser was in possession, 14 successive payments were accepted after maturity without protest, and the vendor apparently acquiesced in the continuance of the contract, giving no notice to the contrary, or doing anything inconsistent therewith for 14 months more, though 24 monthly installments, principal and interest, fell due, and were not paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 159; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§§ 97, 303*)—DEFAULT BY PURCHASER—VENDOR'S RIGHTS.

Where a contract to convey makes the price payable in installments and a deed is to pass when the whole is paid, the vendor may on failure to pay any intermediate installment forthwith sue for its recovery, but, if he allows the whole to become due, the payment of the price then becomes a dependent and concurrent condition. Nonpayment alone does not put the purchaser in default, and the vendor must tender his deed as a condition to demanding payment of the price, and he cannot without such tender declare a forfeiture or sue for the price or for any installment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 162, 851–859; Dec. Dig. §§ 97, 303.*]

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 78*)—CONTRACT TO CONVEY—TIME AS ESSENCE.

Where time was originally of the essence of a contract to convey, but for sufficient cause forfeiture for default therein has been waived, time ceases to be essential, and becomes only material thereafter until the vendor makes it essential by proper notice and demand.

A complaint for specific performance of a contract to convey will not be held bad for laches on demurrer, where it does not appear that the vendor has been prejudiced by the delay.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William Waste, Judge.

Action by P. R. Boone against Henry Templeman and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

SHAW, J. Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendants, given after a ruling sustaining a general demurrer to the complaint. The sole question presented is the sufficiency of the facts stated in the complaint to constitute a cause of action.

The plaintiff sued to enforce specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, executed by him as purchaser, and by Templeman as vendor. Mayer is a subsequent purchaser from Templeman, with notice of plaintiff's rights. The contract of sale was in writing, and was executed on October 17, 1901. The price fixed for the land was $2,750, of which $600 was paid at the time of the execution of the contract. The remainder, $2,150, was to be paid thereafter in monthly installments of $50 each, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, said installments and interest to be paid in advance on the 5th day of each month, beginning on November 5, 1901. The interest was to be compounded if not paid as it fell due. If any installment of principal and interest was not paid within 60 days after it became due, the whole of the unpaid portion of the price should, at the election of the vendor, forthwith become due, in which event the vendor was given power to sell the land to pay the sum unpaid and all previous payments were thereupon to become forfeited. The title to the land remained in the vendor, and he was to convey the same to Boone when the price was fully paid. Boone was to have immediate possession, and he was to pay all taxes and assessments on the land. He received immediate possession and has ever since retained possession of the land, occupying and using it, but making no improvements. Time was declared to be of the essence of the contract.

In addition to the $600 paid when the contract was executed Boone paid $50 on November 2, 1901, $50 on December 12, 1901, $150 on March 27, 1902, $100 on June 8, 1902, $150 on September 8, 1902, and $250 on April 24, 1903. He has made no other payments of principal or interest. Nothing is averred concerning taxes and assessments. The amended complaint was filed on July 19, 1907. The date of filing the original complaint is not shown in the record on appeal. Counsel for respondents in their brief say the action was begun on March 18, 1907, and this is not controverted.

The contention of the respondents is that, by his failure to make the payments of the contract price as they fell due, the plaintiff has forfeited his rights to a conveyance under the contract, and that, by reason of his delay and laches in beginning the action, it has become barred. Anticipating these assertions, the plaintiff alleges certain facts which he claims excuses the failure and delay and prevents the forfeiture of his rights. It will be observed that only one payment was made when due, that of November 2, 1901, which was three days in advance of the time specified. The others were all made after the time fixed. The installments due in January, February, and March, 1902, respectively, were paid in a lump sum of $150 on March 27th. Those for April 5 and May 5, 1902, were not paid until June 8th. Those for June, July, and August, 1902, were not paid until September 8th. The next and last payment, $250, was on April 24, 1903, and this would pay up for only five additional months, including the $50 falling due February 5, 1903. We have not included the accruing interest in this computation. It is alleged that each of these payments was accepted by Templeman "without objecting thereto on the ground that plaintiff was not complying with his contract." Templeman never demanded any payments whatever, and never, until July, 1906, notified plaintiff that he was delinquent in making payments on the price, and he has never tendered a deed or demanded the balance of the price. So far as appears, he never demanded possession. In July, 1906, Templeman, without any previous demand for performance, gave Boone a written statement purporting to rescind said contract. Boone immediately offered to pay Templeman $1,000 upon the price, asked a statement of the exact balance due, and offered to pay the whole thereof as soon as it was ascertained. Templeman refused to accept the $1,000, or to give a statement of the balance due, but said he would consider and let Boone know in a few days what he would do about it. Templeman did not make any further communication to Boone on the subject. On December 3, 1906, Boone made an offer in writing to Templeman to pay all sums of money due under the contract and to fully perform the same upon the condition that Templeman should perform on his part by executing the necessary deed. Boone was then, and ever since has been, ready, willing, and able to perform. Templeman made no objection to the sufficiency of Boone's offer, nor any objection thereto whatever, but referred Boone to his attorneys. His attorneys were forthwith seen, and they said Templeman would at once begin suit against Boone about the matter. No suit was begun by Templeman, however, and, after learning from Templeman's attorneys that such suit would not be instituted, Boone began the present action.

The plaintiff contends that the conduct of Templeman in the matter amounts to a waiver of the condition that time should be of the essence of the contract, and of his right to declare a forfeiture for nonpayment. The general rule on the subject is thus stated by Mr. Pomeroy: "A condition that the title shall be made, or the price shall be paid, on or before a day named, may be waived by the party entitled to performance; and if such party thus waives the exact performance at the day, or if he goes on treating the agreement as still binding after default has been made, he cannot afterwards turn around and set up the delay or default as creating a forfeiture, and therefore a defense." Pomeroy on Contracts, § 337. "The one entitled to insist upon a punctual performance by the other or else that the agreement be ended may waive his right and the benefit of any objection which he might raise to a performance after the prescribed time, either expressly or by his conduct; and his conduct will operate as a waiver when it is consistent only with a purpose on his part to regard the contract as still subsisting, and not ended by the other party's default." Id. § 294. Mr. Sugden says: "Although time be made of the essence of the contract, yet the condition may be waived, just as in an ordinary case; but, if the purchase money is to be paid by installments, each breach in nonpayment is a new breach of the agreement, and gives the seller a right to rescind the contract, but that right should be asserted the moment the breach occurs." 1 Sugden on Vendors, c. 6, § III-20, *p. 271. To this point are cited Hunter v. Daniel, 4 Hare, 432, Linscott v. Buck, 33 Me. 530, and Grigg v. Landis, 21 N. J. Eq. 506, which fully support the text. Mr. Warvelle says: "Where a forfeiture has been practically waived by partial payments by the vendee after the time prescribed, the vendee cannot then suddenly stop short and insist upon a forfeiture for the nonpayment of the arrears remaining unpaid, without any previous notice of the intention to do so if the arrears are not paid"—citing Harris v. Troup, 8 Paige (N. Y.) 426, and to the same effect 2 Warville on Vendors, § 820, p. 962.

These authorities make it clear that the acceptance of payments of installments on the price by Templeman, without objection long after they had become due, was a waiver of all breaches which had occurred at or prior to the time such payments were actually made, and that he could not afterwards insist upon a forfeiture on account thereof. On April 24, 1903, when the last payment was made, after crediting that payment, there still remained due and unpaid the two installments for March and April of that year, and all the interest accrued to that date. As to these breaches the forfeiture was waived. The respondent does not seriously dispute this. But $1,200 of the price became due after April, 1903, and there was a new breach of the agreement on the 5th of May and on the 5th of each month thereafter, until May 5, 1905. The controlling question in the case, therefore, is whether or not the conduct of Templeman as averred in the complaint, constituted a waiver of the condition that time was of the essence of the contract, as applied to the payments falling due after April 24, 1903, when the last sum paid was accepted.

The decisions are not entirely harmonious on this point. We find none that goes so far as to hold that the mere acceptance of one payment after its maturity will waive the right to declare a forfeiture if default occurs in subsequent installments. In Lent v. Burlington, etc., Co., 11 Neb. 201, 8 N. W. 431, the court on this point says: "The simple act of receiving a payment after the date when the payee was bound to accept it, without more, is no excuse for laches as to future payments. The effect of the acceptance is exhausted upon the payment made, and, as to those following, the provisions of the contract are left to operate with unimpaired force." To the same effect are Phelps v. Ill. C. R. Co., 63 Ill. 470; Stow v. Russell, 36 Ill. 18; Keefe v. Fairfield, 184 Mass, 334-337, 68 N. E. 342; Cash v. Meisenheimer, 53 Wash. 576, 102 Pac. 429. But in the present case we have much more than this. Boone was in the possession and in actual use of the land during the whole period. A payment of $50 was due on the price on the 5th of every month after November, 1901. Not one of these payments had been made on the day they were due, nor, except the first, until months afterwards. Fourteen payments in succession had been accepted after maturity and without objection or protest of any kind. Interest fell due each month, but nothing was paid as interest, and none was demanded, nor were any objections raised on that score. After the acceptance of the last sum paid, 24 additional payments of principal and interest fell due and were not paid; Boone remaining in possession and Templeman apparently acquiescing in the continuance of the contract, giving no notice to the contrary, nor doing anything inconsistent therewith for still another period of 14 months. We think from these facts a court might infer a waiver of the conditions regarding forfeiture and time, and that they supported the general allegation of the complaint that Templeman had waived those conditions. The authorities with practical unanimity so hold. In Monson v. Bragdon, 159 Ill. 66, 42 N. E. 385, the court, upon similar facts, says: "While not necessarily an absolute permanent waiver, yet in a court of equity there was at least such a temporary suspension of the right (of forfeiture) as could only be restored by his giving a definite and specific notice of an intention to that effect." Similar rulings were made in Steele v. Branch, 40 Cal. 13; Hudson v. Duke, 21 Ga. 403; Kansas L. Co. v. Horrigan, 36 Kan. 387, 13 Pac. 564; Pier v. Lee, 14 S. D. 600, 86 N. W. 642; Timmins v. Russell, 13 N. D. 487, 99 N. W. 48; Merriam v. Goodlett, 36 Neb. 384, 54 N. W. 686; Gaughen v. Kerr, 99 Iowa, 214, 68 N. W. 694; Cughan v. Larson, 13 N. D. 373, 100 N. W. 1088; Fargusson v. Talcott, 7 N. D. 183, 73 N. W. 207; Keator v. Ferguson, 20 S. D. 473, 107 N. W. 678, 129 Am. St. Rep. 947; Peck v. Brighton Co., 69 Ill. 200.

Another proposition seems applicable to the question of forfeiture. Templeman did not exercise his option to declare the whole price due upon the default for sixty days in paying any of the installments, but suffered it all to become due by lapse of time. Where in a contract for the sale of land the price is made payable in installments at different times and the deed is to be made when the whole is paid, the vendor may, upon failure to pay any intermediate installment, forthwith sue for its recovery. But, if he allows the whole to become due, the payment of the price then becomes a dependent and concurrent condition. Nonpayment alone does not put the vendee in default. The vendor must tender a deed as a condition to demanding payment of the price, and he cannot, without such tender, declare a forfeiture, or maintain a suit either for the whole price, or for an intermediate installment. McCroskey v. Ladd, 96 Cal. 459, 31 Pac. 558; Russ v. Muscupiabe, etc., Co., 120 Cal. 526, 52 Pac. 995, 65 Am. St. Rep. 186; Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 18, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Underwood v. Tew, 7 Wash. 297, 34 Pac. 1100; Malaby v. Kuns, 3 Ind. 388; Gorham v. Reeves, 3 Ind. 83; McCulloch v. Dawson, 1 Ind. 419; Cunningham v. Gwinn, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 343, and cases cited in McCroskey v. Ladd, supra. There are a few cases to the contrary. Duncan v. Charles, 4 Scam. (Ill.) 566; Sheeren v. Moses, 84 Ill. 448; Biddle v. Coryell, 18 N. J. Law, 377, 38 Am. Dec. 521. Templeman did not declare a forfeiture, nor take any steps toward doing so until July, 1906, more than a year after the last payment became due. He could not at that time put Boone in default as to any of the payments so as to work a forfeiture without tendering a conveyance of the land. Until Boone was in default there was no right of forfeiture. He attempted to declare a forfeiture without tendering a deed. Having, by his conduct, waived the right of forfeiture for nonpayment of the installments at the precise date of maturity, he could not, after the whole became due, revive or renew it without previous notice accompanied by a tender of a deed. Upon the face of the complaint we hold that the contract is still subsisting. We find nothing in the opinion in Glock v. Howard, supra, in any manner inconsistent with what is here said. That was a suit against a vendor to recover purchase money paid. The subject of a waiver of the right to a forfeiture was not involved. We have treated the case upon the theory that a forfeiture would occur by a mere failure to pay an intermediate installment, and without awaiting the lapse of 60 days and giving the notice of election to declare the whole due, as provided in the contract. As the question has not been argued and the contract is not set out in full, we do not wish to be understood as definitely deciding anything to that effect.

On the subject of laches the following statements of Prof. Pomeroy are pertinent: "When the purchaser has received the equitable title, has obtained possession of the land, has been in the enjoyment of its rents and profits, has paid the price, and nothing remains to complete the contract except the conveyance of the legal title, and nothing has happened which rendered the want of the legal title injurious or detrimental to the vendee, a delay in conveying the legal title, though lasting through many years, and without any excuse of real difficulty in the way, has been repeatedly held to be no impediment to a decree of specific performance. The same is true where the delay has been in completing the payment, provided there has been no substantial change in the circumstances and relations of the parties during the interval, and the interest will constitute not only a theoretical, but an actual compensation for the purchaser's default in payment." Pomperoy on Contr. § 400. The italics are ours. And again: "If the vendee, therefore, takes and retains possession of the premises with the vendor's consent, his mere delay in bringing a suit, or even in paying the price, will not prevent him from compelling a conveyance upon a subsequent payment or tender of the amount due; nor will his right to the relief be cut off until the vendor places a limit to the lapse of time by a demand of payment at or before a specified day, and a notice that the agreement will be rescinded unless the demand is complied with, and the vendee's default thereon." Id. § 404.

It is to be observed that these principles apply where time is merely material to the contract, and not where it is essential. Where time was originally essential, but for sufficient cause a forfeiture for default therein has been waived, time ceases to be essential, and becomes only material thereafter until the vendor again makes it essential by a proper notice and demand. In the case at bar, upon the facts shown by the complainant, a forfeiture had been waived, and thereafter time was not essential, but its efflux was a material fact bearing upon the right of Boone to enforce performance by suit. The defense of laches may be made where the lapse of time is less than the statutory period of limitation, but in such cases it can be maintained only where from the delay and the circumstances there appears either actual or presumptive injury or prejudice to the other party. Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 47, 78 Pac. 467; Cohen v. Cohen, 150 Cal. 105, 88 Pac. 267; Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 493, 89 Pac. 317. This case is submitted to the court upon the statement of the facts made by the vendee in his complaint. It appears that the vendor, by the contract, is entitled to 8 per cent. annual interest, and that at least until the final payment became due it was payable monthly and compounded monthly. The contract is not set out according to its tenor, but only in substance and effect. There is nothing in the facts before the court to indicate that this interest will not fully compensate Templeman for the delay in payment of the principal, or that he has been at all prejudiced thereby. What may be disclosed when the defendant has answered and the facts developed by a trial may alter the case materially on this point. Upon the complaint alone, we are of the opinion that no laches is shown.

The judgment is reversed.

FAIRCHILD-GILMORE-WILTON CO. v. SOUTHERN REFINING CO. (L. A. 2,541.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1040*)—HARMLESS ERROR—OVERRULING DEMURRER.

Error in overruling a demurrer to a complaint which failed to separately state causes of action on two distinct contracts of sale was harmless where defendant was not prevented from presenting its defense as effectively as if the causes had been separately stated and where the contracts were treated as one.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4089–4105; Dec. Dig. § 1040.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 433*)—CURE OF ERROR—UNCERTAIN PLEADING.

Where asphalt is contracted to be sold under different quotations in single and double headed packages, failure of the buyer's complaint for the seller's breach to state whether asphalt purchased elsewhere at a higher price was packed in single or double headed packages was cured by a finding that it was all packed in single-headed packages.

3. TIME (§ 5*)—"MONTH"—MEANING OF.

The word "month" in a contract to sell 4,000 tons of asphalt to be delivered on orders not exceeding 400 tons "in any one month" payments to be made on the 10th of each month for asphalt delivered during the preceding month meant calendar month.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4574–4575; vol. 8, p. 7724.]

4. SALES (§ 71*)—DELIVERY—EFFECT OF CONTRACT.

Under a contract to sell 4,000 tons of asphalt to be delivered on orders not exceeding 400 tons in any one month, the seller was not bound to deliver more in any one month than was demanded, nor more than 400 tons to make up for smaller orders in previous months, but was bound to make deliveries to cover deficient shipments, either in such quantities as were demanded or the contracts would be extended by operation of law if the buyer insisted, until full delivery was made at 400 tons a month.

5. PLEADING (§ 239*) — AMENDMENT — CONDITIONS.

Where the buyer in an action for the seller's failure to make full delivery stipulated as a condition for permission to amend at the trial that recovery might be limited to defaults subsequent to a particular time, findings based on demands for delivery before that time were improper.

6. EVIDENCE (§ 215*)—ADMISSIONS—DAMAGES.

In an action for a seller's failure to make full deliveries contracted, whereby the buyer was compelled to buy elsewhere at a higher rate, a letter written by the seller to the buyer after the breach offering to sell at a price higher than the contract price was properly submitted as an admission tending to show value at that time.

7. SALES (§ 416*)—BREACH BY SELLER—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

In an action for a seller's failure to make full deliveries contracted, evidence that plaintiff purchased at a higher rate in the open market while the seller was failing to fill contract orders was immaterial, though the fact was alleged and denied, since it was not essential to the buyer's right to recover.

8. Sales (§ 418*)—Breach by Seller—Damages—Measure.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3308, 3354, a buyer's measure of damages for breach of a contract to sell asphalt was the excess over the contract price of the market value in the nearest market at such time after the breach as would enable the buyer by reasonable diligence to buy an equivalent amount, regardless of whether it actually bought an equivalent quantity or of the price paid.

9. Witnesses (§ 268*)—Cross-Examination—Sales.

Where a witness in an action for breach of contract to deliver goods sold testified to market value, it was proper to ask him on cross-examination as to the profit he would make per ton at that price.

10. Sales (§ 101*) — Contracts — Seller's Right to Rescind.

One who contracted to sell asphalt on monthly deliveries and payments could not rescind as to remaining deliveries for the buyer's failure to make payments on time where the course of dealings showed that the seller did not intend to insist on prompt payments, and where the seller was delinquent in deliveries.

11. Contracts (§ 264*)—Right to Rescind—Performance.

12. Contracts (§ 261*)—Building Contracts—Rescission—Grounds.

Generally a building contractor can rescind for the owner's failure to pay installments of contract price on time.

Action by the Fairchild-Gilmore-Wilton Company against the Southern Refining Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order refusing a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

McNutt & Hannon, J. W. McKinley and Byron M. Marble for appellant. Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action by plaintiff, a buyer of certain asphalt, to recover of the defendant, the seller thereof, damages for the alleged failure of the seller to deliver the asphalt as the contract provided. Plaintiff obtained judgment for $19,463.56. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

There were two contracts for the sale of asphalt. Both were made in the form of a written proposal by the defendant to sell and a written acceptance thereof by the plaintiff. The first was made on January 3, 1906, as follows: "Referring to conversation had at your office some several days since with reference to furnishing you with 4,000 tons asphalt, 'D' and 'DX' grades, we beg to submit herewith proposal covering same as follows: We propose to furnish you with 4,000 tons asphalt, grades 'D' and 'DX', our make, at $7.00 per ton, gross weight, f. o. b. our refinery when packed in single headed packages, and $7.50 per similar ton when packed in double headed packages. Said amount of asphalt, viz.: 4,000 tons to be taken within one year from January 1st, 1906. Deliveries to be made as rapidly as possible, provided, however, not more than 400 tons is ordered or called for in any one month. Payments for said asphalt to be made on the 10th day of each month for all material delivered during the preceding month. This proposal to be subject, however, to strikes, fires and other causes beyond our control." The second contract was made on May 16, 1906. It is identical in language with the first, excepting (1) the date, which is May 16, 1906; (2) the time within which the asphalt was to be taken, which is "one year from May 16th, 1906," instead of one year from January 1, 1906, as in the first contract; and (3) that immediately preceding the last clause the following clause was inserted: "This in addition to amount agreed to furnish you January 3, 1906."

The complaint consisted of but one count. It alleged the delivery of 5,005.615 tons of asphalt, under both contracts, prior to January 26, 1907, the demand by plaintiff of the defendant and the refusal of defendant to deliver the remaining 2,994.385 tons called for thereby; that, by reason of such failure, plaintiff was compelled to and did buy 2,994.385 tons of asphalt of equal quality in open market at current market rates, and to pay therefor at the rate of $15 per ton, whereby plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $23,955.08. The finding of the court was that the plaintiff paid $13.50 for the asphalt bought to supply the deficiency, and that it was damaged to the amount of $19,463.56 by the defendant's failure to deliver.

1. The first point urged by appellant is that the two contracts were separate and independent; that the breach of each would be a cause of action, irrespective of the other; and hence that the complaint avers two causes of action which are not separately stated. This objection is now made a ground of demurrer. Code Civ. Proc. § 430. It is one of the grounds of the demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled in the court below. It may be admitted that the contracts were independent, that the last was not a mere supplement to or alteration of the first, and that two causes of action are alleged. It is evident that this method of stating the plaintiff's case did not prevent the defendant from presenting its defense, or its case to the court as fully and effectively as it could have done if each contract had been pleaded separately as the foundation of a distinct cause of action. It appears from the evidence that in fact both parties, after the making of the second contract, treated the two as one, kept no separate account of either, and that the orders were given, and the deliveries and payments made, without distinguishing them in any way by any reference to there being different contracts. The terms of the two were identical, except as to dates. The method of pleading did not prejudice the defendant. Even if each had been made the subject of a separate count, the conduct of the parties in their performance was such that the cause must have been tried and the evidence introduced upon both together. This error of itself would not justify a reversal of the judgment.

2. The complaint is uncertain, in that it does not state whether the asphalt which it alleges the plaintiff had to buy because of the failure of the defendant to deliver the amount contracted for was packed in single-headed packages, or in double-headed packages. This made it impossible to determine whether the measure of damages—that is, the difference between the value of the asphalt to the plaintiff and the contract price—was $7.50 per ton or $8 per ton. To make the total amount claimed it should have been in single-headed packages, as that would have made a difference of $8 per ton. This defect, however, is cured by the finding that it was, in fact, all in single-headed packages, which was in accord with the uncontradicted evidence.

3. The most serious question in the case is the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain certain findings. In order to determine this question intelligently, it is necessary first to consider the effect of the contracts and the obligations imposed on the defendant thereby. Each contract was for the sale of 4,000 tons of asphalt to be taken within a year from its date, and delivered as rapidly as possible, but not more than 400 tons were to be ordered "in any one month." We think the proper construction of the contract of May 16th is that by the "one month," therein referred to, a calendar month was intended and understood. This is shown by the clause immediately following, to the effect that payments were to be made on the 10th of each month for all the asphalt delivered during the preceding month. Evidently both of these kindred provisions refer to the months of the calendar. They were so treated in the subsequent dealings. Each contract called for but 4,000 tons, and, if the full complement of 400 tons each month had been called for and delivered, each contract would have been performed within 10 months from its date. The defendant was not obliged to deliver more in any month than was demanded, unless it was delinquent for some previous month. We need not inquire whether or not, where the full amount for one month was ordered and the defendant failed to deliver it all, it was obliged, during the next or any succeeding month, in the life of the contract or afterward, to deliver more than 400 tons a month in making up the delinquency. As we understand the facts, this question does not arise.

It appears, however, from the admissions at the trial and the findings that the total amount delivered up to November 1, 1906, was only 4,360.339 tons. During that period the maximum quantities that could have been ordered under the contracts were 400 tons each month from January to April, inclusive, 600 tons for May and 800 tons each month from June to October, inclusive—a total of 6,200 tons. If the maximum had been ordered during each of these months, the deficit of 1,839.661 tons would have remained due, and defendant would have been obliged to deliver the same subsequently, either in such quantities as were demanded, or the life of the contracts would be extended by operation of law, if plaintiff insisted, until the full complement of 8,000 tons had been delivered at 400 tons per month. But, if all that was demanded during those months was then delivered, the defendant was not in default on November 1, 1906, and during the remainder of the terms of the contracts it was not under obligation to deliver more in any month than the respective contracts called for during the years specified therein; that is, 800 tons for November and December, 400 tons per month thereafter to May 1st, and 200 tons for the half of May, making 3,400 tons in all. The 4,360.339 tons delivered up to November 1, 1906, left 3,639.661 tons yet to deliver of the 8,000 tons contracted for. This was more by 239.661 tons than could be ordered during the continuance of the respective contracts, at the limited rate stipulated therein. Each contract expired at the end of the year specified therein, and thereafter the defendant was under no obligation to deliver any part of the total quantity contracted for therein, unless it was delinquent for failure to deliver the quantities rightfully ordered while the contract was in force.

It thus appears that the question whether or not the defendant was delinquent in the delivery of asphalt ordered prior to November 1, 1906, is important and material in determining the amount of its liability for damages. The finding was that the defendant delivered 5,005.615 tons and failed and refused to deliver the 2,994.385 tons necessary to make the 8,000 tons contracted for, and that the plaintiff was compelled to buy the amount of the deficiency at $13.50 per ton, in single-headed packages, which was $6.50 a ton in excess of the contract price, and a damage to the plaintiff in that sum per ton, the total damage for 2,994.385 tons at $6.50 a ton being $19,463.56, for which amount the judgment was given. As a basis for this the court also found that "during the months of the year 1906, in which said contracts were in force," the plaintiff demanded "at divers times during each of said months, the asphalt agreed to be furnished plaintiff under said contracts, stating the quality and amount required by plaintiff." It also found that like demands were made during the life of the second contract in 1907, coupled with a demand for the preceding deficits. It is contended that these findings are not sustained by the evidence.

The evidence as to demands during 1907, and as to the months of November and December, 1906, is sufficient to justify the findings as to those months. As to the months preceding November the finding is contrary to the express stipulation of the plaintiff at the trial. There was no dispute about the amount delivered up to November 1, 1906. It was admitted to be 4,360.339 tons, as above stated. The exact quantity for each month was stated in a writing admitted to be correct. During the trial the plaintiff offered to amend paragraph 5 of the complaint. The defendant objected that it would change the issues. Counsel for plaintiff then said that "for the purpose of avoiding any trouble over allegations of failure of defendant to comply with the demands prior to November 1, 1906, plaintiff was willing to stipulate that the defendant practically complied with the terms of the contract up to that date, and that it would not seek to show any shortage for the months preceding November 1, 1906." The court said: "The proposition is that any judgment should be for defaults after the 1st of November, 1906." This was agreed to, and thereupon the amendment to the complaint was allowed. The evidence was all directed to demands made after November 1st. It follows that the finding that demands were made in each month prior to November, 1906, for the full amount of 400 tons for each of those months, was unwarranted. The defendant was not shown to be in default on November 1, 1906.

The court finds, and it was admitted, that after October 31, 1906, defendant delivered 645.276 tons. As only 3,400 tons could have been lawfully demanded by plaintiff after that date, in the absence of prior delinquencies of defendant, it follows that the defendant was liable for a failure to deliver to the extent of 2,754.724 tons and no more. The delinquency charged in the findings and computed in the judgment was 2,994.385 tons. This was 239.661 tons more than defendant was liable for under the facts stipulated. This excess, at the rate of $6.50 per ton, would amount to $1,557.79. The judgment should have been that much less, or $17,905.77, instead of $19,463.56. For the same reasons it is obvious that the clause in finding that "the defendant was, during all of the months under said contracts, subsequent to May, 1906, constantly in arrears in furnishing the asphalt required by plaintiff," is also contrary to the evidence. It is not necessary to consider the other assignments as to insufficiency of the evidence.

4. A number of rulings on the admission and exclusion of evidence are assigned as error. In view of the necessity of a new trial it is proper to consider some of them. The letter of defendant to plaintiff dated January 14, 1907, offering to sell asphalt at $15 per ton, was properly admitted. It was competent as an admission of the defendant tending to show the value of asphalt at that time. Evidence of plaintiff's purchases of asphalt at $15 a ton in the open market during the time the defendant was failing to fill plaintiff's orders was immaterial. The fact was alleged and denied, but the allegation was not essential to plaintiff's right to recover. Upon the defendant's breach of the contract to sell and deliver the asphalt plaintiff was entitled to damages. The measure of damages was the excess, over the contract price of the market value of the asphalt in the nearest market, at such time after the breach as would enable the plaintiff by reasonable diligence to buy an equivalent amount. Civ. Code, §§ 3308, 3354. This it could recover whether it actually bought an equivalent quantity or not, and regardless of the price it paid for what it did buy. Evidence of the price paid for particular sales is not competent as evidence of value. The proof might have been admissible if the defendant had sought to show that plaintiff had succeeded in replacing the asphalt at less than the market value. But no such attempt was made. The question put to the witness Jones as to the profit he would make per ton at the price he had testified to be the market rate should have been allowed. It was proper cross-examination concerning his testimony as to the market value. Other like questions in cross-examination of other witnesses to value should have been permitted.

5. The last point for consideration is the claim of the defendant that it rescinded the second contract in January, 1907, and that the plaintiff cannot recover on either contract because it was in default in the payments for asphalt actually received. The contracts provided that on the 10th of each calendar month the plaintiff would pay the price of all asphalt delivered to it during the preceding month. The plaintiff never did pay the full amount due in any month, and on January 10, 1907, it owed the defendant $6,442.21 on account, the greater part of which was for asphalt previously delivered on the two contracts. Some sharp correspondence ensued between them in regard to the matter. On January 25th the defendant wrote plaintiff a letter, in which, after referring to the plaintiff's failure to accept a proposal for a new contract for another year at a higher price, it said: "We consider the matter a closed incident, and would at this time remind you that as you have, also, failed to keep your part of the agreement already supposed to be existing between us, we will, also, call this matter off. It only remains for you to settle your indebtedness to us after which our relations will be determined by the future." The defendant itself was at that time in default for failure to deliver asphalt ordered by plaintiff during the months of November and December, 1907, the amount of its delinquency being at least 1,000 tons. It appears from the evidence, and the court finds, that the plaintiff was in default in payments at each monthly pay day during the life of the contracts up to that time, but there is no evidence that it ever refused to pay. At each demand for payment the plaintiff had made partial payment of the sum due and had asked, and had been granted, indulgence in the time to pay the balance. To the letter of January 25th, the plaintiff answered on January 26th, by a statement that it was withholding payment as security for the damages it had suffered up to that time by the failure of the defendant to deliver the asphalt previously ordered. On January 28th the defendant, by letter, repudiated any liability for nondelivery and reiterated its refusal to deliver more. On January 29th the plaintiff disavowed its position assumed in its previous letter, and declared its willingness to pay in full for the asphalt delivered, remitting $6,150 as a payment in full of the account as shown on its own books, and offering to pay any further amount if the defendant's books showed a greater amount due, and again demanded the asphalt then deliverable under the two contracts. The entire balance was paid shortly afterwards. At the time the defendant declared, or attempted to declare, the rescission of the contracts, there had been a complete waiver by it of all right to rescind for delinquencies in payment prior to January 10, 1907, and the entire course of business indicated that it did not intend to insist on payment promptly on the day fixed. It was itself in arrears in delivery as above stated, and at the going price of asphalt as found by the court, $13.50 per ton, the plaintiff was entitled to damage, for the nondelivery for the last two months of 1907, in at least the sum of $6,500, which was more than the payments then due for the asphalt delivered at the contract price. The defendant was therefore in default as fully as the plaintiff. Under all these circumstances, we think the court below was justified in its conclusion upon the facts found that there was no effectual rescission of the contract as to the remaining months of the last contract, and that plaintiff's failure to pay did not bar its recovery. "The rule is general that the right to rescind a contract rests only with the party who is without default. One party cannot violate the contract himself, and then seek a rescission on the ground that the other party has followed his example." State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 458; 2 Chitty, Cont. (11th Am. Ed.) 1092; 2 Parsons, Cont. (9th Ed.) *p. 679.

We have assumed, for the purposes of the discussion on this point, that the seller of a stated quantity of goods, to be delivered in installments, which are to be paid for at fixed times, on or after delivery, has the right to rescind the contract upon an unexcused and unwaived failure of the buyer to pay an installment when due. In view of the fact that a new trial may be had and that the evidence may be different on such trial, we do not think it advisable to lay down this rule as the law of the case. In the course of the long litigation in the cases of Cox v. McLaughlin and the Western Pacific Railroad Company (44 Cal. 18; 47 Cal. 87; 52 Cal. 590; 54 Cal. 605; 63 Cal. 196; 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164), it was decided that, under the provisions of the contract there involved, the nonpayment of the installments of the contract price by McLaughlin as they fell due authorized Cox to rescind and sue on a quantum meruit for the value of the work done. That was a building contract. It is generally the case that progress payments upon such contracts are provided, so that the contractor may have funds wherewith to proceed with the subsequent work to be performed. It seems to be established in this state that in the case of building contracts, in the absence of special conditions or circumstances demanding a different rule, the rule above given is applicable. Porter v. Arrowhead Co., 100 Cal. 503, 35 Pac. 146; Golden Gate L. Co. v. Sahrbacher, 105 Cal. 116, 38 Pac. 635; San Francisco Bridge Co. v. Dumbarton, 119 Cal. 275, 51 Pac. 335. The same considerations do not so uniformly apply to a failure to make payments upon contracts for the sale of goods by installments wherein the price for the goods delivered is to be paid in full, as delivered, or at fixed dates after each delivery. There are no decisions on the precise point in this state. In other jurisdictions there is a conflict of authority on the question whether a mere failure to pay an installment at maturity, not amounting to a refusal to pay and not intended by the buyer as a repudiation or renunciation of the contract, nor understood to be such by the seller, will authorize a rescission by the seller. Benjamin on Sales (5th Ed.) notes to sections 560–609, p. 604; 2 Mechem on Sales, §§ 1140–1148, and notes. We prefer to leave the question open for further consideration hereafter, if it should arise.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

MURPHY v. CASEY. (Civ. 716.)

1. COSTS (§ 3*)—RIGHT TO COSTS—STATUTES. The right to costs is purely statutory.

2. COSTS (§ 22*)—RIGHT TO COSTS—STATUTES. Code Civ. 3. COSTS (§ 22*)—RIGHT TO COSTS—STATUTES. The disallowance of costs in an action in the superior court when judgment is for plaintiff for less than $300, as provided by Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by D. J. Murphy against James T. Casey. From an order refusing to strike out plaintiff's cost bill on the ground that he was not entitled to costs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Bond & Hays, for appellant. Park Henshaw, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action on June 12, 1909, to recover the sum of $462, an alleged balance due for board and lodging furnished to certain employés of defendant and for a certain quantity of corn sold and delivered to said defendant by plaintiff. The defendant answered the complaint in due time, and the cause was set down for trial for December 21, 1909. On the 20th day of December, 1909, the defendant served a written offer on the plaintiff to allow judgment to be taken for the sum of $200. This offer was filed on the 21st day of December, 1909, and on the same day the plaintiff accepted in writing said offer, and thereupon judgment was rendered and entered in favor of plaintiff for the amount so offered and accepted. Respondent thereafter filed his cost bill, and subsequently the defendant moved to strike out the same on the ground that, as the judgment rendered and entered in his favor was for a sum less than $300, plaintiff was not entitled to costs. The court made an order denying this motion, and it is from said order that the defendant presents this appeal.

The precise question submitted here is new in California, so far as we know to the contrary. We are of opinion, however, that plaintiff is not entitled to his costs, and that, therefore, the court erred in denying the motion to strike out his cost bill.

There must be in any case some statutory warrant for the allowance of costs. Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 122 Cal. 223, 54 Pac. 731. It is said in that case that "the right to recover costs is purely statutory, and, in the absence of a statute, no costs could be recovered by either party." It is quite obvious that, in order to justify the awarding of costs to the plaintiff in the case at bar, there must be imported into the statute language which the Legislature has omitted to insert therein, as an examination of the several sections of the Code relating to costs will readily affirm.

The offer and acceptance of a compromise judgment is authorized by section 997 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads: "The defendant may, at any time before the trial or judgment, serve upon the plaintiff an offer to allow judgment to be taken against him for the sum or property, or to the effect therein specified. If the plaintiff accept the offer, and give notice thereof, within five days, he may file the offer, with proof of notice of acceptance, and the clerk must thereupon enter judgment accordingly. If the notice of acceptance be not given, the offer is to be deemed withdrawn, and cannot be given in evidence upon the trial; and if the plaintiff fail to obtain a more favorable judgment, he cannot recover costs, but must pay the defendant's costs from the time of the offer." Section 1022, subdivision 3, of said Code, provides that "costs are allowed of course to the plaintiff, upon a judgment in his favor, * * * in an action for the recovery of money or damages, when plaintiff recovers three hundred dollars or over." Section 1025 expressly declares, without qualification or exception, that "no costs can be allowed in any action for the recovery of money or damages, when the plaintiff recovers less than three hundred dollars, nor in an action to recover the possession of personal property, when the value of the property is less than three hundred dollars."

Counsel for the respondent undertakes to maintain that the two last-mentioned sections relate entirely to cases wherein the issues tendered are actually litigated and by consequence do not apply to a case like the one at bar, where a compromise judgment is agreed to under the terms of section 997. But we cannot assent to that contention. Construing together, as we must, the three sections of the Code mentioned, we think that it is very clear that it was the intention of the Legislature to disallow costs in any case in which the judgment obtained is for less than the sum of $300 without regard to whether such judgment has been awarded after the issues involved have been actually tried or is entered without trial by agreement of the parties. We can perceive no sound or substantial reason for any other construction of the Code sections bearing upon the subject of costs.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The disallowance of costs in an action in the superior court where the judgment is for plaintiff in an amount less than the sum of $300 is in the nature of a penalty and manifestly intended to discourage the bringing of actions in the superior courts which should be tried in justices' courts. The acceptance by the plaintiff of an offer by the defendant to allow judgment to be entered against him for a sum less than that sued for is tantamount to a confession by plaintiff that the sum offered is as much as he could expect to obtain judgment for were the issues tried and litigated. No proposition can be more patent than that a compromise judgment taken under the authority of section 997 of the Code of Civil Procedure is no less a judgment than one rendered and entered after a trial, and, as declared, we have been pointed to no section of law relating to costs which can, by any possible construction, authorize, in such a case, the awarding of costs to either party where the judgment agreed to is below the sum of which the superior court has jurisdiction.

That part of section 997 which provides that, if a plaintiff fails to obtain a more favorable judgment than that involved in an offer of compromise, he cannot recover costs, simply and clearly means that even if, after the refusal of the offer, he should receive a judgment for an amount within the superior court's jurisdiction but less than for the amount offered, he would not be entitled to costs.

The respondent has cited a number of cases, which, with the exception of Lee v. Stern, 22 Mo. 576, throw little light on the question here. The case mentioned, which undoubtedly sustains the contention of respondent, was where the defendant, having made an offer to plaintiff, under a statute similar in its terms to section 997 of our Code, to take judgment for a sum below the court's jurisdiction, which offer was accepted by plaintiff, set up a right to the payment of his costs. The court held that there was no authority under said statute for the awarding of costs to the defendant, and affirmed the judgment for costs to plaintiff. But, as is manifest from what we have already said, we are not in accord with the conclusion reached in the Missouri case.

The construction here given these sections is sustained by the case of Moffett v. Deom, 8 Civ. Proc. R. (N. Y.) 85, where, under a statute also similar in its terms to section 997 of our Code of Civil Procedure, the defendant offered to allow the plaintiff to take judgment for a sum less than that of which the court had jurisdiction, and the offer was accepted. Both parties claimed costs. The court held that neither party was entitled to costs; that, "as the recovery was less than $50, there was no authority in the statute entitling the plaintiff to any costs, and the defendant, by making the offer, waived his statutory right thereto." See Johnson v. Sagar, 10 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 552. We think, as we have tried to show, that the New York case announces the true rule upon the question before us.

The order is reversed.

SKROCKI v. STAHL et al. (Civ. 733.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 30, 1910. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court, Sept. 20, 1910.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 6*)—ARTICLES LIBELOUS PER SE.

A newspaper article stating that plaintiff remarked to a fellow workman at the time of the assassination of President McKinley that "he ought to be killed," and that plaintiff was placed under arrest and held in jail, but subsequently released, etc., is libelous per se.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 3–16; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 113*)—LIBELOUS COMMUNICATIONS—DAMAGES.

One suing for language libelous per se may recover the actual damages suffered thereby, unless it is shown that the charge made is true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 342; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 73*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO SUE.

Under the statute providing that, in a civil action for libel, it is sufficient to state generally that the language was published concerning plaintiff, etc., a statement in a newspaper article that a decedent who had committed suicide had been an anarchist is not a basis for a cause of action in favor of decedent's brother.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 174; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

4. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 73*)—ARTICLES LIBELOUS PER SE.

The malicious defamation of the memory of the dead is an affront to the general sentiments of morality and decency, and, though the interests of society demand its punishment, the law does not contemplate the offense as causing any special damages to another individual, though related to decedent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 174; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

5. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§§ 94, 100*)—JUSTIFICATION—PLEADING—PROOF.

A defendant in pleading a justification in libel need not justify every word of the defamatory matter, but it is sufficient where the gist of the libelous charge is justified, and immaterial variance and defects of proof on minor matters may then be disregarded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 225, 249; Dec. Dig. §§ 94, 100.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1039*)—HARMLESS ERROR—PLEADING AND PROOF.

Where, in an action for libel based on an article stating that plaintiff at the time of the assassination of President McKinley stated that he ought to be killed, and that plaintiff was placed under arrest and held at the city jail, but subsequently released for failure to press the charge, the court charged that the burden of proof was on defendant to establish the truth of the material portion of the publication, and plaintiff did not request an instruction as to what portion of the article was material, the failure of defendant, relying on justification, to prove that plaintiff was arrested and detained in jail, was not prejudicial to plaintiff.

7. Appeal and Error (§ 1033*)—Harmless Error—Error Favorable to Party Complaining.

One suing for libel, based on a charge that he had remarked at the time of the assassination of President McKinley that he ought to be killed, may not complain of the overruling of an objection to a question asked him on cross-examination as to whether he was a Socialist.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4055; Dec. Dig. § 1033.*]

8. Libel and Slander (§ 107*)—Evidence—Admissibility.

In libel, evidence of what others said to plaintiff after the publication of the libel is not admissible to show plaintiff's mental suffering.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 299, 300; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

9. Libel and Slander (§ 105*)—Evidence—Admissibility.

Where, in libel, there was no controversy nor uncertainty as to the person to whom the libelous language referred, evidence of what was said to plaintiff by others after the publication of the libel was inadmissible to show that the libelous words were understood to refer to plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 283; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

10. Appeal and Error (§ 1033*)—Harmless Error—Erroneous Instructions.

Where two defendants were jointly charged with publishing a libel, an instruction that the jury could find a verdict against one of the defendants if he was liable for the publication, though they might believe that the codefendant had no connection with it, was not prejudicial to plaintiff, as it was in his favor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4056-4058; Dec. Dig. § 1033.*]

11. Constitutional Law (§ 42*)—Validity of Statutes—Party Entitled to Raise Question.

Where, in an action for libel, plaintiff did not give a bond, and the court did not allow anything for attorney's fees on defendant recovering judgment, the question of the validity of the statute requiring plaintiff in libel to file a bond and allowing a counsel fee to the successful defendant could not be raised by plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 40; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

12. Constitutional Law (§ 248*)—Equal Protection of the Laws.

The statute allowing counsel fees in an action for libel allows as costs to the prevailing party counsel fees, and the statute is not invalid as discriminating between the parties, and denying them the equal protection of the laws.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 703; Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

13. Statutes (§ 67*)—Special Legislation—Retroactive Operation of Constitutional Prohibition.

The statute allowing a counsel fee in an action for libel in force at the time of the adoption of the present Constitution is not objectionable as special legislation in violation of the present Constitution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by Walter Skrocki, sometimes known as Walter Skdocki, against H. F. Stahl and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

BURNETT, J. The action, being for libel, was tried before a jury, and the general verdict was in favor of the defendants. The alleged defamatory matter was published in the "Vallejo Evening News," a daily newspaper, of which the defendants are the owners and publishers, according to the undenied allegation of the complaint. The article complained of stated that a brother of plaintiff had committed suicide, leaving a letter setting forth the race track and slot machines as the reasons for ending his life. The tragic manner of his self-destruction is graphically described, and the article proceeds in the following strain, which is the gist of the offending: "Skrocki was an anarchist and a brother of Walter Skrocki, who, when President McKinley was assassinated remarked to a fellow workman on Mare Island, 'He ought to be killed.' He was placed under arrest and held at the city jail, but the complainant refusing to press the charge, the prisoner was released." It is denied in the answer that plaintiff was damaged to any extent, and by way of justification it is alleged that the statement as to plaintiff's declaration in regard to President McKinley was and is true, "and as a matter of fact the plaintiff did make said remark at the time and place and under the circumstances alleged." In mitigation of any damages to which plaintiff might appear to be entitled, it is set out in the answer that the matter of which complaint is made was reported to the defendants by W. T. Stanford, chief of police of the city of Vallejo, within 24 hours prior to the publication of the same, and that defendants at the time of the publication believed all things therein stated to be true and "the same were published by the defendants as matters of current public news."

The law of libel has been so frequently considered and clearly announced by the courts and text-writers that scarcely any feature of it is involved in doubt, and it may be said that little difficulty can be experienced here in the application of well-established principles to the facts of the case. Preliminarily, we may assert without further consideration that it cannot be disputed, and, indeed, is not, that the published article contains language which is libelous per se. It is such a defamation as would manifestly expose plaintiff "to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule," and, unless shown to be true, would entitle him to whatever actual damage he may have suffered thereby, and it may be said no claim was made to exemplary or punitive damages the plaintiff contending that defendants were chargeable with malice "in law," but acquitting them of any "malice in fact." At the trial there was substantial evidence that the plaintiff used the language attributed to him in the publication, and we may, therefore, as to this feature of the alleged libel, base the affirmation of the judgment upon the ground that the justification of defendants, shown to the satisfaction of the jury by the testimony of a witness, is not assailable on appeal, since it is admitted that the proof of the truth of the charge is a complete defense. It was not shown, however, that plaintiff's brother was an anarchist or that plaintiff himself was placed under arrest or held at the jail. The inquiry is thus presented whether those considerations affect the validity of the verdict and judgment.

As to the first, the failure to justify the publication seems entirely immaterial, since the allegation in the complaint does not constitute the basis for a cause of action in favor of plaintiff. "A malicious defamation * * * tending to blacken the memory of one who is dead" is indeed a libel, and may subject one to criminal prosecution, but the statute provides that in a civil action for damages "it is not necessary to state in the complaint any extrinsic facts for the purpose of showing the application to the plaintiff of the defamatory matter out of which the cause of action arose, but it is sufficient to state, generally, that the same was published or spoken concerning the plaintiff; and, if such allegation be controverted, the plaintiff must establish, on the trial, that it was so published or spoken." It is manifest that the charge concerning the brother of plaintiff was not published concerning the latter, and hence the requirement of the statute in this regard could not be complied with. As a matter of sound public policy, the malicious defamation of the memory of the dead is condemned as an affront to the general sentiments of morality and decency, and the interests of society demand its punishment through the criminal courts, but the law does not contemplate the offense as causing any special damage to another individual, though related to the deceased, and therefore it cannot be made the basis for recovery in a civil action. This probably is a necessary incident to the theory of the social relations entertained here where one is supposed to stand or fall upon his own merits, and where success or failure is entirely independent of the accidents of rank or family connection. It necessarily follows that, theoretically, at least, no man's success can be aided or retarded by the character of his relative. The defamation of such character, therefore, however grievous or disturbing, can afford no injury that can be measured by a pecuniary standard. At any rate, under the statute, appellant cannot complain because the defendants offered no proof of the truth of their accusation that plaintiff's brother was an anarchist. And, since the matter is entirely immaterial, of course, the court committed no error in sustaining an objection to the question propounded to plaintiff concerning his brother's political belief.

In relation to the failure to prove that plaintiff was arrested and detained in jail, it is entirely clear that this was without prejudice to any of his substantial rights. The rule established here by the authorities, and manifestly based on right reason, is that the defendants were not required to justify every word of the defamatory matter. It was sufficient if the gist or sting of the libelous charge was justified, and immaterial variances and defects of proof upon minor matters are to be disregarded if the substance of the charge be justified. Hearne v. De Young, 119 Cal. 670, 52 Pac. 150, 499. The sting of the charge here is that the plaintiff said that President McKinley "ought to have been killed." The clear implication is that plaintiff was a man of abandoned character, opposed to the reign of law and order, and favoring the assassination of public officials. In comparison with such a charge how insignificant is the accusation that he was arrested therefor and detained in jail. It would require certainly a good deal of temerity for any one to argue to a jury that, although defendants were justified in declaring in effect that plaintiff was an anarchist, he was damaged by the false publication in regard to his arrest. If this contention were made, the jury would probably conclude that such a man could not be and was not injured by such a comparatively trivial accusation.

Aside from the foregoing, it may be said that the jury were fully instructed that the burden of proof was upon the defendants to establish by a preponderance of the evidence the truth of the material portion of the publication, and that, if they believed the publication complained of had damaged plaintiff, it was the duty of the jury to assess the same at whatever sum they might believe from the evidence he had suffered, not to exceed the sum of $10,000. The presumption would be that the jury concluded that the plaintiff was not perceptibly damaged by any portion of the publication. If plaintiff had desired an instruction that the portion of the article in question was material, he should have requested it. While we are satisfied that it constitutes a circumstance of trifling importance, yet, as the record is presented, we cannot say that the jury did not consider it material, but we must rather assume that it was found to be without damage.

Some criticism is made of the action of the court in overruling plaintiff's objection to the question asked of him on cross-examination if he was a Socialist. Whether the question should have been allowed or not need not be discussed, as it is apparent the answer could have done no harm. If he had stated that he was a Republican or Democrat, he would have no less cause for complaint. While there may be some uncertainty in the public mind as to just what is a Republican or Democrat or Socialist, yet we apprehend that the distinctive political principles of any one of these organizations, as generally recognized, would not be urged by any fair-minded man in derogation of the mentality or character of the person espousing said principles. Indeed, if we accept Socialism as what its votaries declare it to be, "a theory or system of social reform which contemplates by peaceable means a reorganization of society with a more just and equitable distribution of property and labor," the average man would be impressed with its humanitarianism, although he might doubt its feasibility. At any rate, it would be a reflection upon the intelligence or sense of fairness of the jury to say that they were prejudiced against plaintiff by reason of his avowal of his connection with Socialism.

Complaint is also made of the refusal of the court to allow testimony of what was said to plaintiff by others after the publication of the alleged libel. This ruling was clearly right, and is upheld by the authorities. Turner v. Hearst, 115 Cal. 394, 47 Pac. 129; Hearne v. De Young, supra. Therein it is declared that such evidence is not admissible to show the mental suffering of the plaintiff or to show that the libelous words were understood by those who read them to refer to the plaintiff. Such evidence was equally inadmissible here. It could not be received for the first purpose for reasons stated by the Supreme Court, nor for the second, because no such issue is made by the pleadings. In fact, there is no controversy nor uncertainty as to the person to whom the language referred.

There is no error in the instructions of the court. When considered together, they seem to state the law consistently and accurately. Even if liable to the objections urged by appellant, we should have to assume that the criticized instructions were given at his request, in the absence of anything in the record to show to the contrary. But the law seems to have been stated by the learned judge as favorably to plaintiff as he had any right to expect. Assuredly there was no injury to plaintiff in the instruction that the jury might find a verdict against one of the defendants if he was liable for the publication, although they might believe the other had no connection with it. The effect of this was manifestly to accord to plaintiff the advantage of a several liability on the part of defendants, although they were jointly charged. According to appellant's contention, the jury should have been instructed that they must find against both of the defendants or neither, while the instruction as given presented, as we have seen, the more advantageous view of a joint and several liability. The case of Bradley v. Rosenthal, 154 Cal. 420, 97 Pac. 875, 129 Am. St. Rep. 171, is beside the mark, as here there is no question raised by the pleadings as to principal and agent.

Appellant contends that the statute requiring the plaintiff in an action for libel to file a bond and allowing a counsel fee to defendant in the event that the plaintiff fails to sustain his action is unconstitutional. But the question is hardly reviewable in this proceeding, as the record does not show that a bond was given or anything allowed for attorney's fee; it being recited in the judgment that defendants were entitled to so much for "costs and disbursements," without further specification. But, assuming that the question is properly presented, it is admitted by appellant that the Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of said act. Smith v. McDermott, 93 Cal. 421, 29 Pac. 34. It is claimed, however, that the decision is opposed to the principle announced in Gulf, etc., Ry. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 17 Sup. Ct. 255, 41 L. Ed. 666; Building Supply Depot v. O'Connor, 150 Cal. 267, 88 Pac. 982, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 909, 119 Am. St. Rep. 193; Union Lumber Company v. Simon, 150 Cal. 751, 89 Pac. 1077, 1081. It will be seen, though, upon examination that each of those cases involved, an entirely different statute and conditions from what we have here. In the Ellis Case, supra, it was decided that "a state statute imposing an attorney's fee not to exceed ten dollars, in addition to costs upon railway corporations omitting to pay certain claims within a certain time after presentation, which applies to no other corporations or individuals, is unconstitutional as denying to them the equal protection of the laws." The act not only singled out certain corporations, but, as said by the court: "They do not enter into the courts upon equal terms. They must pay attorney's fees if wrong. They do not recover any if right; while their adversaries recover if right and pay nothing if wrong." Therefore it was held that they were unequal before the law. For similar reasons in the O'Connor and Simon Cases, supra, it was decided that the provision in the mechanics' lien law allowing an attorney's fee to the plaintiff was unconstitutional and void.

The statute before us makes no such discrimination. The fee is allowed as costs to the party that prevails in the action. Hence the parties do "enter the courts upon equal terms."

If it were contended that it is special legislation and therefore obnoxious to the state Constitution, a sufficient answer would be that it was in effect at the time the present Constitution was adopted.

The record has received careful attention, but we find no prejudicial error therein.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by C. E. Steinegul against the Northern Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Seymour and A. F. Jones, for appellant. Guy R. Kennedy and Park Henshaw, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff brings the action as assignee of 24 separate claims for labor performed by certain Japanese for defendant, aggregating $804. The cause was tried by the court, and plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant appeals on bill of exceptions.

The court found that defendant admitted on the trial of the action "that all of the persons named in the complaint had performed labor for the number of days stated in said complaint." The court also found that the defendant hired said persons at the agreed price of $2 per day for ordinary laborers and $2.50 per day for foremen. The sole point in dispute is whether the men were employed by the defendant and to be paid by the defendant, or whether the contract of employment was made with one Howe upon what is termed a "force contract," i. e., Howe to furnish the men and to pay them and the company to pay Howe. No controversy arises over the rate of the wages to be paid, for that fact appeared substantially without conflict, as well as the fact that the men performed the labor claimed in the complaint. The contention of appellant is that the findings rest mainly upon the testimony of witness Howe, which, it is claimed, was shown by the cross-examination to be "inherently improbable," besides being flatly contradicted by several of defendant's witnesses.

We do not feel disposed to spend much time in a discussion of the testimony. We have carefully read all the evidence and do not discover any such inherent improbability in witness Howe's testimony as would justify its rejection. The contract was made by him, as he testified, for the Japanese by telephone communication with defendant's engineer, Barnes, who had authority to make it. Howe testified that the agreement was that the men were to work for defendant and to be paid by defendant; that there was nothing said at the time about a "force contract"; and that he had no interest in the wages and was not to pay the men, nor was he to receive their pay. A telephone operator present in the telephone office when the contract was made corroborated Howe in some particulars. There was evidence that the laborers themselves understood that they were working for the company. There was evidence sharply conflicting with Howe's testimony and tending to show that the contract was of the class known as a "force contract," and Barnes so testified. But the credibility of the witnesses, as well as the matter of reconciling the conflict in the testimony, was to be determined by the trial judge, and we find no sufficient warrant in the record for taking from him this responsibility. It is perfectly clear that defendant has received the benefit of the services rendered upon an agreement to pay the wages charged. The court, we think, upon sufficient evidence, held that the agreement was to pay the assignors of plaintiff.

Some errors of law are assigned as occurring in admitting and excluding certain testimony. The court remarked, towards the close of the evidence: "We have tried the case somewhat on broad principles, not according to the rules of the pleadings or rejecting testimony, but more with the idea of getting the true facts in the case." Some of the rulings indicate that the case was tried upon somewhat too "broad principles"; but we think no serious prejudice to defendant resulted. The court succeeded in "getting the true facts in the case," and that comes pretty near being the ultimate purpose of all trials in courts.

FURTINATI v. BUTTERFIELD et ux.

(Civ. 737.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 4, 1910.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 6*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 3386, 3392, providing that neither party to a contract can be compelled to perform it specifically unless the other party has performed either completely or nearly so, together with compensation for any want of entire performance, etc., a party to a contract may compel specific performance, though the adverse party could not do so, and though the party failed to completely perform his part of the contract.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 931*)—PRESUMPTIONS—JUDGMENT—VALIDITY.

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 65*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—PERFORMANCE.

A contract for the sale and purchase of land bound the purchaser to plant land to grapes, and to cultivate the same, and stipulated that, on his failure to perform any part of his duty, the vendor could do so, and hold a lien on the property at specified wages, and provided that plaintiff guaranteed 95 per cent. of living vines at the end of three years. The vendor undertook the replanting of dead vines, and, after such replanting and proper cultivation, there was not a 95 per cent. stand of living vines, but the shortage was but little more than 5 per cent. The purchaser was refused an extension of time to which the contract entitled him to complete his part of the contract, and his failure to produce the 95 per cent. of living vines at the end of the third year was for some unforeseen reason which the contract contemplated might arise. The court gave the vendor compensation for his work and for damages. Held, that the court could at the suit of the purchaser compel specific performance of the contract under Civ. Code, §§ 3386, 3392, relating to specific performance.

4. COSTS (§ 201*)—TAXATION—NOTICE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1005, authorizing the court to prescribe a time less than five days for notice of the hearing of a motion, and section 1033, providing that a party dissatisfied with the costs claimed may file a motion for taxation by the court, the court may fix a time less than five days for the notice of the hearing of a motion to retax costs, and, where a party had notice of the hearing fixed by the court, he could not complain of the order made on his failure to appear at the time fixed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; E. W. Norton, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Bianchi Furtinati against F. E. Butterfield and wife. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order retaxing the costs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. W. Miller, for appellants. Webster & Webster, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. Plaintiff had judgment, from which and from the order retaxing the costs, defendants appeal.

It appears from the amended complaint that on November 14, 1905, defendants entered into a written contract with plaintiff (wife of P. Bianchi, the action concerns her separate property) by which she was let into possession of certain 33⅓ acres of land belonging to defendants, situated in section 4, township 2 S., range 8 E., in San Joaquin county, plaintiff agreeing to plant the same to Tokay and Zinfandel grapes, in the proportion advised by defendants, prior to February 1, 1906, "to prepare said land for the cultivation of grapes only and is to grant, cultivate, prune, hoe and weed, and is to pay all expenses incurred thereto." It was further agreed that, should plaintiff "fail to perform any part of his (her) duty at the usual and customary time," defendants, "at their own option, perform said duties necessary for the cultivation of grapes, and hold a lien on the property hereinafter described as property belonging to" plaintiff, "at the following wages: One man per day, $2.00; one man and two horses with any kind of tool, $3.50; one man and four horses with plow, $5.00 per day"; plaintiff guaranteed "95 per cent of living vines at the expiration of three years." It was next provided that if plaintiff performed all her duties as agreed, "and then, for some unforeseen reason, fails to get a stand of 95 per cent of living vines, he (she) is to have an extension of time of one year, but no time to exceed four years from this date," all crops were to belong to defendants "and upon the fulfillment of the above agreement, it is understood that" defendants "will give a good and sufficient deed to a certain piece of land described as follows." (A tract of 20 acres in the said section, of which plaintiff was given the possession under the contract.) Plaintiff avers performance on her part and willingness to perform all her said covenants, avers that for good and sufficient reasons she has been unable, through no fault of hers, to get a stand of 95 per cent. of living vines, as provided in said contract, up to and inclusive of January 4, 1909, on which date defendants, without right and against plaintiff's consent, in disregard of her rights, entered upon said premises and kept her out of possession, to her damage in the sum of $1,000, avers that before the commencement of the action she demanded of defendants a good and sufficient deed to said 20-acre tract and to give plaintiff full and peaceable possession thereof, but defendants refused and still refuse so to do. Defendants admitted the execution of said agreement, but denied that plaintiff had carried out its covenants on her part to be performed and denied most of the other material averments of the complaint, aver that during the term of said agreement defendants were compelled to do certain work in the caring for said vines, because of plaintiff's failure in that regard.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

As a separate defense, defendants aver that in January, 1909, a dispute arose between plaintiff and defendants "as to whether or not plaintiff was entitled, as she claimed to be, to an extension of one year under said contract from the 14th day of November, 1908, within which to complete and perform said contract, and that defendants at that time claimed that plaintiff was not entitled to the extension claimed by her, and they accordingly refused to grant plaintiff an extension of one year for the performance of said contract, and so informed the plaintiff herein; but that thereafter these defendants, reconsidering said matter, and on the 1st day of February, 1909, and while there was ample time remaining for the plaintiff herein to perform said contract, * * * offered in good faith to allow plaintiff herein to continue in possession of the premises described in said agreement, and requested her, both orally and in writing, to perform all the terms of said agreement, and to allow her until November 14, 1909, within which to complete and fully perform the said agreement," but plaintiff neglected and refused, etc.

By way of cross-complaint, defendants set forth many of the foregoing facts as to plaintiff's failure to perform her covenants of said contract, and that defendants found it necessary to furnish vines and do the work of replanting and cultivating where vines were missing, which defendants did at their own expense in the year 1909, and for which they claim damages, as provided in said contract, for the labor thus bestowed and also for the cost of the vines and also special damages. Plaintiff in her answer denied most of the averments of the cross-complaint, and upon the issues thus framed the cause was tried by the court without a jury and findings made. The amended complaint was filed in March, 1909, and the findings were made in June, 1909. These findings are adverse to plaintiff upon almost every issue, and the court found that upon the expiration of three years from the date of the contract there was not 95 per cent. of living grape vines upon said tract, "and there is not now, after proper replanting, care and cultivation, in 1909, a 95 per cent. stand of living grape vines on said land, and that the failure of plaintiff to perform said contract in the particulars found, was mainly caused by her own neglect and lack of ordinary care." As to the dispute between the parties which arose in January, 1909, the court found that defendants refused to grant plaintiff an extension of one year and so informed her, but that thereafter, on February 1, 1909, and while there was still time sufficient to do the necessary replanting and cultivation, defendants offered in good faith to grant such extension and requested her to perform all the terms of said agreement and to allow her until November 14, 1909, in which to complete her said agreement, but she refused. The court next finds that by reason of plaintiff's said neglect defendants furnished 3,817 vines, replanted the missing parts of the vineyard, furnished labor, tools, horses, etc., and did all the necessary work in caring for said vineyard at a cost of $246.02, and also found that defendants had been damaged, through plaintiff's said negligence, in the sum of $250. As conclusions of law, the court found that "plaintiff has substantially complied with said written contract;" that defendants are entitled to the sum of $250 damage for plaintiff's failure to comply with said contract and also to the further sum of $246.02 expended by defendants "in caring for said vineyard, and are also entitled to judgment for their costs herein;" and that upon payment of said sums to defendants plaintiff "is entitled to a good and sufficient deed from said defendants to the twenty acres of land described in said contract, free from incumbrances, said payment to be made by the 15th day of September, 1909." Judgment passed accordingly. It would seem somewhat paradoxical for defendants to have findings largely in their favor and plaintiff to have the judgment in her favor, and this is about what defendants claim appears from the record. The evidence is not before us; the appeal being on the judgment roll. There are certain provisions of the Civil Code which appellants seem to have overlooked in their contention for the application of the rule as to mutuality of remedies where specific performance is sought. It does not follow that, because the personal services agreed to be performed by plaintiff could not be specifically enforced, the agreement of defendants could not. Nor does it follow that, because plaintiff failed to completely perform her part of the contract, she could not compel specific performance of defendants' covenants.

Section 3386 provides as follows: "Neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it, unless the other party thereto has performed, or is compellable specifically to perform, everything to which the former is entitled under the same obligation, either completely or nearly so, together with full compensation for any want of entire performance." Section 3392 reads: "Specific performance cannot be enforced in favor of a party who has not fully and fairly performed all the conditions precedent on his part to the obligation of the other party, except where his failure to perform is partial, and either entirely immaterial, or capable of being fully compensated, in which case specific performance may be compelled, upon full compensation being made for the default."

We must presume that the evidence justified the findings, and, unless the findings fail to support the judgment, it must stand. It is contended that the judgment is not thus supported because it is found that plaintiff failed to perform her contract, and did not produce 95 per cent. of living vines agreeably to her guaranty, and hence the court was not justified in drawing the conclusion that the contract had been substantially complied with. The court found that defendants undertook the replanting of the 3,817 dead or missing vines, which the contract contemplated defendants might do upon plaintiff's failure. The court found that, after such replanting and proper care and cultivation, in 1909, there was not a 95 per cent. stand of living vines. How much short of this was the fact is not found, and we must presume that the evidence showed the shortage was but little more than 5 per cent. and this the court concluded was a substantial compliance with the contract, or, as the statute has it, was compliance "either completely or nearly so" which, "together with full compensation for any want of entire compliance" as given by the findings and judgment, it seems to us was an equitable and fair adjustment of the matter in controversy and within the spirit and terms of the code rules.

Appellant cites Pacific, etc., Ry. Co. v. Campbell-Johnston, 153 Cal. 106, 94 Pac. 623, where the failure to perform something less than one-third of the work required by the contract was held not to be a substantial performance of the contract. Appellant assumes that plaintiff's failure must be tested by the situation at the end of the third year when there were 3,817 vines missing, or, as it is figured out, about 26 per cent. of the vineyard. But the court found that plaintiff sought and was refused an extension of time to which the contract entitled her, and we must presume that the evidence showed her failure to produce the 95 per cent. of living vines at the end of the third year was "for some unforeseen reason" which the contract contemplated might arise. At this point defendants themselves exercised the option which they reserved, and undertook to do the work which plaintiff offered to do. The result was a stand of vines, we must presume, but little short of the 95 per cent. provided for in the contract. For this work as well as for additional damages they were compensated by the money judgment. The court had the right, we think, to look at the facts as they existed at this time rather than as appeared at the end of the third year.

Among the items of defendants' cost bill were two items, to wit: "Reporter's fee, transcribing ninety-one folios at 30c per folio, $27.30"; also the item, "J. L. Torre, fees as interpreter on March 30th when deposition was read to and signed by plaintiff, $3.00." Plaintiff filed a motion to tax the memorandum of costs and to strike out the foregoing items "on the grounds that said items were not necessarily incurred, and that the deposition described therein was taken for the purpose of harassing and intimidating this plaintiff." This motion was filed on September 7, 1909, and on September 14, 1909, plaintiff served upon defendants' attorneys a notice that on September 15, 1909, at 10 o'clock a. m. of that day, at the courtroom of said court, plaintiff would call up her motion "to tax the costs herein for hearing and determination." The court made an order on September 14th, shortening the time within which said motion would be heard to September 15th, at the hour named in the notice. The motion came on to be heard at the hour named, and, defendants not appearing, the hearing was continued until 1:30 o'clock p. m. of said day, and, defendants not then appearing, the court made an order striking from the cost bill said two items. Defendants claim that the court was without jurisdiction to make the order "for the reason that under section 1033, Code of Civil Procedure, the adverse party must be served with a notice in writing, specifying the objection to the cost bill, as well as the time when the application to the court or judge will be made to correct or strike it out." Section 1033 does not require the "party dissatisfied with the costs claimed" to serve a copy of his motion. The statute says he "may * * * file a motion to have the same taxed by the court." Section 1005, Code Civ. Proc., provides that, when a written notice of a motion is necessary, it must be given five days before the time appointed for the hearing; "but in all cases the court, or a judge thereof, may prescribe a shorter time." The court had jurisdiction. Defendants had due notice of the hearing, and cannot now complain that the court made the order upon their failure to appear at the time appointed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Under Pen. Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Robert C. Johnson was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. S. Bell, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of manslaughter under an information accusing him of the crime of murder. This appeal is from the judgment and the order denying defendant a new trial.

The only point made here is on the ruling of the court refusing, it is claimed, to allow the defendant to establish a foundation for the introduction in evidence of the deposition of a witness taken at the preliminary examination of the charge on which the accused was tried. Section 686, subd. 3, Pen. Code, upon which counsel sought to introduce the evidence of said witness, provides, inter alia, that "where the testimony of a witness on the part of the people, who is unable to give security for his appearance, has been taken conditionally in the like manner in the presence of the defendant, who has, either in person or by counsel, cross-examined or had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness, the deposition of such witness may be read, upon its being satisfactorily shown to the court that he is dead or insane, or cannot with due diligence be found within the state." There is no claim that the witness was dead or insane at the time of the trial. Even if it be true that the court committed in a strict technical sense error in its rulings refusing to permit the defendant to make whatever showing of diligence that he could make, still we think that an examination of the admitted facts will disclose that such rulings were without prejudice.

It appears that, on the close of the case for the people, counsel for defendant called the sheriff of Napa county to the witness stand, and by him undertook to lay the foundation for the introduction in evidence of the deposition of said witness. It may be stated that it is only from the colloquy which took place between counsel for the defendant, the district attorney, and the court, on objections made by the district attorney to questions put to the sheriff by counsel for defendant that the facts may be gathered; there being no other showing in the record upon the proposition. Thus we learn that at the preliminary examination one Ira M. Wilson testified on behalf of the people. It further appears from a statement by defendant's counsel that after the magistrate made the order committing the defendant to trial a subpœna had been issued at the request of the district attorney, commanding said witness to appear at the trial of the defendant as a witness for the people, and that said subpœna was placed in the hands of the sheriff for service. It is admitted by counsel for the defendant that he did not himself cause a subpœna to be issued for said witness, but he stated to the court, when endeavoring to introduce proof preparatory to the introduction of Wilson's deposition, that he had talked with both the sheriff and the district attorney prior to the date fixed for the beginning of the trial, informing them that he desired Wilson as a witness for his client; that he was told by the sheriff that the latter had in his possession a subpœna for Wilson issued at the request of the people, and that he (the sheriff) was making every effort and would continue to make every effort to find and subpœna and have said witness at the trial; that the district attorney stated to him that he (district attorney) would exert his full power to cause the subpœna to be served and have the witness at the trial. In order to lay the foundation for the admission of Wilson's deposition in evidence, the attorney for the defendant sought to show these facts as establishing or tending to establish that the witness could not, after the exercise of "due diligence," be found within the state. The court sustained objections by the district attorney to this line of inquiry, holding that the defendant could not establish the diligence required by the statute unless he could show that he had himself caused a subpœna to be issued for the witness. In other words, the court in effect held that proof of the issuance of a subpœna for Wilson on the motion or at the request of the district attorney would not tend to establish "due diligence" on the part of the defendant, where the latter himself had failed to secure a subpœna for the witness; "that," to use the language of the judge, "it was the duty of the defense, if they wanted Mr. Wilson, to issue process of this court to bring him here."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It has been correctly said that "diligence" is a relative term incapable of precise or exact definition, and that whether the "due diligence" as contemplated by the statute has been exercised in a given case must be determined by and upon the facts and circumstances of such case. See Heintz v. Cooper, 104 Cal. 669, 38 Pac. 511. The circumstances of each case must, therefore, stand, as the criteria by which the courts must determine whether the amount of diligence required has been exercised and shown. In other words, there is and can be obviously no iron-clad rule which of itself definitely fixes or can so fix or measure the quantum of diligence which will satisfy the requirements of the statute in all cases. As is said in the case we have cited, what would constitute "due diligence" in one case might fall far short of it under another and different state of facts. We think it may be safely stated, however, that as a general proposition where a party to an action whether criminal or civil depends entirely upon his adversary for the production of a witness by whose testimony he expects to sustain his action or defense, and can make no further showing, negligence rather than diligence is thus disclosed. And this seems to have been the course pursued by counsel for defendant. According to his own admissions, he took out no subpœna for Wilson, but merely stated to the sheriff that he desired to use that individual as a witness for his client, and requested the officer to put forth every effort to secure his attendance at the trial by means of the subpœna which had been issued for him at the instance of the district attorney. This action on the part of counsel for defendant did not amount to that diligence which the statute contemplates shall be shown to have been exercised in order to justify a trial court in permitting, under the terms of section 686 of the Penal Code, the deposition of an absent witness to be read to the jury. Assuming it to be true, as counsel for the appellant declared to the court below, that the sheriff assured him that he would serve the subpœna, if possible, and thus procure Wilson's presence at the trial if he could be found within the state, and that the district attorney made substantially the same promise, which is denied by the district attorney, yet the people's attorney had the legal right, if disposed to exercise it, to withdraw his own subpœna at any time and to advise the sheriff that, so far as he was concerned, he need make no further effort to procure the attendance of the witness at the trial. In other words, while it is the sworn duty of a district attorney to fairly and impartially prosecute persons accused of crime, and to protect as well the individual rights of an accused person as those of the whole people, whose laws he is specifically enjoined to uphold and maintain, yet there is and must be committed to his judgment many matters of discretion in the discharge of his duties as a public official. When he proceeds with the trial of a criminal case, it must be assumed that his investigation of the facts has persuaded him of the guilt of the accused. He is under no legal obligation to subpœna and much less to introduce as a witness for the people a person whose testimony he knows will be adverse to the theory of the prosecution, for, having been convinced of the guilt of the accused, it would be widely at variance with the policy of any sensible lawyer to introduce proof destructive of his case which he may perhaps believe has been conceived in a misapprehension of the facts or in a desire to exonerate the defendant through false testimony. Therefore, if in any case he should decide that he does not need or require a certain witness, and in consequence withdraws before the trial a subpœna which he had previously caused to be issued for such witness, he must be assumed to have had a just and sufficient reason for his course, and has thus acted in strict accord with his duty under the law with respect to the case as to which such subpœna has been issued and with no purpose or desire to thereby unjustly hamper the defendant in a full and fair presentation of whatever defense he may intend to interpose to the charge alleged in the information or indictment. We do not say that the record discloses that the district attorney took this course in the case at bar. We only make these suggestions for the purpose of showing that a party should not rely upon his adversary for the production of a witness desired by him, and that in doing so, and thus relying upon securing the attendance of the witness or a diligent effort to secure him, he cannot thereafter claim, in the absence of such witness, that he has himself exercised that diligence which alone would entitle him to have his deposition read.

It is very clear, as we have shown, that the defendant here, having relied entirely upon the subpœna issued by the people for the procurement of Wilson as a witness, and having himself admittedly taken no other steps to secure the attendance of the witness, would, had the court permitted him to prove the facts which he claims he could have shown, have utterly failed to lay such a foundation as would have justified the court in allowing Wilson's deposition to be read to the jury at the trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MACK. (Cr. 208.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 2, 1910.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 374*)—IMPEACHMENT—STATEMENT OF OPINION AS TO GUILT—WHEN ADMISSIBLE.

While the statement of a witness made prior to the trial as to his opinion of defendant's guilt is not admissible to contradict him as to his statement of facts, yet his statement in a conversation with another witness that defendant "ought to be in jail" was admissible to show his bias in favor of defendant, for whom he was testifying on the trial.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—HEARSAY—TESTIMONY—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where a witness without objection gave the hearsay testimony that another party had stated that defendant had robbed her, his subsequent testimony that the party also said that "she hated to think that he would rob her" was a harmless error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3137–3143; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 419, 420*)—HEARSAY EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

A witness could not testify as to his conversation with the officer after arresting defendant; it being hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 973–983; Dec. Dig. §§ 419, 420.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 369*)—EVIDENCE OF ANOTHER CRIME—ADMISSIBILITY.

In a prosecution for robbery, evidence that defendant and the prosecuting witness were subsequently together with some whisky containing morphine was admissible to show that defendant was attempting to induce the witness not to prosecute him, since incriminating evidence is admissible, although it tends to connect defendant with another crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 822–824; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 361*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, in a prosecution for robbery, evidence had been admitted tending to show that defendant had put some morphine in whisky so as to enable him to induce the prosecuting witness to stop the prosecution by giving her a drink, evidence that a month before a party had left some white powders with the witness was inadmissible to show that the witness herself put the morphine in the whisky, in the absence of any evidence connecting such powder with the morphine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 361.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—IMPERTINENT INSTRUCTION—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a prosecution for robbery, although an instruction in regard to corroborative evidence was wholly inapplicable to the case, no evidence of an accomplice having been relied upon, yet where it was a correct statement of the law, and instructions pertinent to the case were fully given, no harm could result therefrom.

Charles Mack was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Philip M. Walsh, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HALL, J. Defendant was convicted of grand larceny for stealing $110 from Mrs. Edith McRea, and upon this appeal it is not contended that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict. The only grounds urged for a reversal relate to some rulings of the court upon objections to evidence and in giving a certain instruction.

The larceny in question was committed at premises kept as a saloon by one Le Forte. Le Forte was called as a witness on behalf of defendant and gave testimony favorable to defendant. Upon cross-examination this witness was asked over the objection of defendant two questions, as to whether or not he had two certain conversations with Mrs. McRea. The words of the several conversations were repeated in the questions, and if they occurred showed that the witness was endeavoring to induce Mrs. McRea to drop the prosecution of the defendant, and to absent herself from the county when needed as a witness. In the purported conversation as set forth in the questions was a statement by the witness that the defendant ought to be in jail. The witness answered "No" to each question; and subsequently, over the objection of defendant, the prosecution was allowed to prove that he did have the conversations as set forth in the questions. The only part of the conversations about which there can be any question is the part in which the witness stated that defendant ought to be in jail. If the conversation had been given in evidence simply to contradict the testimony of the witness, it would probably have been inadmissible. The general rule is that evidence that a witness has stated an opinion as to the guilt of defendant may not be introduced to contradict him as to the facts to which he has testified. Such is the character of the cases cited by appellant, to which many more might be added along the same line. But the evidence containing the conversations between the witness Le Forte and Mrs. McRea was not for the purpose of contradicting him as to the evidence he had given as to the facts of the case, but was for the purpose of showing his interest and bias in favor of the defendant on trial. That evidence tending to show the interest of a witness in the case may be given cannot be doubted, and evidence that a witness has endeavored to induce the prosecuting or any other witness to absent himself from the trial or to drop the prosecution of the case is clearly of such character. The bias and interest of the witness in the case is a matter going to the weight to be given his testimony. People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 66 Cal. 667, 6 Pac. 859; People v. Thompson, 92 Cal. 506, 28 Pac. 589; People v. Wong Chuey, 117 Cal. 627, 49 Pac. 833; Lewis v. Steiger, 68 Cal. 200, 8 Pac. 884; People v. Murray, 85 Cal. 350, 24 Pac. 666. The fact that the witness in the conversation in which he attempted to dissuade the prosecutrix from appearing as a witness, also stated as his opinion that the defendant ought to be in jail, simply emphasized the proof of his interest and bias. It showed the length to which the witness was willing to go to aid his friend, the defendant. The court did not err in admitting this testimony.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Without objection the witness Le Forte testified to a conversation with Mrs. McRea, in which she stated to Le Forte that the defendant had robbed her. Appellant now complains that the court permitted the witness Le Forte to further testify upon cross-examination that Mrs. McRea also said that "she hated to think that he would rob her, or words to that effect." This evidence was hearsay, but it is impossible to believe that any injury could have been done to defendant thereby in view of the fact that the witness had already twice or more testified without objection that Mrs. McRea stated that defendant had robbed her. The court did not err in refusing to allow the witness Le Forte to testify to a conversation he claimed to have had with Officer Kyle after the arrest of the defendant. No questions had been asked the witness by the prosecution about such conversation, and no evidence of such conversation had been given by anyone. The rejected evidence was purely hearsay, and for that reason was not admissible.

The appellant contends that the court erred in permitting evidence to be given by the prosecution that certain whisky brought to the house of Mrs. McRea by defendant and two companions two days after she had sworn to a complaint charging him with the larceny contained morphine. It is insisted that this evidence tended to prove a distinct crime against defendant in no way connected with the charge for which he was on trial. The evidence tends to show that, on the occasion of the visit of defendant and his two witnesses to Mrs. McRea, he, in effect, attempted to dissuade her from prosecuting him for the larceny. Mrs. McRea did not in fact drink any of the whisky, but the circumstances in evidence were such that the jury might well infer that defendant expected that she would, and that she would thus be reduced to a condition in which she would the more readily consent to refrain from an effective prosecution of him. The evidence concerning the whisky tended to connect the defendant with an unfair effort to dissuade the prosecutrix from prosecuting the defendant, and thus tended to show a consciousness of guilt upon his part. For this purpose it was admissible. Evidence that logically tends to connect a defendant with the commission of the crime charged is admissible, although it also tends to connect him with another crime. People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 340, 83 Pac. 43; People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 216, 46 Pac. 153; People v. Argentos, 156 Cal. 720, 106 Pac. 65; People v. Soeder, 150 Cal. 15, 87 Pac. 1016.

Objection is made that the court refused to allow evidence that at some time, stated as a month or two before the whisky was brought to Mrs. McRea, one Johnson left with her a white powder. Counsel for defendant claims that from this fact the jury could infer that Mrs. McRea herself put morphine in the whisky. No competent evidence was offered that the powder was in fact morphine, or that Mrs. McRea retained it in the house at the time the whisky was brought there. Indeed, the circumstances that counsel stated to the court he expected to prove about the leaving of the powder would strongly indicate that it would not be preserved. We think the offered evidence was too remote and inconsequential to justify a reversal for its exclusion.

The court gave to the jury an instruction concerning corroborative evidence, which is not claimed to be erroneous as a statement of law, but is claimed to be wholly inapplicable to this case, as the prosecution in no way relied on any evidence of an accomplice. The instruction does not appear to us to be pertinent to any theory of the case, but it was a correct statement of law in the abstract, and, as the court fully and fairly instructed the jury on the law pertinent to the case, the challenged instruction could do no harm.

The appellant also makes the point of misconduct on the part of the district attorney. We have examined the record in this regard, and find nothing to support the claim of appellant.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

PEOPLE v. SCHWARTZ. (Cr. 248.)

1. GAMING (§ 85*)—INFORMATION—CONSTRUCTION.

The fair interpretation of an information charging that defendant offered to bet with the spectators or any of them at a certain ball game on the result thereof at certain odds; and, on the offer being accepted by one of the spectators, he received and recorded said bet, is that defendant was engaged publicly in offering to bet with any and all comers, and that the bet recorded was of that character, which character of betting is within Pen. Code, § 337a, declaring a punishment for one who records or registers bets on the result of any contest of skill or contingent event.

2. GAMING (§ 98*)—RECORDING BET—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that at the time defendant made a bet he made a memorandum on a piece of paper, and that he tore it to pieces when the officer arresting him attempted to get it, is sufficient evidence that he recorded the bet within the prohibition of Pen. Code, § 337a.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gaming, Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 369*)—EVIDENCE—SIMILAR ACTS.

Evidence that between the earlier innings of a ball game defendant walked back and forth among the spectators, offering certain odds that a certain one of the clubs would not score, and that a number of the spectators indicated their acceptance of such offer for various amounts, tends to show that defendant was actually engaged in the business of bookmaking, and, such acts being similar to the one charged in the indictment, that he offered to bet at such odds with the spectators or any of them that such club would not score in the eighth inning and on the offer being accepted by a spectator recorded the bet, in violation of Pen. Code, § 337a, declaring a penalty for recording or registering bets, and having been committed at about the same time, illumined the act charged, and was admissible to show its true character.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Charles Schwartz was convicted of recording a bet, and appeals. Affirmed.

T. I. Fitzpatrick and John J. Greeley, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., C. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., and Maxwell McNutt, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was informed against by the district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco, charged with a violation of the provisions of section 337a of the Penal Code. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for the term of 30 days. This appeal is from the judgment.

In substance the information charges that at a certain game of baseball played between the San Francisco and Oakland baseball clubs the defendant offered to bet with the spectators or any of them at the ratio of 3½ to 1 that the San Francisco baseball club would not score in the eighth inning of said game; that John Liebold, one of the spectators, accepted the offer, and a bet at the odds mentioned was then and there made, whereupon defendant "received and recorded said bet," and subsequently, the San Francisco baseball club having scored in the eighth inning, the defendant paid the amount of the bet.

The first question raised by appellant is whether the facts stated in the information constitute a public offense. The information is founded upon that portion of said section 337a which reads as follows: "Every person * * * who records or registers bets or wagers, or sells pools upon the result of any trial or contest of skill * * * or of any lot, chance, casualty, unknown or contingent event whatsoever * * * is punishable by imprisonment in a county jail or state prison for a period of not less than thirty days or not exceeding one year." As just stated, it is charged that the defendant offered to bet with the spectators or any of them at a certain baseball game at given odds on a named contingency, and, upon the offer being accepted by one of the spectators, he registered or recorded the bet. We think the fair interpretation of this language is that the defendant was engaged publicly in offering to bet with any and all comers, and that the bet charged to have been recorded was a bet of that character. This character of betting we believe comes within the language and intent of the act. The language of the information that the defendant "received and recorded said bet" is to be construed in connection with the context; and, as thus construed, we have no hesitation in holding that a violation of the portion of the act quoted is charged.

It is next contended that the evidence does not show that the defendant recorded the bet. With this we cannot agree. It shows, in effect, that at the time the bet was made the defendant made a memorandum on a piece of paper; that upon the arresting officer attempting to get this paper the defendant tore it to pieces. This evidence was sufficient to warrant the jury inferring that the defendant recorded the bet. It is true that the defendant and the person with whom he made the bet controverted this evidence; but the jury weighed the testimony on both sides, and, having reached the conclusion from the acts testified to that the bet was registered, we have no power or inclination to interfere. The evidence in all respects is sufficient to sustain the allegations of the information. Evidence was introduced to show that during various innings of the game the defendant went among the spectators and made certain offers to bet. One witness testified that commencing about the second inning the accused would walk back and forth among the spectators, and say, "Three and a half to one that the San Francisco club won't score." A number of men in the crowd would say, for example, "Give me a dollar," and some would hold up two fingers, and some would say, "Make it five." The next inning he would repeat the same thing, walking back and forth, calling out "Three and a half to one they won't score." In the eighth inning he did the same thing.

Defendant claims that this testimony was inadmissible; and, while it went in without any objection from him being interposed, nevertheless he asserts that his motion to strike it out should have been granted. But this evidence tended to show that the defendant was actually engaged in the business of bookmaking, and the acts referred to being similar to the one averred in the information, and having been committed at about the same time, illuminated the act charged, and were admissible to show the true character of the act charged.

No error was committed by the trial court in its refusal to give certain instructions requested by defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

3. Criminal Law (§ 789*)—Homicide (§ 30*)—Aiding and Abetting—Instructions.

In a prosecution for homicide, the state relied on evidence that the fatal shot was fired by accused and also on a common understanding between accused and his brother to kill or injure deceased, while defendant claimed that his brother fired the shot, and that defendant did not participate in the difficulty. Held, that instructions that if defendant and his brother agreed that they together would commit a felonious assault on deceased, and, pursuant thereto, defendant's brother made such assault, with defendant aiding and abetting, and during the assault the brother killed deceased, defendant would be equally guilty under the law, but that, if there existed a reasonable doubt as to whether defendant shot and killed deceased, then the jury should find him not guilty, unless they were convinced from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that he aided and abetted, or advised and encouraged the commission of the crime, etc., were correct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Jose Verduzco was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. E. Rhodes and G. W. Mordecai, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was charged by information with the crime of murder, was convicted as charged, and sentenced to imprisonment for life. He appeals from the judgment of conviction, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The homicide occurred on the night of July 4, 1909, at the house of one Jesus Belmontes and his wife, Catalina, with whom defendant and his brother, Seferino Verduzco, and deceased, Constantino Soto, were at the time living; the last three named being laborers and working at a mill near the town of Madera. It appeared by the testimony of Mrs. Belmontes that deceased had his supper about 5 o'clock and left the house. Defendant and his brother had supper about half an hour later and also left the house. About 8 o'clock, or shortly after, deceased and Seferino returned to the Belmontes house, deceased entering immediately behind Seferino. The deceased sat down upon a bench near a table, and Seferino went to his room, where he remained about five minutes. He re-entered the room where deceased still sat upon the bench, and as he passed out he said to deceased, "I don't want any business with you," and the deceased replied: "Neither do I with you." Mrs. Belmontes testified: "In about 10 minutes the two Verduzcos returned, Seferino Verduzco and Jose Verduzco. * * * Jose Verduzco in front and Seferino Verduzco behind, both entered about the same time, * * * and when Jose entered he said: 'What's up? What passes?' * * * When Verduzco said, 'What's up, what passes,' the deceased replied, 'Nothing is up, nothing passed.'" He was at that time sitting on the same bench where Seferino left him. Mrs. Belmontes was sitting on the opposite side of the table with a child in her arms. She testified that Jose passed one side of her and Seferino on the other towards the bench where deceased sat. When these words passed between Jose and deceased, Mrs. Belmontes' husband came out of the bedroom adjoining and placed himself at a point between Seferino and deceased, the latter meantime having arisen to his feet. Mrs. Belmontes testified: "Q. Did any words pass at that time? A. No, sir; when my husband got in between he said: 'What are you going to do?' When Jose Verduzco replied: 'What's up with my brother is with me.' Jose Verduzco then fired the shot." Deceased died from the effect of the wound in about one hour. Jesus Belmontes testified: "When I heard them saying, this man saying: 'What's up, what passes,' is when I came out and told them I did not want any trouble in my house. Q. Who were in the room when you came out? A. Jose Verduzco and Seferino Verduzco. Soto was there and my wife. Q. Where was Seferino Verduzco? A. He was at one side of the table and they surrounded him from each side. * * * Q. Did you see any weapons in the hands of either one of the Verduzco boys? A. When Jose Verduzco said, 'What is with my brother is with me,' they were close in on him and Seferino had a knife, and then I got between him and Seferino. I got in between Jose and Seferino, saying that they wouldn't strike him, and then the deceased turned around as he indicated by his gestures, towards Jose Verduzco, and then he fired the shot. * * * Q. How did you know that Seferino had a knife? A. Because I saw it when he took it out to strike him. Seferino was nearest to my bedroom. Q. Did you see the flash of the shot? A. When I knew it was a shot, just because I heard the sound and my face was dazed in fire, when I got between Seferino and Jose to defend him against the knife. Q. Did you see the flash come from Jose or Seferino? A. From Jose. I went to the door quickly and pulled the door to and hollered for help." Defendant and his brother immediately went to this door, forced it open, and Seferino escaped, and has not been heard of since. Jose returned to the Belmontes house and was there arrested about 10 o'clock the same night.

On the 8th of July, following the homicide, defendant made a voluntary statement under oath, in which he claimed that at the request of his brother, Seferino, he went to the Belmontes house; that he was entering the door as he heard a shot and two men ran out whom he did not recognize; that he did not see his brother in the room where the shot occurred, and that he did not see him afterwards; that Mrs. Belmontes had denounced him (Jose) as the perpetrator of the killing, but that he was wholly innocent; that he knew of no trouble between deceased and his brother, Seferino, and there was none between deceased and himself. On the 7th of August following he made another voluntary statement, at variance with his former statement, in which he repeated a conversation he had with his brother, Seferino, in which the latter spoke of some altercation between him and deceased after which Seferino told him of their going to the Belmontes house together and of Seferino entering his room and coming out again and leaving the house; that not long after the two brothers returned to the house, and that deceased uttered "some malediction towards his brother" and his brother shot him. It appeared that the three men came from the same part of Mexico, and had known each other there, but there was no evidence of any quarrel between them except as above stated. The evidence all tended to show that one of the two Verduzco brothers committed the crime, and the only other witnesses to the tragedy both testified that defendant was the one who fired the fatal shot.

The evidence is challenged as insufficient for its inherent improbability, because, as was shown, defendant had borne an excellent character for peace and quiet; that the younger Verduzco fled and defendant stood his ground, conscious of innocence; that defendant had had no trouble of any kind with deceased and had no ill feeling toward him, while his brother entertained feelings of hostility toward deceased and was a person of violent temper; that defendant is not shown to have had a pistol, while it did appear that his brother could and probably did procure the weapon when he went into their bedroom, as narrated by the witnesses; that it is improbable that Belmontes would have pursued Seferino and paid no attention to Jose if it be true, as he testified, that Jose fired the shot; that the witness Catalina Belmontes first stated to witness Bancroft, who came to the house soon after the affray, that Seferino fired the shot, and that her explanation why she did this and afterwards accused Jose is not satisfactory; that Belmontes was shown to have been too deaf to have heard what he testified to, and, furthermore, that his wife first stated that he was in bed when the Verduzcos entered the house. We shall not undertake to reconcile the alleged improbability of the testimony of the two witnesses to the homicide or point out how the jury might have been able reasonably to do so. Not the slightest suspicion was by the evidence cast upon any one but one or both of the Verduzcos as the perpetrators of the crime. Jose's statement, upon entering the room with his brother, that "What is with my brother is with me," coupled with the other proven facts, was sufficient justification for the jury to infer a common understanding between Jose and Seferino when they confronted the deceased. We find nothing not susceptible of reasonable explanation, in the light of all the evidence, which seriously conflicts with the truth of the narrative of the killing as given by the only two eye-witnesses. The responsibility of passing upon their credibility as well as upon the probability of their testimony was upon the jury, and we can find no warrant in the record for assuming this responsibility.

The court instructed the jury that if they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that deceased was killed by the inflicting of a gunshot wound, and that, immediately prior thereto, defendant and his brother "reached an understanding that they two together would commit a felonious assault upon said Soto and would kill and murder him, and that, in pursuance of said understanding, said defendant and his brother Seferino Verduzco did make such assault upon Soto, with the defendant and his brother aiding and abetting each other therein, and during such assault Soto was shot, killed, and murdered by one of said assailants according to a common, prior understanding, then, under such circumstances, the court instructs you that no matter which of the two named assailants fired the alleged fatal shot, both are equally guilty under the law." The court also in this connection instructed the jury: "If there exists in your minds a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant shot and killed the deceased, then you shall find defendant not guilty, unless you are convinced from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant aided and abetted, or advised an encouraged another in the commission of the crime. In this connection you are instructed if you believe from the evidence that the deceased was unlawfully killed by Seferino Verduzco, and there exists in your minds a reasonable doubt as to whether the defendant aided and abetted, or advised and encouraged the commission of the crime, then your verdict must be not guilty." It is true that the prosecution relied upon the evidence that the fatal shot was fired by defendant, but it also relied upon a common understanding between the brothers Verduzco. Furthermore, the contention of defendant was that defendant's brother, and not defendant, was the guilty assailant, and fired the shot. The evidence presented the case where there might be doubt as to which one of the two assailants was the immediate cause of the killing, and notwithstanding such doubt might be equally guilty if the jury found the facts to be as pointed out in the instructions complained of. We see no error in these instructions.

Error is assigned in the giving of the instruction on reasonable doubt. We can discover in this instruction no material departure in phraseology or substance from the stereotyped and frequently approved instruction that has come down to us from Judge Shaw in the trial of Prof. Webster. The statements that "everything relating to human affairs and depending upon moral evidence is open to some possible or imaginary doubt" and that the reasonable doubt referred to "is that state of the case," etc., have too often survived the criticism to which they have been subjected to leave their correctness any longer in doubt.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "In conclusion, you are instructed that if, after a full consideration of the entire evidence in this case, any juror should entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, it is the duty of such juror so entertaining such doubt not to vote for a verdict of guilty, nor to be influenced in so doing for the single reason that a majority of the jury should be in favor of a verdict of guilty. In this connection you are instructed that juries are impaneled for the purpose of agreeing upon verdicts if they can conscientiously do so. They are admonished at each recess of the court not to form an opinion as to the merits of the case until it shall be finally submitted to them, and, when it is so submitted, it is the duty of jurors to deliberate and consult together with the view of reaching an agreement if they can without violence to their individual understanding of the evidence and instructions of the court. It is true that each juror must decide the matter for himself, yet he should do so only after a consideration of the case with his fellow jurors, and he should not hesitate to sacrifice his views or opinions of the case when convinced that they are erroneous, even though in so doing he defer to the views or opinions of others."

The objection to this instruction is aimed particularly at the concluding paragraph by which it is urged that the individual juror was required to render a verdict on the opinion of his fellow jurors. The essence of the instruction is that each juror should decide for himself but that it is his duty to consult with the other jurors, counsel with them, "with the view of reaching an agreement if they can without violence to their individual understanding of the evidence and instructions of the court." But, if convinced that his views are erroneous, a juror should defer to the views of others. It is claimed that the instruction is "diametrically antagonistic" to the rule announced in People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 488, 55 Pac. 585, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50, where the court held that an instruction, as asked, should have been given, which said, among other things: "If after a consideration of the whole case any juror should entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant it is the duty of such juror so entertaining such doubt not to vote for a verdict of guilty, nor to be influenced in so doing for the single reason that a majority of the jury should be in favor of a verdict of guilty." The difference between the two cases is obvious. In the instruction now before us, the very proposition laid down in the Dole Case is stated, and it was only when the juror should become convinced that his views of the case were erroneous that he was told that he should defer to the opinions of the other jurors.

We discover no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

CONDE et ux. v. SWEENEY, Sheriff.
(Civ. 741.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 4, 1910.)

1. Injunction (§ 136*)—Temporary Injunction—Complaint—Sufficiency.

A complaint in an action by a vendor of mining claims to restrain a levy on machinery placed thereon by the purchaser in possession under a contract stipulating that the property shall belong to the vendor until paid for, which alleges that the machinery has become and is a fixture attached to the mines and is the property of the vendor, is sufficient to justify a temporary restraining order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 305, 306; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

2. Mines and Minerals (§ 83*)—Contracts of Purchase—Rights Acquired.

A purchaser of mining claims in possession under a contract stipulating that the claims and all the machinery placed thereon in working the mines shall be the property of the vendor until the purchase price is paid, and permitting the purchaser to work and develop the mine and extract ores and appropriate the proceeds, may prospect and develop the mines, but he may not commit waste or remove from the situs of the mines that which constitutes a part of the realty other than ore bodies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 212–215; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

3. Fixtures (§ 21*)—Vendor and Purchaser—Attachment.

Where a purchaser in possession of mining claims under a contract that the claims and machinery placed thereon should belong to the vendor until the purchase price was paid placed machinery on the claims for use in working the mines and the machinery became fixtures attached to the mines, the machinery could not be attached by a creditor of the purchaser while the purchase price remained unpaid.

4. Appeal and Error (§ 907*)—Presumptions.

Where a cause was heard on oral and documentary evidence not brought up on appeal, the court must presume that the evidence was sufficient to support the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by James E. Conde and wife against William Sweeney. From an order granting an injunction pendente lite, as prayed for in the complaint, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Curtin, for appellant. Street & Street and F. P. Otis, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to restrain the defendant from levying a writ of attachment. In their complaint the plaintiffs alleged ownership and possession of certain quartz mining claims, known as the Dreisam mines, "together with all the fixtures and all other machinery and tools used in working and developing said mines"; that on June 15, 1908, plaintiffs entered into a written agreement with the Parlin Gold Mining Company, whereby plaintiffs agreed to sell said mines to said company for a certain sum which was to be paid on or before May 1, 1909; that for a consideration the time of payment was extended to September 1, 1909; that about June 15, 1908, said company entered "in and upon said mines and proceeded to work and develop the same and in the working and developing of said mines placed and used thereon certain electrical machinery," being certain motors, lighting transformer, and pump, fully described; "that by the terms of said agreement all machinery and tools used by the Parlin Gold Mining Company in the working and development of said mines became, have been, and now are fixtures attached to said mines and ever since said motors and electrical machinery have been placed upon and used in the working and development of said mines have been and now are the property of said plaintiffs until said mines shall have been fully paid for by said Parlin Gold Mining Company in accordance with the terms of said agreement;" that on August 29, 1909, defendant, as sheriff, by virtue of a writ of attachment issued out of the superior court of Tuolumne county, in an action wherein one Claytor is plaintiff and the Parlin Mining Company, a corporation, is defendant, levied upon said property and "did commence the moving of said electric motors, lighting transformer and electric pump from said Dreisam mines" and said defendant as such sheriff threatens to continue the removal of said machinery "from off said property, all of which will cause these plaintiffs great and irreparable injury; that it is necessary that defendant be restrained from moving from said mines said electric motors and electrical machinery to prevent a multiplicity of judicial proceedings." Plaintiffs pray that defendant be restrained from levying upon said property and machinery, "and from interfering with or taking or removing any of said machinery from said Dreisam mines to which they are now affixed" and for further relief.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The complaint was filed on August 30, 1909, and on the same day the court made its restraining order and fixed the hearing for September 3, 1909, at which time, by consent of the parties, the order to show cause and time in which defendant was to plead was continued to September 24, 1909, at which time defendant filed a general demurrer, a motion to dissolve the restraining order on the ground that the complaint does not show sufficient facts to justify the restraining order, and also filed an answer to the complaint. On September 25, 1909, and before the hearing, plaintiffs served and filed a supplemental complaint alleging that they are now and during all the times mentioned therein they have been the owners of said mining property and said electrical machinery, and that since September 1, 1909, and after the filing of the original complaint, the agreement set forth in plaintiffs' complaint expired and terminated and the deed placed in escrow * * * has been withdrawn by plaintiffs, and the said company now has no right, title or interest in said described mines; that defendant threatens to remove from said mines said machinery, described in said original complaint and such removal will work great and irreparable injury to plaintiffs. On October 4, 1909, defendant served and filed his answer to said supplemental complaint, and on October 8, 1909, the court made its minute order denying defendant's motion to dissolve the restraining order and granted the injunction upon plaintiffs giving bond for $500. The formal order was made October 9, 1909, and recites that the hearing came on regularly September 24, 1909, "and, after the introduction of oral and documentary evidence, the hearing was continued for argument until Monday the 27th day of September, 1909, and on said date said matter was duly argued by the respective counsel and submitted to the court for its decision." In his answer to the original complaint defendant denies, on information and belief, most of its averments. Likewise he denies the averments of the supplemental complaint, on information and belief, admits that he threatens to remove from said mines said fixtures as set forth in plaintiffs' original complaint but denies that it will work great or irreparable injury, avers that he is acting in obedience to a writ of attachment in an action wherein one Claytor is plaintiff and Parlin Mining Company is defendant, as alleged in the original complaint. Defendant appeals from the order "granting plaintiff an injunction pendente lite, as prayed for in the complaint," claiming that neither the order denying the motion to dissolve the restraining order nor the order granting the injunction should have been made, for the reason that there was no sufficient showing made in the complaint.

The complaint alleged that the property which defendant threatened to remove had become fixtures to the realty and part thereof, and that, by the terms of the agreement, it was to belong to plaintiffs as did the other realty "until said mines shall have been fully paid for by the said Parlin Gold Mining Company in accordance with the terms of the said agreement." Presumably the agreement, when introduced at the hearing (it was not set forth in the complaint or answer), supported plaintiffs' averments. It would have been more satisfactory had the complaint set forth the agreement in terms so as to have shown from its face that the averments of the complaint were thereby supported, but we think there were sufficient facts alleged to justify the restraining order pending the hearing.

It is argued by appellant that the Parlin Gold Mining Company had the right of possession and the right of property until September 1, 1909, subject to payment of the full purchase price of the property on that day, and hence plaintiffs had no rights therein until after that date. But the right of the company was a right to prospect and develop the mines. It had no right to commit waste or remove from its situs that which constituted a part of the realty, other than ore bodies or minerals, or to make such use of timber and the like as might be necessary in the working of said mines. Obviously, no creditor had any greater right. Appellant cites Miller v. Waddingham, 91 Cal. 380, 27 Pac. 751, 13 L. R. A. 680, which was an action by the vendor for trespass committed by the vendee, under a contract of sale of land. The court there likened the relation to that of a mortgagor and mortgagee, and it was said: "By parity of reasoning the vendor who holds the legal title as security for the fulfillment of the contract of purchase by the vendee in possession should show that he will sustain some injury before he can maintain an action like the present. So long as the sufficiency of the security is unimpaired, he has no right to disturb the vendee in any use or enjoyment which he may make of the land." Suppose the case of the vendee going into possession under an agreement, as part consideration, to make certain improvements —erect a dwelling house on the land, for example—would it be contended that he could remove the house or that his creditors could remove it under attachment before completing his purchase? In such a case the dwelling having become a part of the realty and by so much having increased its value, to remove it would impair the value of the freehold, just as effectually as if the dwelling had been placed there by the vendor before the sale. See Pomeroy v. Bell, 118 Cal. 635, 50 Pac. 683. Here the vendee had the right to work as well as to develop the mine, extract ores, and appropriate the proceeds. There was nothing unreasonable in the provision of the agreement by which it had this privilege that whatever fixtures it found necessary to affix to the land should thereupon become the property of plaintiffs, unless the company made full payment for the mines at the time stipulated. The injunction was granted after the expiration of the company's right to purchase, and there is no pretense that it complied with or offered to comply with the terms of its contract to purchase. The cause was heard upon oral and documentary evidence. The evidence is not brought up, and it must be presumed that it was sufficient to support the judgment.

Respondents state in their brief that, since this motion was heard and determined, "the case has been tried on its merits, findings of fact and conclusions of law were duly made and judgment entered in favor of plaintiffs." This is not denied. We cannot act upon this statement alone, but, if it be true, it would avail appellant nothing should he prevail on this appeal. Regardless, however, of this fact, we think the order should be affirmed and it is so ordered.

1. SALES (§ 164*) — PARTIAL DELIVERY — RIGHTS OF SELLER.

A seller can recover the value of quantities delivered, subject to the buyer's right to counterclaim for any damage caused by the seller failing to furnish the whole amount contracted.

3. SALES (§ 181*) — ACTION FOR PRICE — DEFENSES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a suit for the price of fruit, wherein the buyer counterclaimed for failure to deliver additional fruit contracted for, the burden was on him to show that additional fruit which was rejected was of inferior quality.

5. SALES (§ 181*)—COUNTERCLAIM BY BUYER—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT.

6. SALES (§ 71*)—"MORE OR LESS."

In a contract for sale of goods, the qualifying words "more or less" merely provide against slight and accidental variations in number, measure, or weight.

8. SALES (§ 87*) — QUANTITY — EVIDENCE — WEIGHT.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by D. O. Hills and another, partners as Hills & Fitzgerald, against Edmund Peycke Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. McKinley and George F. Jones, for appellant. Carlton Gray, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The complaint was for the balance due on a contract for the sale of certain oranges by plaintiffs to defendant. The answer does not deny the execution of the contract set out in the complaint, but, by way of counterclaim, presents an offset for labels furnished by defendant to plaintiffs. There is also a cross-complaint for damages caused by plaintiffs' failure to furnish as much fruit as the agreement called for. Plaintiffs admitted the allegations in reference to the labels, but took issue with the cross-complaint. The action was tried before the court and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs, findings having been waived.

The claim for damages on the part of defendant is based on the contention that plaintiffs furnished only nine car loads of fruit of the quality prescribed, whereas they agreed to sell "twenty cars of seedling oranges, more or less," and that, relying upon said agreement, defendant contracted with its customers for the sale of 15 cars. The deficiency, so it is claimed, was supplied at an additional expense to defendant.

We think there is no merit in the contention that the complaint fails to state a cause of action. The position of appellant in that respect is that the complaint attempts to state a cause of action on a contract for an agreement to sell and deliver 20 car loads of fruit, which contract respondents claim they fulfilled by delivering nine car loads and no more. But this view ignores the allegation "that said defendant received and accepted all of said nine car loads of oranges so sold and delivered to it by plaintiffs as aforesaid." If plaintiffs did furnish less than the contract called for, yet defendant would be liable for the value of the nine car loads which it received and accepted, subject, of course, to the right of defendant to set up a counterclaim for damages, if any, caused by the failure of plaintiffs to comply fully with the terms of the contract. Manifestly plaintiffs, in their complaint, are not required to anticipate any such claim on the part of defendant. In Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 573, it is said: "If the vendor delivers a less quantity of goods than he contracted to deliver, the vendee is at liberty to refuse to accept, and, if he accepts a part, he may return that and refuse to accept less than the whole, but, having received and retained a part, he cannot refuse to pay for the part received." In Willamette, etc., Co. v. Union, etc., Co., 94 Cal. 157, 29 Pac. 773, in approving the doctrine of the Polhemus Case, it is said: "The contention of appellant is that, as a portion of the lumber mentioned in the contract was not delivered, therefore nothing was due, and the action cannot be maintained. This contention involves the proposition that appellant could keep and use all the lumber received and retained by it without paying for it. There has been, no doubt, some conflict of authorities as to the rights of parties in the situation of the parties to this action; but the true rule is stated in the opinion of the court in Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 577." The same principle is affirmed in Ontario, etc., Ass'n v. Cutting, etc., Co., 134 Cal. 21, 66 Pac. 28, 53 L. R. A. 681. 86 Am. St. Rep. 231.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The main reliance of appellant for a reversal, however, seems to be upon the position that the judgment is unsupported by the evidence. It is urged that it appears without conflict that defendant, by reason of plaintiffs' failure to comply with the contract, suffered loss as alleged in the cross-complaint. It does, indeed, appear that defendant, in order to fill its contracts with other parties, incurred a greater expense than if it had received all of the fruit from plaintiffs at the price agreed upon. But were plaintiffs responsible for this additional expense? The evidence shows that defendant sold to its customers 15 car loads of oranges. Plaintiffs offered to deliver this number to defendants. It cannot be said, therefore, that plaintiffs are responsible for defendant's loss, at least, unless it was shown that the fruit rejected was inferior in quality to the standard required. The burden of proof as to this was, of course, cast upon defendant, as it was one of the material allegations of the cross-complaint. The only evidence upon the subject was furnished by plaintiffs, and this, of course, must be regarded in the light most favorable to the judgment of the trial court. In the examination of Mr. Hills, one of the plaintiffs, the following questions and answers appear: "Were those oranges which were rejected by their inspector of the same appearance, size, and quality as the oranges called for by the contract? A. I would consider them so, the majority of them. Q. You said they were the same size and quality? A. Yes, sir; that is, to all appearances. A person could not tell until after they cut all the oranges open whether they were or not. To all appearances they were. Q. Did the appearance indicate anything different from the appearance of the oranges they did take? A. No, sir; I don't think so to my opinion. Q. How many oranges were rejected by them? A. We figured we picked fully fifteen car loads of fruit and there was six car loads rejected. Out of that six car loads I think fully four car loads was equally as good fruit as anything they got. All the oranges we had we sold to the defendant." There was no evidence more favorable to the appellant than the foregoing. It is apparent, therefore, that the trial court was justified in concluding that defendant's inspector acted arbitrarily and unjustly in rejecting six car loads of the oranges, and, furthermore, that, while plaintiffs admitted that some of the oranges were not up to the standard, yet the proportion was very small and the evidence concerning it so indefinite that it could not be said that defendant had established this material allegation of its cross-complaint.

Indeed, considering the whole record, the conclusion is inevitable that the judgment of the court was just and it ought not to be disturbed unless some plain principle of law requires it. The plaintiffs acted in the utmost good faith and entirely in accordance with the intention of the parties. It is true that the contract was reduced to writing and called for "twenty car loads, more or less," and the decisions are to the effect that the "addition of the qualifying words 'about,' 'more or less,' and the like in such cases is only for the purpose of providing against accidental variations arising from slight and unimportant excesses or deficiencies in number, measure or weight." Brawley v. United States, 96 U. S. 168, 24 L. Ed. 622. The rule is also that parol evidence is inadmissible to show that the parties intended otherwise than the words indicate, but, as a matter of fact, plaintiff, Hills, testified without objection as follows: "Well, I went in and talked about oranges and made them a price. I think to start with $1.30, and they said they would take it up and in the course of a day or so wanted to know if I would take $1.20 for seedlings, and I said 'Yes,' and Mr. Wilson then wrote up a contract for 20 cars flat not putting 'more or less' in. I said 'No' I would not sign the contract because we might not have 5 cars or might have 15 or we might not have 10, but that they would get all the fruit we got, and we tore up that contract and wrote this contract, putting in 'twenty cars, more or less,' which was signed, and Mr. Peycke, after reading the signed contract over, said, 'Oh that might mean one car,' and I said 'You will have more than one car, Mr. Peycke. You will get all the fruit we get.'" The vice president of appellant, Mr. Wilson, also testified in reference to the same conversation that Mr. Hills said he was to get the fruit "from the orchards that he had already procured in Butte county. He simply said he had them bought, mostly bought by the lump on the tree. He said he had bought and sold all crops of fruit on those orchards for years. He offered us 20 cars, more or less, anywhere from 18 to 23. He said there should be 20 cars of seedlings and about 3 cars of sweets, as near as he could estimate it, and that there was no doubt in his mind that there would be 20 cars at least, including the sweets." From the foregoing it is perfectly apparent that the understanding of the parties was that the purchase related to the fruit grown on certain trees and that the quantity mentioned in the contract was simply an estimate of the number of car loads. The evidence further shows that on account of dry weather the quantity of the fruit fell far below expectations. Of this appellant was informed by letter before any of the fruit was delivered.

It is clear that, if the pleadings had been properly framed, the court would have been entirely justified in reforming the said written contract so as to express the real intention of the parties and in awarding plaintiffs judgment in accordance with said reformation. As the evidence of said intention was admitted without objection it hardly becomes appellant now to contend for the first time that the evidence was not within the issues made by the pleadings.

It is not necessary, however, to hold, and we do not hold, that the point cannot be made, as we are satisfied the trial court was warranted in finding that "said defendant received and accepted all of said nine car loads of oranges so sold and delivered to it by plaintiffs as aforesaid and said defendant paid to said plaintiffs the full amount due therefor under the terms of said contract, excepting only the sum of four hundred and seventy-seven and $^{82}/_{100}$ ($477.82) dollars, being the price due for the last car load of oranges so sold and delivered to defendant and received and accepted by it under the terms of said contract," and that defendant did not suffer damage "in the sum of three hundred and forty-five and $^{60}/_{100}$ ($345.60) dollars, or any other sum or at all by reason of the failure of said plaintiffs to perform said contract, or any contracts or the consequent inability of said defendant to deliver the oranges so sold, or for both of said reasons or for any other reasons, or at all." The foregoing implied findings, together with the admissions of the pleadings, are sufficient to support the judgment.

Appellant calls attention to the ruling of the court in sustaining the objection of respondents to certain questions asked by defendant. But, as appellant admits that the conversation called for by the questions "was entirely immaterial and irrelevant," we feel called upon to do no more than to agree with the admission.

The contention of respondents that the specification that "the evidence does not support the judgment in this," etc., is not sufficient to warrant a review of the evidence, need not be considered, as we think upon the merits respondents should prevail.

The judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

1. INSURANCE (§ 146*)—POLICIES—CONSTRUCTION.

While an insurance policy, like other contracts, is to be construed and given effect according to its language and terms, its provisos and exceptions are to be strictly construed against the insurer, and liberally in favor of the insured, and any ambiguity or reasonable doubt is to be resolved in favor of insured and against the insurer.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Heating & Ventilating Company against the Williamsburgh City Fire Insurance Company of Brooklyn. From an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Otto Irving Wise and T. C. Van Ness, for appellant. Vogelsang & Brown and L. A. Redman, for respondent. Charles S. Wheeler and J. F. Bowie, amici curiæ.

PER CURIAM. This appeal was first considered by the District Court of Appeal for the First District, which affirmed the order appealed from. Thereafter, on motion of the appellant, the cause was transferred to this court for hearing and determination.

The opinion filed by the District Court of Appeal was prepared by Cooper, P. J. It reads as follows:

"This action was brought to recover upon a fire insurance policy issued by defendant. Plaintiff had judgment, and the court denied a motion for a new trial, and this appeal is from the order.

"The policy was an agreement by defendant, in consideration of the premium paid, to indemnify the plaintiff against loss of the insured property by fire to the amount of the policy. The question turns upon the following provision in the policy, to wit: 'This company shall not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by invasion, insurrection, riot, civil war or commotion, or military or usurped power, or by order of any civil authority; or for loss or damage occasioned by or through any volcano, earthquake, or hurricane, or other eruption, convulsion, or disturbance; or by theft; or by neglect of the insured to use all reasonable means to save and preserve the property at and after a fire or when the property is endangered by fire in neighboring premises; or (unless fire ensues, and, in that event, for the damage by fire only) by explosion of any kind, or lightning; but liability for direct damage by lightning may be assumed by specific agreement hereon.' The defendant in its answer alleged that the fire and the consequent loss were occasioned by and through earthquake, and that but for such earthquake the fire and loss would not have occurred. In support of such defense, the defendant offered to prove that on the day the insured property was destroyed by fire, to wit, on April 18, 1906, an earthquake occurred, and that 'a fire caused by said earthquake started in and broke out upon the premises occupied by Mack & Co., wholesale druggists, situate on the east side of Fremont street, known as Nos. 13–19 Fremont street; that said fire thereafter spread southerly from building to building, to and destroyed the property insured under the policy herein sued on, said property being situate in block No. 389 in which the building occupied by Mack & Co. was situate.' To this offer the court sustained plaintiff's objection, and the question is thus squarely presented as to whether or not the offered evidence was admissible under the issues. A policy of insurance is but a contract, and, like all other contracts, it must be construed according to the language and terms used therein in order to arrive at its true sense and meaning. Courts will not undertake to relieve parties from the express and plain stipulations into which they have entered. But, while this is true, it is also a rule well established by the courts that provisos and exceptions contained in a policy of insurance must be strictly construed against the insurer and liberally in favor of the insured. This rule is based upon the fact that the contract of insurance is drawn by the insurer, and in it are usually placed many exceptions, conditions, and forfeitures deliberately and purposely by the insurer so as to avoid liability, and the ordinary person in paying a premium and accepting a policy does not read, or, if he does read, he cannot understand the many conditions, exemptions, and exceptions contained therein. In fact such provisions, exceptions, and conditions in many cases, on account of their ambiguity, have been construed differently by the most eminent lawyers and the highest courts of the land. Therefore the courts endeavor to carry out the contracts as made by the parties, and, at the same time, prevent, if possible, the exceptions and conditions from wholly devouring the policy. It is therefore a fundamental rule that the insurer is in duty bound to use such language as to make the conditions, exceptions, and provisions of the policy clear to the ordinary mind, and, in case it fails to do so, any ambiguity or reasonable doubt must be resolved in favor of the insured and against the insurer. As said by the Supreme Court of this state in Nielsen v. Provident Savings, etc., Soc., 139 Cal. 332 [73 Pac. 168, 96 Am. St. Rep. 146] (where it was held that a provision in a statute in regard to life insurance policies to the effect that the reserve fund shall be applied as shall have been agreed in the policy, either to continue the insurance or to purchase a paid-up policy, and the insured died after a premium was due without having asked to have the reserve fund of $5.10 applied to either continue the policy, or to purchase a paid-up policy, must be so construed that the reserve fund, which was sufficient to pay the premium for the days the insured lived after his premium became due, kept the policy alive and valid up to the time of the death of the insured): 'The spirit of the statute requires a broad meaning to be given to it for the benefit of the insured.'

"In the light of what has been said, we will examine the condition or exception in this policy, as it reads, with relation to its context so as to arrive at its correct construction. The plaintiff desired to have his property insured against the peril of fire, and with this in view procured the policy. By its plain terms the company agreed to pay him a certain sum in case of the destruction of his property by fire. His property was destroyed by fire, and the defendant thus became liable unless saved by the exception in the clause hereinbefore quoted. The first part of the exception, to wit, 'this company shall not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by invasion, insurrection, riot, civil war or commotion, or military or usurped power, or by order of any civil authority,' ends by a semicolon. It is thus plainly stated that the company shall not be liable for loss 'caused directly or indirectly' by the various things therein enumerated. As the damage in this case was not caused by any of the things enumerated in the first clause of the condition, it therefore is not subject to the comprehensive words 'caused directly or indirectly.' After the use of the above quoted words, and after the semicolon, occur the words 'or for loss or damage occasioned by or through any volcano, earthquake. * * *' The words 'damage occasioned by or through * * * any earthquake' by their fair interpretation mean such damage as is caused 'by or through an earthquake.' What was the cause of the plaintiff's loss or damage? It was fire, the peril which he had insured against. When the earthquake occurred, and the vibrations of the earth ceased, the plaintiff's property had not been damaged, nor had he lost it. His property remained intact, and it had not been set on fire by the earthquake. He had suffered no loss by the earthquake or through the earthquake. He afterwards lost his property by fire, which was the direct and proximate cause of his loss.

"It is true that appellant claims that the earthquake caused the fire in the building occupied by Mack & Co., and that this fire caused the fire in the adjoining building, and that this caused the fire in the next adjoining building, and so on until finally it reached and burned the property of the plaintiff. If we go back from cause to cause, we can trace the parent cause to the earthquake which was the remote cause of the fire. But the plain common-sense reading of the policy would convey no information to plaintiff that he could not recover if the cause of the cause of the cause of the fire was an earthquake. He could understand by reading the policy that if an earthquake should by its violence set his building on fire that he could not recover the loss; but it would be difficult for any one to understand that the plaintiff agreed that the defendant might be exempt from a fire the remote cause of which was an earthquake.

"Suppose a statute should make it a crime for any one to cause a building to be burned. A. becomes the father of a mischievous boy. He buys matches and leaves them on his dining room table. The boy of his own volition takes the matches and sets fire to the building. A. in one sense caused the fire as he was the remote cause of it. He became the father of the boy, he bought the matches, and left them where the boy could get them. Was the fire caused or occasioned by or through A. under such circumstances? According to the theory of appellant, if a very slight shock of earthquake had upset a lamp and thus set fire to a building, and this building should communicate the fire to an adjoining building, and thence from building to building until the whole city had burned, not a dollar of insurance could be recovered if the policies each contained the clause under discussion. We do not think that either the plaintiff or the defendant ever contemplated making any such contract. It would certainly require the most clear and unambiguous language to justify any court in placing a construction upon a policy of insurance that would have such result. The company, by its own words, in the first part of the clause has provided that it shall not be liable for loss in certain cases caused either 'directly or indirectly' by the things therein enumerated. It then, after a semicolon, used other language. It dropped the words 'directly or indirectly,' and in lieu thereof used the words 'by or through.' Was it the intention that the words 'by or through' should have a different meaning from the words 'directly or indirectly'? We think it clearly appears that it was not intended by the use of the words 'by or through' that the defendant was not to be held for any loss indirectly caused by earthquake, volcano, hurricane, or any of the terms used after the words 'by or through.'

"Appellant calls our attention to section 2628 of the Civil Code, and insists that it is exempt under said section. There are two sections of the Civil Code bearing upon the question discussed, and they must be read together. Section 2626: 'An insurer is liable for a loss of which a peril insured against was the proximate cause; although a peril not contemplated by the contract may have been a remote cause of the loss; but he is not liable for a loss of which the peril insured against was only a remote cause.' Section 2628: 'When a peril is specially excepted in a contract of insurance, a loss, which would not have occurred but for such peril, is thereby excepted; although the immediate cause of the loss was a peril which was not excepted.' It will be noticed that section 2626 makes the insurer liable when the peril insured against was the proximate cause of the loss, although a peril not contemplated may have been the remote cause. In this case the peril insured against was fire. The peril not insured against was earthquake. The defendant is liable although the earthquake was the remote cause of the loss. What is the meaning of section 2628? As applied to this case the peril specially excepted is fire directly caused by an earthquake. If what has been said heretofore is logical and correct, the policy only excepted loss by a fire directly caused by an earthquake. The excepted peril—that is, loss by fire caused directly by an earthquake—did not occur. The question therefore as to whether or not the loss would have occurred but for an excepted peril which never occurred is a false quantity. It is not necessary to hold that the company by providing that it should not be liable for fire losses directly caused by an earthquake can read the provisions of section 2628 into the proviso, and thus claim an exemption much broader than that stipulated for in the policy. It certainly would be carrying the exception to a great length to hold that the plaintiff agreed that the defendant should not be liable for fire loss directly caused by earthquake, and that, by reason of the section, the defendant is not liable for a fire indirectly caused by an earthquake. No rule of construction would justify us in holding that the section broadens the scope of the original exception. The exception was made in the contract of insurance and must be held to control, as it was the deliberate words of the parties used by them in making the contract. The rule herein announced is supported by analogous cases in many jurisdictions.

"In Winspear v. Insurance Co., 6 Q. B. Div. 42, the terms of the policy provided 'that it should cover any personal injury caused by accidental, external and visible means, if the direct effect of such injury should occasion his death;' and it further provided that it should not extend to 'any injury caused by or arising from natural disease or weakness or exhaustion consequent upon disease.' The insured was seized with an epileptic fit, and fell into a stream, and was there drowned while suffering from the fit. It was held that the death was within the risk covered by the policy, and that the proviso did not apply.

"In Lawrence v. Insurance Co., 7 Q. B. Div. 216, the policy provided: 'This policy covers injuries accidentally occurring from material and external cause appearing upon the person of the insured, where such accidental injury is the direct and sole cause of the death of the insured, but it does not insure in case of death from fits * * * or any disease whatsoever arising before or at the time or following such accidental injury, whether consequent upon such accidental injury or not, or whether causing such death directly or jointly with such accidental injury.' The insured, while at a railroad station, was seized with a fit, and fell forward off the platform across the railway, when an engine and carriages which were passing went over his body, and killed him. It was held that the death of the insured was caused by an accident within the meaning of the policy, and that the insurers were liable.

"In Mfg. Ind. Co. v. Dorgan, 58 Fed. 945, 7 C. C. A. 581, 22 L. R. A. 620, an action was brought on a policy of insurance. It was contended that, while suffering from an attack of heart disease, the insured fell into a stream in which he was fishing, and was drowned. The trial court assumed that the fall was due to weakness of the heart, and proceeded on this assumption to construe the policy. The policy provided that the company should not be liable if death was caused by 'any bodily injury happening directly or indirectly in consequence of disease, or to death or disability caused wholly or in part by bodily infirmities or disease, or to any cause where the accidental injury was not the proximate and sole cause of disability or death.' It was held that death was caused by drowning, and not from disease, and Judge Taft, delivering the opinion, said: 'We are of the opinion that in the legal sense, and within the meaning of the last clause, if the deceased suffered death by drowning, no matter what was the cause of his falling into the water, whether disease or a slipping, the drowning in such case would be the proximate and sole cause of the disability or death, unless it appeared that death would have been the result, even had there been no water at hand to fall into. The disease would be but the condition; the drowning would be the moving, sole and proximate cause.'

"It was said by Judge Seawell of the superior court in the case of Baker & Hamilton against this same defendant, in construing the same provision in one of the defendant's policies: 'The primary fires may have been due to unskillful or defective wiring, or to improper construction of the buildings in which they were installed, or both. It was known to the parties when they entered into the contract that the defendant was to be liable for a loss of which fire and not earthquake was the proximate cause. It is unreasonable to hold that in accepting the policy plaintiff should have understood that he assumed the consequences of the negligence of other persons, over whom he had no control, at a point far distant from the insured property.' In another case of Baker & Hamilton against this same defendant (157 Fed. 280), it was said by Judge Whitson, in considering the same clause in a like policy: 'Having seen that this exception relates to the origin of the fire, and that there must be a direct connection between the earthquake and the starting of the fire, it seems reasonably clear that it was the intention of the defendant to exempt itself from liability if an earthquake should be the immediate, proximate, and direct cause of a fire which destroyed the property. That might occur in a good many ways. Earthquake might cause a fire in the building by short-circuiting of the wires, or by a gas explosion, or by throwing inflammable material into contact with the fire of a furnace, or the like, and this would be an earthquake-caused fire. But if such a fire should start in a building a mile away, and be thence communicated from building to building until it reached property not directly so affected, a fire originating would be indirectly caused by earthquake, and not directly.' In another case, of Willard against this same insurance company, Judge Van Fleet construed the policy in the same way; and his ruling was affirmed in an opinion delivered by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, 164 Fed. 404 [90 C. C. A. 392, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 103]. It is not necessary to quote from that case or from other authorities. The cases cited fully support the construction we have given to this policy."

Our further examination has satisfied us that the views expressed in the foregoing opinion are correct. In answer to certain suggestions made by appellant in its petition for a hearing of the cause in this court, we may add that we do not understand the opinion now approved by us to hold that, under the facts stated in defendant's offer of proof, the earthquake was as matter of law and for all purposes to be regarded as a remote rather than the proximate cause of the loss. The conclusion reached by the Court of Appeal is based on the peculiar phraseology of this particular policy, which makes a distinction between loss caused "directly or indirectly" by certain means other than earthquake and "loss or damage occasioned by or through" earthquake. The omission of the words "directly or indirectly" from the clause dealing with earthquake justifies a limitation of that clause to loss occasioned directly, as well as proximately, by earthquake. The grounds and the result of this construction are more fully and very satisfactorily set forth in the opinion of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in Williamsburgh City F. I. Co. v. Willard, 164 Fed. 404, 90 C. C. A. 392, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 103, one of the cases cited by Mr. Justice Cooper.

The order is affirmed.

In re HIGGINS' ESTATE. (L. A. 2,607.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 7, 1910.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 111*)—ATTORNEY'S FEES—WHEN PROPERLY ALLOWED.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1616, authorizing allowance of attorney's fees in administration, entitles an attorney only to such sums as are properly allowable to the executor or administrator as necessary expenses in discharging his duties, and under section 1619, to warrant an allowance of such fees for litigation of the executor or administrator, the litigation must have been such as was necessary for him to prosecute or defend.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 448-462; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 256*)—PROBATE—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

On objections to an allowance of fees to attorneys who resisted a will contest, a determination below that it was necessary and proper for the executor to resist the contest is not conclusive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 111*)—ATTORNEY'S FEES—PROPRIETY AS CHARGE AGAINST ESTATE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1299, 1312, one could defend a will as executor, but if the defense is solely for his own benefit as a devisee or a legatee, and cannot operate beneficially as to others interested in the estate, he must bear the costs and charges, and hence fees of attorneys who successfully resisted a will contest were improperly allowed against the estate where the contest was in effect between the executor as a beneficiary and another beneficiary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 462; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Thomas J. Higgins, deceased. From an order allowing attorney's fees, Cornelia B. Chick and another appeal. Reversed.

See, also, 156 Cal. 257, 104 Pac. 6.

E. H. Lamme and Puterbaugh & Puterbaugh, for appellants. Wright, Schoonover & Winnek, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from an order made on the application of certain attorneys under section 1616 of the Code of Civil Procedure fixing the sum of $2,000 as their compensation for extraordinary legal services in resisting a contest before probate of the will of deceased, and directing the payment of the same by the executor of the will from the moneys in his hands belonging to the estate.

The deceased left an estate consisting entirely of community property. He left surviving him his wife, Phoebe B. Higgins, a daughter, Cornelia B. Chick, and two sons, Albert E. Higgins and Herbert R. Higgins. By the terms of his will he purported to give to his wife her one-half of said community property, and divided the other one-half as follows: One-sixth to said Cornelia, two-sixths to said Albert, and three-sixths to said Herbert. The effect of the will was therefore simply to take from Cornelia one-half of the share to which she would have succeeded as an heir if deceased had died intestate and to give the same to Herbert. Herbert was named in said will as the executor thereof. He offered the will for probate. Objections to its admission to probate on the grounds of undue influence and incompetency were presented by Cornelia and Albert, and these objections were answered and contested by Herbert and the widow. The petitioning attorneys were employed by the proponent, Herbert, to represent him in said contest, and it is for the services rendered under such employment that compensation from the estate was allowed by the order appealed from. The proponent prevailed upon the contest, and the will was admitted to probate. The application of the attorneys for payment for their services from the funds of the estate was opposed by Cornelia and Albert, and the appeal from the order making such allowance is by them.

As was substantially said in Estate of Hite, 155 Cal. 448, 452, 101 Pac. 448, an attorney can obtain by an application for fees for legal services made under section 1616 of the Code of Civil Procedure only such sums as are properly allowable to the executor or administrator as necessary expenses in the discharge of his duties. The question, therefore, is whether the trial court would have been warranted in concluding that the executor was entitled to recover from the estate the fee that he had paid or for which he had become liable to the attorneys employed by him to resist the contest of the will for the services rendered by them under such employment. In view of the provisions of section 1619 of the Code of Civil Procedure to warrant an allowance for attorney's fees for litigation of the executor or administrator, the litigation must have been such as was "necessary for the executor or administrator to prosecute or defend." In Estate of Hite, supra, it was held that the lower court was fully warranted in refusing to make any allowance to the executor in a case where the contest had been successfully resisted; the basis of the decision being that the court was justified in concluding that the case was one in which it was just and equitable that such expense should be borne by those who had a direct and beneficial interest in maintaining the assailed will, rather than by the estate generally, and that the estate had no such interest in the maintenance of certain codicils assailed by the contest as warranted the executor in defending the same at the expense of the estate. It was definitely declared that the executor named in a will is not bound to engage in litigation for the purpose of establishing the paper offered by him for probate, and, approvingly quoting from Woerner on Administration, that, if the executor "voluntarily assume the burden of a contest which properly belongs to the legatees or devisees, he must look to them, and not to the estate for reimbursement." It was conceded that it was for the probate court to determine whether the case was one wherein it was necessary and proper for the executor as such to have resisted the opposition to the probate. In this case the lower court has made such determination in favor of the executor, but its determination is not conclusive, and should be set aside if it is clear that it is entirely without support in the facts. The undisputed facts in this case are much stronger against the executor than those in the Hite Case. They show that the only person beneficially interested in maintaining the will was the executor himself. If maintained, he would receive three-twelfths of the estate of deceased instead of two-twelfths, and Cornelia would receive but one-twelfth instead of two-twelfths. In all other respects the disposition of the property of deceased would be unaffected by the result of the contest. The contest was thus practically nothing but a contest between the executor and Cornelia for one-twelfth of the estate of decedent. No one else was or could be beneficially interested. In view of the principles declared in the Hite Case, there was nothing in the facts of this case to furnish any support for a conclusion that the executor was warranted in defending this will at the expense of the estate. To hold otherwise would simply be to enable him by reason of his position as executor to subject the whole estate to such expenses as were incurred by him in litigation defended by him for his own sole benefit as a devisee and legatee under the assailed will. It cannot properly be held that it was necessary for him as executor to defend such litigation. While he undoubtedly had the legal right under our statute to defend the will in his capacity as executor (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1299, 1312; Estate of Hite, supra), if such defense was solely for his own benefit as a devisee and legatee and could not operate beneficially as to any other person interested in the estate, he must bear the costs and charges of maintaining it. The general reasoning in support of our conclusion has been so recently stated in Estate of Hite, supra, that it is unnecessary to discuss the question further. If there be anything in Estate of Riviere, 8 Cal. App. 773, 98 Pac. 46, that is in conflict with what is said in Estate of Hite, supra, the latter case must of course control. But, as we understand Estate of Riviere, supra, the point decided by the learned District Court of Appeal was simply that an attorney's fee may, under some circumstances, be allowed an executor for service rendered by attorneys employed by him in resisting a contest before probate, where the contest is unsuccessful, and the will is finally admitted to probate. This we are not disposed to dispute. The circumstances may well be such as to make such an allowance entirely equitable as to all persons interested in the estate. But, if expressions in that case can reasonably be construed as going further than this, they cannot be considered as authority.

1. Mechanics' Liens (§ 279*)—Time (§ 10*)—Consent of Owner—Notice by Owner to Prevent Lien.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, authorizing an owner to prevent a lien by giving notice within 10 days after obtaining knowledge of the work that he will not be responsible therefor, the actual owner may object formally to work done on his property under contract with the record owner within 10 days after discovering that the work is under way, and intervening holidays do not curtail the privilege under section 13, providing that when any act of a secular nature is appointed by law to be performed on a particular day, which falls on a holiday, the act may be performed on the next business day, and, where he does not exercise the right at that time, he must affirmatively show to defeat the lien prima facie established that holidays extended the time for protest, and that protest was made after the holidays ended.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Dec. Dig. § 279;* Time, Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

2. Mechanics' Liens (§ 76*)—Consent of Owner—Notice by Owner to Prevent Lien.

The doctrine on which Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, authorizing an owner to prevent a lien by giving notice within 10 days after obtaining knowledge of performance of work on his premises that he will not be responsible therefor, rests, is that of estoppel, and an owner having either by his own act or that of another, with his consent or knowledge, procured the improvement of property and received the benefit thereof, has created an equitable lien to secure the payment of the value of the labor and materials.

3. Mechanics' Liens (§ 78*)—Consent of Owner—Notice by Owner to Prevent Lien.

The knowledge of an owner which is sufficient to place him in default for failure to give the notice required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, authorizing an owner to prevent a lien by giving notice within a specified time after obtaining knowledge of the construction of the improvement on his property, need not be absolute, and it is enough that it puts a prudent man on inquiry.

4. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 78*)—CONSENT OF OWNER—NOTICE BY OWNER TO PREVENT LIEN.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, permitting an owner to prevent a lien on his property by giving notice within 10 days after knowledge of the construction of an improvement on his premises that he will not be responsible therefor, does not fix any limitation as to the stage of the work at the time at which the notice must be given, and the statute is complied with by posting a notice on the same day the improvement began, provided that is within the specified number of days after obtaining knowledge either of the construction or intended construction.

Consolidated action by John R. Gentle & Co. and another against Amy E. Britton, otherwise known as Amy E. Manning, and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

J. Marion Brooks, for appellant. G. C. De Garmo, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. A rehearing was granted after an opinion in this case had been handed down by the District Court of Appeal. The principal reason for allowing said rehearing was that in the complaint of John R. Gentle & Co. it was shown that the work, which was the basis of the liens mentioned in this action, was completed May 19, 1906, while plaintiff showed at the trial only that appellant, Amy E. Britton, went to the property "in May, 1906," and, according to the appellant, from all that appears in the record the work may have been finished prior to that time. Upon further examination of the transcript, however, we find that appellant herself admitted the contrary fact because she testified that when the work was brought to her attention in the month of May, 1906, she "forbade the same." Obviously she could not forbid something that was already accomplished.

The actions were based upon certain work performed upon property of which appellant Britton was the record owner. This was occupied by one Mainzor, and the contracts for the work were made by the said Mainzor. It was found by the court that Amy E. Britton knew of the improvements described in the complaint, but that she failed to post notices on the premises or to otherwise notify the plaintiff that she would not be responsible for the work done upon her property, as required by section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure. During all of the time that the work was in progress and the materials were being furnished, a number of successive legal holidays were declared by the Governor. This fact, according to the contention of appellant's counsel, postponed the time for Amy E. Britton to post her notices under section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure until after the completion of the improvements on her property, "at which time," he says, "the posting would be a nugatory and vain act, not required by law." In support of this point he cites section 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides: "Whenever any act of a secular nature, other than a work of necessity or mercy, is appointed by law or contract to be performed upon a particular day, which day falls upon a holiday, such act may be performed upon the next business day with the same effect as if it had been performed upon the day appointed." As this court has said: "Whether a day which the law authorizes to be fixed upon a particular day may be said to be a day appointed by law is at least doubtful." Baxter v. Vineland Irr. Dist., 136 Cal. 193, 68 Pac. 601. But, even if we should concede that the continuance of the holidays during all of the time when the work was being done postponed appellant's right to avail herself of the notice prescribed by section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we cannot see how the completion of the work would render her act nugatory when the holidays had ended. It seems to us that, if the existence of the holidays postponed her privilege, she would still be under the necessity of posting notice upon the first secular day after her discovery of the activities of the laborers and materialmen who subsequently became lien claimants. The question of the effect of the holidays might arise if she were attempting to show the posting of notices or the recording of protest under section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure on the first day succeeding the holidays, but that question is not presented here. Under that section she certainly had the privilege of objecting formally to the work within 10 days after her discovery that it was under way, and the intervening holidays would not curtail that privilege. Baxter v. Vineland Irr. Dist., supra. She did not exercise her right at that time, and, having shown that fact, plaintiff established a prima facie case. If the holidays extended her time for protest, and if she had made her due and formal objection after they ended, that would be a matter for her to show affirmatively. This she did not do.

This opinion is not to be construed as an intimation that we consider the existence of legal holidays a postponement of the necessity for the posting of notice in order to avoid a lien upon property by one who discovers that work is in progress upon his land. It has simply been unnecessary to decide that question here.

"This is a consolidated action to foreclose four mechanics' liens. Judgment was for each of the claimants for the amount prayed for, and the defendant owner appeals from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

"It is contended by appellant that the judgment should be reversed because the improvements were made at the instance and request of a person other than the record owner, and that the owner was without knowledge that the alterations and repairs had been made until after they were completed; or, if notice was given to her, or knowledge of the improvements brought home to her in time, that, by reason of the holidays proclaimed by the Governor, commencing April 18, 1906, and continuing until after the completion of the work, she was excused from serving the notice provided by section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure until the cessation of such holidays. The claims of lien are all based upon the contracts made with one E. Mainzor, who is alleged to be the reputed owner of the premises upon which the work was done. The material was furnished and the labor performed at the times and for the sums following, to wit: Gentle & Co., between April 9 and May 19, 1906, $159.20; Baker & Co., between April 10 and May 19, 1906, $54.60; C. S. Bunnell, between February 17 and June 23, 1906, $120.65; Ritchey & Grotthouse, between February 2 and June 21, 1906, $89.31. It is alleged in the complaints that knowledge that the improvements were being made was obtained by appellant in March, 1906, but that she failed to give the notice provided for by section 1192. The finding of the court in this respect is that appellant received such knowledge 'during the month of May, 1906, instead of March, 1906.' In all other respects the allegations of the complaints are found to be true, and the allegations of the answer of defendant Amy E. Britton to be untrue, and these findings are supported by the evidence.

"The doctrine upon which section 1192 of the Code of Civil Procedure rests is that of estoppel, which is indeed the underlying principle of the entire theory of the mechanic's lien. The owner of real property having, either by his own act or that of another with his consent or knowledge, procured the improvement of such property and received the benefit of the labor or material of another thereby, is deemed to have created an equitable lien upon the premises to secure the payment of the value of such labor and materials. He is like the owner of property who stands knowingly and silently by and sees another person sell such property to an innocent purchaser who believes the seller to be the owner, and so believing parts with value for it.

"The knowledge upon the owner's part which is sufficient to place him in default for failure to give the notice required need not be absolute. It is enough that it would put a prudent man upon inquiry. Evans v. Judson, 120 Cal. 282, 284, 52 Pac. 585. It is not important, then, whether Mrs. Britton received her notice through the agent, Fred Woy, or not. This would only be important if it were sought to consider the knowledge of Woy as the knowledge of appellant, but this is not the case. Woy discovered that the improvements were being made in May. He notified appellant by letter in the same month, but no day of the month is stated as to either and the finding is also indefinite in this respect.

"The statute as originally enacted did not contain the clause, 'intended construction,' and the time for posting the notice was fixed at three days after knowledge of the construction, alteration, or repair. This must then be construed to mean of the progress of the work, which could not have been earlier than the commencement of the work, and it has been held that where an owner had knowledge of the 'intended construction' and did not give the notice within three days thereafter, but gave such notice within three days after the commencement of the work, he was entitled to the protection of the statute. Birch & Co. v. Magic Transit Co., 139 Cal. 496, 500, 73 Pac. 238.

"The law does not say that upon the posting of the notice, the owner will not be liable for any labor performed or material furnished thereafter, but that, if he fails to post such notice within the statutory time after knowledge that the improvement was being made, it shall be held to have been constructed at his instance. There is no limitation in respect to the stage of the work at the time at which the notice must be posted. The statutory provision would be complied with by a posting on the same day the improvement was begun, if this were within three days after knowledge was obtained, either of the construction or intended construction. And, if done within three days after knowledge received, we see no reason why it would not be timely upon any day when the work on the improvement was in progress. * * *

"While these are the matters chiefly urged in appellant's brief, we have examined the other specifications of insufficiency of evidence to sustain the findings, but find nothing justifying a reversal. The evidence in the statement is meager and stated principally in effect, except the notices of lien introduced, which are set out in full. The latter are not open to the criticism made as to their form; and, as to whether they varied in statement from the proof, there is nothing in the record from which this can be determined, the summarized statement of the evidence introduced by plaintiffs being in effect that they proved their cases in conformity with the pleadings. The court so found, and no error appears in the record."

Judgment and order affirmed.

JUDD v. LETTS. (L. A. 2,451.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 8, 1910. Rehearing Denied Oct. 7, 1910.)

1. Master and Servant (§ 183*)—Injuries to Servant — Fellow-Servant Rule — Statutes—Construction.

Civ. Code, § 1970, relating to fellow servants, as amended by St. 1907, c. 97, provides that the employer shall be liable for injury to a servant from the negligence of a co-employé in another department of labor, or employed on a machine, railroad train, switch signal point, locomotive engine, or other appliance than that on which the employé injured is employed, or who is charged with dispatching trains, or transmitting telegraphic or telephonic orders on any railroad, or in the operation of any mine, factory, machine shop, or other industrial establishment. Held, that the words "on any railroad, or in the operation of any mine, factory, machine shop or other industrial establishment" should not be construed as qualifying all the preceding clauses so as to restrict the department of labor rule to railroads, mines, factories, machine shops, or industrial establishments, but that the rule should be extended to labor activities generally.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 373; Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

2. Master and Servant (§ 196*)—Fellow Servants—Statutes.

Under Civ. Code, § 1970, providing (prior to its amendment by St. 1907, c. 97) that an employer should not be liable for injuries to employés caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, a common employment existed between servants when each was employed in the same general business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 486; Dec. Dig. § 196.*]

3. Master and Servant (§ 183*)—Injuries to Servant—"Department of Labor."

Under Civ. Code, § 1970, as amended by St. 1907, c. 97, providing that the fellow-servant rule shall not prevent recovery for injuries to a servant by the negligence of a servant in a different department of labor, the question whether employés are engaged in the same department should be determined by inquiring inter alia whether they are habitually associated or brought together in the performance of their duties, whether they are under the immediate direction and control of the same superior, and whether the duties of one have any relation to or connection with those of the other.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1989.]

4. Master and Servant (§ 287*)—Questions for Court and Jury—Departments of Labor—Co-Employés.

Where the facts on an issue as to whether an injured employé and the employé by whose negligence the injury has been caused are engaged in different departments of labor are disputed, or, if undisputed, are such as to reasonably permit contrary inferences, the question is for the jury, but should be decided by the court when reasonable minds could not differ as to the conclusion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1057; Dec. Dig. § 287.*]

5. Master and Servant (§ 183*)—Injuries to Servant—Fellow Servants—"Department of Labor."

Plaintiff, an employé in the ladies' suit department of a department store, was injured by the alleged negligence of the elevator operator while plaintiff at the close of a day's work was ascending to the fourth floor to obtain her hat and other belongings, preparatory to departure from the store. Held, that plaintiff and the elevator operator were engaged in different departments of labor as a matter of law, within Civ. Code, § 1970, as amended by St. 1907, c. 97, providing that the fellow-servant rule should not apply as between servants engaged in different departments of labor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 373; Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

6. Appeal and Error (§ 1050*)—Review—Admission of Evidence—Prejudice.

In an action for injuries to a saleslady in a department store by the alleged negligence of the elevator operator, defendant was not prejudiced by evidence that there were various departments in the store with the names of some of them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4153; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

7. Witnesses (§ 318*)—Corroboration—Prior Statements.

Defendant could not support the unimpeached testimony of his own witness by proof that she had made similar statements at another time in an affidavit.

8. Trial (§ 304*)—Misconduct of Jury—Request for View.

A suggestion by one of the jurors during the trial that the jury be sent to view a passenger elevator in question, supported by a statement that he had talked with some of his associates, and that several of them were of the same mind, did not constitute prejudicial misconduct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 725-727; Dec. Dig. § 304.*]

Action by Frances Augusta Judd against Arthur Letts. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Lawler, Allen, Van Dyke & Jutten and R. P. Jennings, for appellant. Jones & Drake, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for personal injuries. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant conducted, in the city of Los Angeles, a retail store known as "The Broadway Department Store." The business was carried on in a four-story building. Three passenger elevators were operated therein for the use of customers and employés of the defendant. On February 21, 1908, the plaintiff, who was employed by defendant in the ladies' suit department, on the second floor of said store, had occasion, after completing her day's work in that department, to ascend to the fourth floor, where she had left her hat and other belongings at a place provided for that purpose. One of the elevators stopped at the second floor, and plaintiff entered it. The operator started to ascend, and, before the next floor had been reached, the plaintiff's left leg was in some way drawn between the elevator and the shaft and casings thereof, inflicting serious injuries upon her. The contention of the plaintiff was that the mishap was caused by the negligent action of the elevator operator in closing the door of the elevator too soon after plaintiff's entrance, thereby catching her dress in the door. He then, as was claimed, started the elevator upward before plaintiff's dress could be released. There was testimony in support of this theory, and the jury, as appears from its verdict, accepted such testimony as true. This court cannot, therefore, under its settled rule regarding conflicting evidence, give favorable consideration to the appellant's contention that the finding of negligence on the part of the elevator operator is without support.

The principal point of controversy arises over the following instruction given to the jury: "Although you may believe from the evidence that the servant of the defendant, who was operating the elevator at the time in controversy here, was a co-employé, with the plaintiff in the general business of operating defendant's Broadway Department Store, yet you are instructed that he was engaged in another department of labor from that of the plaintiff, and, as a matter of law the negligence, if any, of the servant operating the elevator, was the negligence of the defendant." The correctness of this instruction depends upon the interpretation to be given to section 1970 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1907. St. 1907, p. 119. Prior to 1907, the section read as follows: "An employer is not bound to indemnify his employé for losses suffered by the latter in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business in which he is employed, nor in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer in the same general business, unless the negligence causing the injury was committed in the performance of a duty the employer owes by law to the employé or unless the employer has neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employé." The amendment added this proviso: "Provided, nevertheless, that the employer shall be liable for such injury when the same results from the wrongful act, neglect or default of any agent or officer of such employer, superior to the employé injured, or of a person employed by such employer having the right to control or direct the services of such employé injured, and also when such injury results from the wrongful act, neglect or default of a co-employé engaged in another department of labor from that of the employé injured, or employed upon a machine, railroad train, switch signal point, locomotive engine, or other appliance than that upon which the employé injured is employed, or who is charged with dispatching trains, or transmitting telegraphic or telephonic orders upon any railroad, or in the operation of any mine, factory, machine shop, or other industrial establishment. * * *" While the proviso is framed in a manner that may leave a doubt concerning the proper relation of some of the phrases, we think it quite clear that the intent of the amendment was to take from all classes of employers the benefit of the fellow-servant rule, in cases where the employé injured and the one at fault are engaged in different departments of labor. The appellant argues that the concluding words of the proviso, "upon any railroad, or in the operation of any mine, factory, machine shop or other industrial establishment," qualify all the preceding clauses following the words, "and also." So arguing, he claims that the Broadway Department Store is not a railroad, mine, factory, machine shop, or other industrial establishment, and that therefore the "department of labor" exception has no application. There is no rule of grammatical construction which requires that the final clause be given the effect claimed. The interpretation thus urged would, we think, unduly limit the effect of the proviso.

This brings us to a consideration of the meaning of the phrase "another department of labor." The general rule exempting employers from liability for injuries sustained by one servant through the negligence of another servant in the same common employment has been declared, in the absence of any statute on the subject, by all the courts applying the doctrines of the common law. The decisions are by no means in accord with respect to the fundamental reason or basis for the rule, and this phase of the subject has called forth the expression of a multitude of varying views. With a discussion of these we need not here concern ourselves. So, too, the courts have differed in their attempts to define the relation of common service. In the absence of any statutory limitation of the doctrine, there have been in some jurisdictions decisions denying to the employer exemption in cases where the injured employé and the one whose negligence was asserted were not "consociated" in the same "department," or "line of employment." C. & N. W. R. Co. v. Moranda, 93 Ill. 302, 34 Am. Rep. 168; Railroad Co. v. Carroll, 6 Heisk. (Tenn.) 347; U. P. R. R. Co. v. Erickson, 41 Neb. 1, 59 N. W. 347, 29 L. R. A. 137; Relyea v. Railroad Co., 112 Mo. 86, 20 S. W. 480, 18 L. R. A. 817. In this state no such modification had ever, prior to the amendment of section 1970, been recognized. That section, as it formerly stood, was regarded as declaratory of the common law (Congrave v. S. P. R. R. Co., 88 Cal. 360, 26 Pac. 175), and, under its terms, a common employment existed when each of the servants in question was employed "in the same general business" (Mann v. O'Sullivan, 126 Cal. 61, 58 Pac. 375, 77 Am. St. Rep. 149).

It would seem clear from these considerations that the purpose of the amendment to section 1970 was to modify, in the interest of those employed, the rigor of the rule which, in many cases, denied them relief for loss or injury sustained without their fault. The enactment is remedial in character, and should be construed liberally with a view to carrying out the object sought. Such appears to have been the tendency of the courts in dealing with similar statutes. 2 Labatt, Master & Serv. § 639. Referring to a statute which used the expression "branch or department," the Supreme Court of Ohio said: "The section, however, makes no attempt to define the terms 'department' or 'branches,' but these terms should not be limited so as to embrace merely those large divisions created for convenience in administering the affairs of the company. On the contrary, it is more reasonable to suppose that they relate to those minute ones which concern the daily duties of the employés." Railroad Co. v. Margrat, 51 Ohio St. 130, 37 N. E. 11. The term "department of labor" used in our statute has, in like manner, failed to receive definition at the hands of the Legislature, and must, therefore, be construed by the courts according to the ordinary significance of the words used, taken in connection with the apparent purpose of enactment. In seeking the intent of the amendment, we are not so closely limited as is a court which undertakes, without legislative sanction, to restrict the operation of the fellow-servant rule. In those jurisdictions which, by force of judicial declaration alone, refused the benefit of the rule where employés were engaged in different departments, it may well have been thought necessary to interpret the phrase "different departments" narrowly. In undertaking, without statutory sanction, to limit the scope of a docrine of general application, the courts naturally proceed with more caution than would be appropriate where the limitation has been made a part of the policy of the state by express legislative declaration. While the decisions of the courts which, of their own motion, enunciated the so-called "department rule," are instructive, they are not conclusive here, and we shall not undertake to review them, or to declare whether they tend to support the appellant's contention.

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to formulate a definition of the phrase "department of labor" in such terms as to furnish an exact test by which to determine, on any given state of facts, whether two employés are in different departments. In a general way it may be said that the question of identity of department is to be determined by inquiring, among other things, whether the employés in question are habitually associated or brought together in the performance of their duties, whether they are under the immediate direction and control of the same superior, and whether the duties of one have any relation to or connection with those of the other. Where the facts are disputed, or, if undisputed, are such as to reasonably permit contrary inferences, the jury should be permitted to determine whether the servants were engaged in the same department of labor. But, where the facts are such that reasonable minds could not differ as to the conclusion, the question becomes one of law for the court. 2 Labatt, Master & Serv. §§ 494, 504; C. & E. I. R. R. Co. v. Driscoll, 176 Ill. 330, 52 N. E. 921; Swadley v. M. P. R. R. Co., 118 Mo. 268, 24 S. W. 140, 40 Am. St. Rep. 366; MacCarthy v. Whitcomb, 110 Wis. 113, 85 N. W. 707. In Morgan v. J. W. Robinson Co., 107 Pac. 695, the only case in which we have had occasion to consider the effect of the amendment to section 1970, the court had no hesitation in declaring that, as matter of law, the employés there involved (i. e., a carpenter engaged in the construction of a building and a man operating a freight elevator used in a retail store) were engaged in different departments of labor. We are satisfied that the same result must be reached on the facts here shown. The plaintiff's only duties were those connected with the sale of cloaks and suits. The operation of the passenger elevator was an entirely separate and distinct branch of service. There was no relation between the two beyond the fact that, at the close of her day's service, the plaintiff was permitted, for her convenience, to use the elevator in going from her place of work to the dressing room. It could not be said that she and the elevator boy were engaged in the same department of labor without perverting the ordinary meaning of words and destroying the effect of the amendment. The court rightly instructed the jury with reference to this point.

The other errors assigned by the appellant are of slight importance, and will be briefly discussed. Plaintiff and other witnesses were permitted, over defendant's objection, to testify that there were various departments in defendant's store, such as a clothing department, a grocery department, a jewelry department, and others. This testimony, if inadmissible as calling for the conclusion of the witness, could not have prejudiced the appellant. In the first place, the fact stated was obvious enough from the mere title—Broadway Department Store—given by defendant to his establishment. Furthermore, the question of identity of department was material only in so far as it affected the employment of plaintiff and of the elevator operator. Whether other classes of employés were engaged in different departments was of no consequence whatever.

Mrs. Mary Greathouse was called as a witness on behalf of the defendant, and testified, in effect, that plaintiff's skirt had not been caught in the elevator door. On cross-examination she stated that she had, at the instance of the defendant, made an affidavit stating how the accident occurred, and that, in that affidavit, she had not said that she had been unable to see whether the dress was caught or not, but, on the contrary, had said that everything was clear. Thereupon the defendant, at the request of plaintiff's attorneys, produced the affidavit. The plaintiff's attorneys inspected it, but did not offer it in evidence. On redirect examination the defendant sought to introduce the paper in evidence, and plaintiff's objection to the offer was sustained. The ruling was correct. If the affidavit had conflicted with the witness' testimony at the trial, the paper might, after proper foundation laid, have been introduced by the adverse party, but this would have been permissible for the purpose of impeachment only. It was not so introduced, and the defendant could not support the unimpeached testimony of his own witness by proof that she had made similar statements at another time. Such statements, made out of court, were clearly incompetent.

Finally, the appellant urges that a new trial should have been granted for misconduct of the jury. During the trial, one of the jurors suggested that the jury be sent to view the elevator, and added that he had talked with some of his associates and that several of them were of the same mind. Further inquiry drew from the juror in question the explanation that, while one of the attorneys was drawing a diagram, he, the juror, had said that he would rather see the elevator, whereupon one or two of his associates "merely nodded a head." This appears to have been all that occurred. After discussion between court and counsel, in the absence of the jury, the court ruled against defendant's contention that there had been misconduct. It would be rather extreme to hold that the action complained of constituted a violation of duty on the part of the jurors, under section 611 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But, if it did, it is impossible to see how the formation or the expression of a desire to view the premises could have prejudiced either party in the slightest degree. People v. West, 73 Cal. 345, 14 Pac. 848; People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 647, 49 Pac. 842.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BOSSERT. (Cr. 231.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 17, 1910. Rehearing Denied Sept. 16, 1910; Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 10, 1910.)

WITNESSES (§ 2*)—CRIMINAL LAW—CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS.

Under Const. art. 1, § 13, guaranteeing accused persons process to compel attendance of their witnesses, it was prejudicial error to refuse to compel the attendance of accused's witnesses, and, in lieu thereof, to permit their testimony given at a former trial to be read.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 2-4; Dec. Dig. § 2;* Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1343.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Henry Bossert was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

James A. Hall, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape perpetrated upon a female under the age of consent. He made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and this appeal is from that order and from the judgment.

In the preparation of his brief counsel for defendant has not presented his 60-odd points in such a way as to facilitate the work of this court. Nearly all of his points relate to rulings on evidence, and invariably he has set out the question objected to, and coupled it with the statement that the holding of the court thereon, admitting or rejecting the testimony, as the case may be, was prejudicial error. In short, the brief is in effect little more than a statement that the defendant relies on each of the objections made by him, either to evidence, to instructions, or to the conduct of the district attorney and the court. The defendant's mode of presenting his case has entailed much unnecessary labor both upon the Attorney General and upon this court.

At the commencement of the trial the defendant, having theretofore learned that some of his witnesses were not present, moved the court to issue a bench warrant for them. This motion was based upon affidavits which contained all the requisite statements entitling the defendant to the process of the court to compel the attendance of his witnesses and showed that their testimony was material. The district attorney resisted the motion, and offered to permit the testimony of these witnesses taken at a former trial to be read to and considered by the jury as testimony in the case. The court at this time declined to pass upon the motion and directed the case to proceed. Later and at the beginning of defendant's side of the case this motion was renewed, and the offer of the district attorney repeated, whereupon the court, to save expense to the county and to avoid inconvenience to the witnesses, denied the motion, and the testimony of the witnesses in question was read to the jury.

The witnesses lived in an adjoining county and therefore were within reach of the jurisdiction of the court (sections 1329, 1330, Pen. Code); and we fully agree with the defendant that, under the law in this state, it was error on the part of the court prejudicial to him to compel him to submit his case to the jury without the presence of his witnesses and the benefit of their oral testimony. The testimony of witnesses given in court is much more effective and far superior to that read to the jury in the form of a deposition. For example, the testimony of two witnesses reduced to writing, and of a contradictory character, might seem to be equally credible, whereas if they had testified in court their appearance and bearing on the witness stand might have enabled the jury to determine that one was testifying truly and the other was not. Touching this subject Blackstone, in his Commentaries, says: "In short, by this method of examination, and this only, the persons who are to decide upon the evidence have an opportunity of observing the quality, age, education, understanding, behaviour, and inclination of the witnesses, in which points all persons must appear alike when their depositions are reduced to writing, and read to the judge in the absence of those who made them, and yet as much may be frequently collected from the manner in which the evidence is delivered as from the matter of it." 2 Cooley's Blackstone, pt. 1, p. 373. Speaking on the same subject-matter this court, in People v. Fong Chung, 5 Cal. App. 591, 91 Pac. 106, quoted from an early California case, where it was said: "The value of oral testimony over all other is too well understood to suppose for a moment that such * * * statements of what it would be will have the same weight on the minds of the jury as the testimony of the witness if he had been examined before them in open court." See also Starkie on Evidence (9th Ed.) 727, 728, and State v. Berkley, 92 Mo. 41, 48, 4 S. W. 24.

On account of the superior value of such testimony to an accused, and in order to cure a defect in the common law in this regard, the Constitution of the state—like the Constitutions of nearly all other states of the Union—provides that defendants in criminal prosecutions shall "have the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses in his behalf." Section 13, art. 1, Const. See, also, section 686, Pen. Code. On the same subject Mr. Wigmore, in his work on Evidence, at section 2191, observes: "This history of the law securing for accused persons the right to compulsory process for their witnesses shows that the purpose of the statutes was to cure the defect of the common law by giving to parties defendant in criminal cases the common right which was already in custom possessed both by parties in civil cases and by the prosecution in criminal cases. The Bills of Rights in most of the Constitutions have incorporated this right, because those clauses of the Constitutions were intended to sanction permanently the more fundamental features of just and liberal criminal procedure, particularly in the parts which had at various times in the past been found liable to abuse. The Constitutions in this instance provided nothing new or exceptional; but gave solid sanction in the special case of accused persons to the procedure ordinarily practiced and recognized for witnesses in general." See, also, sections 575 and 1415 of the same treatise, and State v. Jennings, 81 Mo. 196, 51 Am. Rep. 236. The right of an accused to the personal attendance of his witnesses in court has been discussed a great many times in cases where material witnesses within the jurisdiction of the court have failed to appear at the trial, and the defendant, guilty of no lack of diligence in the matter, has been denied a continuance of the case upon the admission of the prosecution that the absent witnesses would testify as claimed by the defendant.

In the case of State v. Baker, 81 Tenn. 326, 332, after discussing at length the disadvantages suffered by a defendant compelled to submit his case without the benefit of the personal appearance of his witnesses at the trial, the court says: "While the constitutional provision that the defendant 'is to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor' may not imperatively demand their presence in any case, yet * * * it would ill accord with the spirit of that right, when the witnesses are within the reach of the process of the court, if the defendant is compelled to take a mere written statement as the equivalent of the personal appearance contemplated by the use of the process guaranteed to him by the Constitution." In the case of State v. Berkley, supra, the court said that, if it was necessary "to speak of the inestimable value to the accused to have the testimony of his witnesses delivered ore tenus before the tribunal where the accused" was to be tried, it argued "a great want of attention to, or familiarity with, that historic struggle which finally led to the right in question being embalmed in our American Constitutions, both state and federal." The court, continuing, said: "The right is an absolute one. It is not the subject of diminution, barter, or exchange. The importance of its being maintained cannot be overestimated." The court quotes with approval from 1 Burr's Trial, 178, 179, where Chief Justice Marshall, speaking on this subject, says: "The right of an accused person to the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses seems to follow necessarily from the right to examine those witnesses; and, wherever the right exists, it would be reasonable that it should be accompanied by means of rendering it effectual. * * * The genius and character of our laws and usages are friendly, not to condemnation at all events, but to a fair and impartial trial; and they consequently allow to the accused the right of preparing the means to secure such trial. * * * The Constitution and laws of the United States will now be considered for the purpose of ascertaining how they bear upon the question. The eighth amendment to the Constitution gives to the accused, 'in all criminal prosecutions, a right to a speedy and public trial, and to compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor.' The right given by this article must be deemed sacred by the courts, and the article should be so construed as to be something more than a dead letter." In State v. Salge, 2 Nev. 321, the court held —basing its opinion upon the right of the defendant to the personal appearance of his witnesses—that, if the defendant was entitled to a continuance on account of the absence of material witnesses, it was error to compel him to go to trial on admissions of what those witnesses would swear to if present. Finally, in People v. Fong Chung, supra, the district attorney, in response to a motion for a continuance, offered to concede that the absent witness would testify to the material things set forth in the affidavit read in support of the motion, whereupon the court, in view of said offer, denied the continuance. There it was said that the defendant had a constitutional right to have his witnesses orally examined in court, and, in the absence of a showing that the motion was made in bad faith, that he was entitled to a reasonable time to secure their attendance.

The defendant in the case at bar had regularly subpœnaed the witnesses in question. Their testimony was material and important to him. Nevertheless the court held that he was not entitled to the process of the court compelling their attendance, and forced the defendant to submit his case to the jury without the benefit of their oral testimony. By this ruling it is clear that the defendant was deprived of a constitutional right, for which the judgment and order must be reversed. It is so ordered, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

1. Bills and Notes (§ 132*)—Railway Right of Way Notes—Defenses.

The maker of notes "to defray the cost of securing the right of way for the Covina Extension of the Pacific Electric Railway" cannot defeat them on the theory of a departure from the route between two points, nor on the theory that the road was not built by the company it was to have been built by, where the primary object was to procure a road connecting those two points, and it was understood that the exact route would be determined later.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Action by the First National Bank of Covina and others against the Ruddock Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant C. H. Ruddock appeals. Affirmed.

LORIGAN, J. Plaintiff, as assignee of a body constituting the Citizens' Right of Way Committee of the city of Covina, brought this action against the defendant Charles H. Ruddock to recover on two promissory notes executed by him to the committee and recovered judgment thereon, and from said judgment and a denial of his motion for a new trial said Ruddock appeals.

It appears that a large number of persons whose property and personal interests in and about the city of Covina would be benefited and advanced by the construction of an electric road which would connect the city of Los Angeles with the city of Covina appointed a committee whose duty it should be to obtain the construction of such a line, and to that end secure the necessary funds and procure a right of way over which the said electric road to Covina should be constructed. The defendant Ruddock, along with many others, executed notes to the treasurer of the committee to defray the expense of such right of way; the main inducement for their execution being the benefits which would accrue to their lands by reason of the construction and operation of an electric road between the two cities. Ruddock, in aid of such purpose, executed the two notes sued on, one of which is as follows: "Covina, Cal., March 25th, 1903. For value received I promise to pay upon demand to F. M. Douglass of the Citizens' Right of Way Committee, the sum of $3,097.75 to defray the cost of securing the right of way for the Covina extension of the Pacific Electric Railway. Ruddock Company, By C. H. Ruddock." The other note was similar in tenor to the first, but for the sum of $2,377.50, and dated April 28, 1903. The proceeds of all the notes secured by the committee were to constitute a fund to procure a right of way which, when procured, was to be given free to the railroad company constructing said railroad as soon as an electric railway should be constructed and put into operation between said cities of Los Angeles and Covina.

Within the time agreed on for the construction of the said road, the committee procured that portion of the right of way necessary to be procured by them, which was between Vineland and Covina, and through their efforts a corporation known as the Los Angeles Interurban Railway Company constructed an electric road of modern design and with modern appliances and equipment and operated by electricity, which, since its construction, has been continuously operated by the Pacific Electric Railway Company, over the right of way procured by the said committee, and from said city of Los Angeles through Vineland to the city of Covina. The notes executed by Ruddock were assigned to plaintiff, and, the former having failed to make payment on demand, this action was brought to recover on them.

While the notes are signed by the Ruddock Company by C. H. Ruddock, they were so signed because at the time of the signing a corporation to be composed of the members of the Ruddock family owning lands in the vicinity of the contemplated extension of the electric road was under contemplation. The formation of this corporation was abandoned, and it is conceded by the defendant appellant that, if any liability on the notes exists, he is personally liable thereon. Several defenses were interposed by the defendant, all of which were held untenable by the trial court, and in this it is insisted that the court erred.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The first defense interposed by him was that, by the terms of his subscription notes, his payments were to be in aid of the extension of an electric road to Covina to be constructed by the Pacific Electric Railway, which meant the Pacific Electric Railway Company, which was then an organized corporation engaged in the construction of an extended system of railways radiating from the city of Los Angeles, and which, when the note was signed, had an electric line operating from Los Angeles to San Gabriel, from which point appellant claims "the Covina extension" was to be made. It is insisted, first, that his subscription being made in relation to an extension by a specified railroad—the Pacific Electric Railway Company—without any provision for its successors or assigns—the acceptance of the subscription and the performance of the conditions by the company which constructed the road, namely the Los Angeles Interurban Company, does not bind the defendant as subscriber unless he consented to them which he did not; and, second, that the extension was not built from San Gabriel to Covina as agreed.

As far as the point is made that a particular extension of the route from San Gabriel to Covina was stipulated for, it is apparent that the subscription notes had no reference to any route at all. It is undoubtedly true that when the subject of connecting the city of Covina with Los Angeles, a distance of 19 miles, was first agitated, the residents of Covina and vicinity had in contemplation an extension of the electric road then operated by the Pacific Electric Railway Company as far as San Gabriel, and contemplated an extension from the latter place through Covina and beyond, including possibly Pomona and Riverside. But in the subscription notes there is nothing specifically requiring that any particular extension route shall be taken. As far as the right of way committee and the residents in the vicinity of Covina, in whose behalf and their own the committee was acting, no definite action was taken at all as far as selecting a route is concerned until after these subscription notes were secured. It is quite apparent from the evidence in the case that what the Covina people wanted was an electric road which would put them in communication with the city of Los Angeles, and at the time the notes were secured by the committee, of which the defendant was a member, no route had been fixed upon or any arrangement made with any company relative to any definite route. In fact, until the route was finally selected upon which the electric road was built, several routes were under contemplation. It was realized that the selection of a route, if an electric company could be prevailed on to build at all, would be a matter to be taken up with the constructing company, and the route to be selected would be left largely, if not entirely, to that company. So these matters were left entirely to the right of way committee. When the committee consulted with Mr. H. E. Huntington, president of the Pacific Electric Railway Company, he assured them that he would build an electric road to Covina if he was given a free right of way. No assurances were made by him as to what route would be followed. The matter was for arrangement between the committee and Mr. Huntington. The latter did not make the offer as representing the Pacific Electric Railway Company of which he was president or the Los Angeles Railway Company of which he was also president. It did not purport to be the offer of any company, but of Mr. Huntington personally. All that the residents of Covina were solicitous about—referring now more particularly to those who signed subscription notes—was that there should be constructed a direct electric line between Los Angeles and Covina. This is all they were interested in and this is what they secured. There being nothing in the expression "Covina Extension of the Pacific Electric Railway" definitely fixing a route by which such extension should be made, the question of what was the meaning of these terms in the subscription notes was a question of fact to be determined from all the circumstances surrounding their execution. First Nat'l Bank v. Bowers, 141 Cal. 253, 74 Pac. 856. Evidence was addressed to the proposition, and the trial court found that this phrase "Covina Extension of the Pacific Electric Railway" was used in the subscription notes as a mere matter of convenience to indicate an extension of an electric railway from the city of Los Angeles to the city of Covina over a right of way to be subsequently procured by the company between those points, and upon which an electric road would be constructed, and this finding is sustained by the evidence.

As to the proposition that by the terms of the subscription notes the road was to be built by the Pacific Railway Company. The notes themselves contain no such provision. No company is named, and there is no agreement that the extension would be built by any company at all. It is true that, when the proposition was first considered by the residents and the right of way committee, it was contemplated that the road would be extended, as we have said, from San Gabriel, to which point the Pacific Electric Railway Company had built its road, on to the city of Covina, and that it would probably be built by the Pacific Electric Railway Company. The committee assumed that, if an extension was built, the extension would probably be made from San Gabriel as it would be more economical to build from that place to Covina than to build an independent line from Los Angeles to Covina. But as it is conceded that, when the notes were executed, no arrangement or agreement with any railroad company to build the extension had been made, this probably affords the reason why no constructing company was mentioned in the notes. In fact, it is obvious from the terms of the subscription notes and the entire circumstances surrounding their execution that it was really a matter of no moment who should build the road or over what route it should be constructed. The main object to be attained was to connect the city of Covina with the city of Los Angeles by a direct route, and, as long as this end was accomplished, it was immaterial who actually constructed the road. The desired end would be attained as well by having it built by one company as by another. The main and controlling purpose being to have the road built probably accounts for the absence of any specified route or the mention of any constructing company. The success of the project and the method of its accomplishment was to be left to the judgment of the right of way committee, and the form of the subscription notes was drafted so as to interfere the least with their judgment and without any limitations attending the payment of the subscriptions, save that they should be applied to obtaining the right of way and having an electric railroad constructed thereover between the city of Los Angeles and the city of Covina. But if it can be said that the subscription notes of the defendant provided in effect, though they did not in terms, that the railroad was to be constructed by the Pacific Electric Railway Company, it is apparent from the findings, which are supported by the evidence, that the road was in reality built by that electric company.

After the committee secured subscription notes sufficient in its judgment to furnish a fund to purchase a right of way for the contemplated road, it entered into negotiations with H. E. Huntington, president of the Pacific Electric Railway Company, to have an electric road constructed. The matter was taken up personally with him, and, as we have said, there was not until then any arrangement between the committee and any railroad company or individual for the construction of the road. The arrangement was with Huntington and simply amounted to an agreement that, if the committee obtained a free right of way, he would have the road built. They secured the right of way, and he caused the railroad to be constructed and equipped by the Los Angeles Interurban Company. When the road was built by this company, the right of way was conveyed to it. At the time the Los Angeles Interurban Company constructed it, the Pacific Electric Railway Company was the owner of all the capital stock of the Los Angeles Interurban company, and had guaranteed a payment of its bond issue amounting to $10,000,000. Under these circumstances, as the Pacific Electric Railway Company was the sole owner of all the stock of the Los Angeles Interurban Company, the road necessarily was built at the expense of the former company. After its completion it was actually operated, and upon the trial of this action was being operated, from Los Angeles to Covina by the Pacific Electric Railway Company. While it is true that these respective corporations are distinct and separate entities, as a matter of fact, they constitute but one company, the Pacific Electric Railway Company, which actually built, or caused to be built, "the Covina Extension," and is operating it as an integral part of its entire system of electric railways. This being true, it appears to us that, if it should be assumed that the Pacific Electric Railway Company was by the terms of the subscription notes to build the road, this condition has been actually met. This disposes of the main defense interposed by defendant against his liability upon the notes.

As a further defense, it is claimed by defendant that the notes were also given in consideration of the railroad being built beyond Covina, to a tract of land owned by defendant to the east thereof, which was not done. The court found that there was no merit in this claim, as there was no agreement to that effect. This finding is supported by the terms of the subscription note itself. There is nothing in it calling for an extension beyond Covina. The phrase "Covina Extension of the Pacific Electric Railway" quite naturally implies simply an extension to the city of Covina. It could not reasonably be construed as an extension beyond it. It is apparent too from the evidence in the case, as far as it was addressed to ascertaining the meaning of the terms used in the subscription note that when the project of obtaining an extension to Covina was first contemplated, the matter of having the road run through Covina to Riverside was under consideration. It appears, however, that no immediate assistance could be obtained along the route beyond Covina to Riverside so that project was early abandoned and long before the notes were given, and the efforts of the residents of Covina and of the committee were thereafter concentrated solely towards securing an extension to Covina alone.

Defendant further claimed that a deduction to the extent of $3,369 for land taken as part of the right of way through his land should have been allowed him as an offset against the claim on his notes. The right of way committee in determining the amount which should be allowed the persons through whose land the right of way for the railroad should be acquired fixed amounts to be allowed as compensation to defendant and others for rights of way through their lands. The evidence discloses that, about the time Ruddock and the other subscribers to the fund to procure a right of way executed their notes, it was agreed that the entire amount of the subscription should be placed in a fund to defray the expense of securing a right of way between Vineland and Covina, including the Ruddock portion of the right of way. Ruddock was an active and energetic member of the right of way committee and a strong advocate of the contemplated extension of the electric road to Covina, as he and his family owned some 700 acres of land in its vicinity which would be prospectively enhanced in value by the construction of the road. Subsequent to the fixing by the committee of the amount of compensation to be paid to the defendant, and about the time of the execution of his notes, he declared to the committee with which he was in conference that he wanted no compensation for the Ruddock right of way, but would waive his right to any compensation therefor and grant the right of way free in addition to giving the amounts represented by his notes. Thereafter the Ruddock family with the defendant conveyed their lands in the vicinity of Covina through which the right of way was to run to the United Investment Company, the majority of the capital stock of which they held, and which company, in accordance with the promise made by said Ruddock and by his authority and at the request of the committee, conveyed the right of way for said electric road to the Los Angeles Interurban Company which constructed it. Conceding that the oral agreement of Ruddock to waive his compensation for damages for the right of way was not binding upon him and he might have repudiated it, still, having carried out his prior promise to relinquish any claim therefor by actually conveying the right of way, this constituted a confirmation of his original waiver to compensation and precluded him from asserting any claim for it.

It is strenuously insisted by his counsel that no such promise was made by Ruddock, and that the conveyance executed to the Los Angeles Interurban Company was obtained by fraud practiced on the officers of the United Investment Company making the conveyance. The evidence is quite full and clear as to the promise to waive compensation for the right of way and to donate such right, together with the sums represented by the notes, and there was sufficient, though it may be conceded not as clear, evidence that the conveyance was made by the company with his sanction and in conformity to his promise.

While we have disposed of this appeal on the merits, we have not overlooked various points made by appellant for a reversal consisting of alleged error in overruling the demurrer of appellant to the complaint, in denying his motion for a nonsuit, and in certain rulings on evidence.

We have fully considered these matters, but perceive no error in any rulings of the court respecting them.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

The objection that the proposed statement of plaintiff and amendments thereto by defendant on motion for new trial were not presented to the court within the time prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 659, is not available after settlement of the statement by the allowance of the amendments proposed on the hearing of the motion for new trial, and the court may not deny a new trial on the ground that plaintiff did not comply with section 659, though it acted originally under section 473, authorizing the court to enlarge the time to plead.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; B. F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by William A. Grubb against Lucius K. Chase, administrator of Charles D. Foster, deceased. From an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Palmer, L. D. Bechtel, and Palmer & Mahan, for appellant. Lafayette Gill and Louis W. Myers, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Appeal from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The action which was brought against an administrator was upon a common count for money alleged to be due as the purchase price of certain goods, wares, merchandise, stocks, securities, and choses in action sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant's decedent. The questions of fact involved were determined by a jury. Judgment was for defendant, and plaintiff gave notice of motion for new trial. The proposed statement of plaintiff on motion for new trial was not filed within the time prescribed by statute, but it is here contended by plaintiff that relief was granted under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The motion for new trial was heard, and subsequently the court denied it, one of the reasons for said denial being that the moving party had not complied with the terms of section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The learned judge of the superior court, however, filed an opinion in which he gave as an additional reason for his ruling, and one that would have been sufficient without the other, that the proof adduced at the trial utterly failed to sustain the allegations of the complaint. In this behalf he wrote as follows: "The case to be made in suing an administrator is limited absolutely, under the decisions in this state, to the cause of action set forth in the claim filed against the estate. The claim filed against the estate in these cases was for money owing, as upon an express promise to pay, under an executed contract of sale. The case as made by the plaintiffs was one for damages in tort, as for false representations. The two are essentially dissimilar. For that reason, then, conceding that the court might have committed some errors in the giving of instructions, or the admission of evidence, still under no circumstances, under the pleadings as at present, could plaintiff recover. Such being the case, any error committed was purely of an abstract nature, and not prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiffs. Hamlin v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 782, 89 Pac. 1109; Green v. Ophir, C. S. & G. M. Co., 45 Cal. 527."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Appellant does not deny that the proposed statement for use on the motion for new trial was not filed nor presented to the court within the time prescribed by section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but contends that having presented an affidavit showing dependence upon verbal stipulations of defendant's attorneys as an excuse for his delay, and the court thereafter having settled the statement by allowing all of defendant's proposed amendments, therefore relief was granted under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Defendant objected to any settlement of the statement on the ground "that said proposed statement and amendments had not been presented to the court, or delivered to the clerk for the judge within the time allowed by law, in this: that defendant's proposed amendments to said proposed statement were not, nor was a copy thereof, presented to the court or delivered to the clerk for the judge within 10 days after said proposed amendments were served upon said plaintiff." This objection was available after settlement of the statement, when the motion for new trial came on for hearing, and it seems to have been sufficient for the court at that time. Therefore, it makes no difference whether the court acted originally under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure or not. We think the ruling finally made was justified under the authority of Henry v. Merguire, 106 Cal. 146, 39 Pac. 599, cited by the court at the time the motion for new trial was denied.

We are also in accord with the lower court upon the second ground for denying the motion. At the trial plaintiff's theory was that defendant's decedent, Foster, had promised to purchase sundry notes and certain stock in the Massachusetts Real Estate Company at a stipulated price equal to the face value of the notes, plus certain interest thereon, and the agreed value of $35 per share of the stock. This, plaintiff contends, was to be paid for in stock of the Mercantile Realty Company, worth par. The stock of the latter company was delivered, but it was not worth par. This, according to plaintiff, was not an executed contract, but defendant's decedent acknowledged in his lifetime that he was bound to give plaintiff the par value of the Mercantile Realty Company's stock by paying interest on the par value of said stock every six months as long as he lived, meanwhile fraudulently concealing the worthless nature of the stock which he had delivered. The mere statement of this proposition demonstrates the correctness of the trial court's determination. The very gist of plaintiff's action was the alleged fraud perpetrated upon him by Foster. Such fraud must be alleged and proved, and, in order that an action may be maintained against the administrator of an estate, a claim of this kind must be fully presented according to law. McGrath v. Carroll, 110 Cal. 79, 42 Pac. 466.

It follows that the order from which the appeal was taken should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. In so far as the department opinion implies that the objection that the proposed amendments to plaintiff's statement on motion for a new trial were not presented by plaintiff to the court within the time prescribed by section 659, Code of Civil Procedure, was available to defendant after settlement of the statement upon the hearing of the motion for new trial in the superior court, notwithstanding that the court before settling the statement had relieved plaintiff from the effect of his default under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, and notwithstanding that all such proposed amendments were allowed, we are satisfied that it is incorrect. The motion for a new trial was, however, properly denied for the other reason discussed in the opinion.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

Civ. Code, § 347, and Code Civ. Proc. § 341, limiting the time to sue to recover corporate stock sold for delinquent assessment on the ground of irregularity of the assessment, apply only where there has been some irregularity in the assessment or irregularity or defect in the notice of sale or the sale itself, and do not apply to void assessments.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Action by B. P. Cheney against C. A. Canfield and another. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order refusing a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Fleming, for appellant. J. S. Chapman, Ward Chapman, and O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to have a sale by the defendant corporation of 41,666 shares of defendant's corporate stock of which he claimed to be the owner declared void. The sale was made for a delinquent assessment, and defendant Canfield is the purchaser and holder of the stock. The defendants had judgment, and plaintiff appeals therefrom and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

One of the main points presented for consideration here is the validity of the assessment upon which the sale of the stock was based. All the proceedings eventuating in the sale of the stock in question are based upon an assessment levied by defendant's board of directors on September 6, 1904.

It is insisted by appellant that the levy of this assessment was void for several reasons, but principally on the ground that the board of directors, he asserts, had no authority to levy it because the meeting at which they did so was neither a regular meeting of the board or a special meeting regularly called. It is the settled law that an assessment can be legally levied upon the capital stock of a corporation by the board of directors only at a regular meeting of the board or at a special meeting thereof regularly called. Harding v. Vandewater, 40 Cal. 78; Thompson v. Williams, 76 Cal. 155, 18 Pac. 153, 9 Am. St. Rep. 187. As all proceedings whereby an assessment is levied upon the stock of a corporation, and under which a forfeiture of the stock of the stockholders may be had are in invitum, it is elementary law that they must be strictly followed. The levy of such an assessment can only be accomplished legally by a strict compliance with the statutory provisions relative thereto, or with the provisions of the charter of the corporation upon the subject. Herbert Kraft Co. Bank v. Orland, 133 Cal. 64, 65 Pac. 143; Ruck v. Caledonia Silver Mining Co., 6 Cal. App. 356, 92 Pac. 194.

The by-laws of the defendant corporation provide that regular meetings of its board of directors shall be held on the first Monday of each month, and special meetings may be called at any time, notice thereof to be given the directors personally or by mail. It was averred in the complaint that the meeting of the board of directors of September 6, 1904, at which the assessment was levied, was held at a time and on a day other than the time provided by the by-laws of the corporation and without previous or any notice to the members of the board; in effect, that the meeting at which the levy was made was neither a regular meeting of the board nor a special meeting regularly convened. This was denied in the answer, and the court found, that the board of directors of the corporation consisted of nine members, and that "the meeting of the board of directors on September 6, 1904, was held without any specific notice to the other two members of the said board, there being at said meeting but seven present, but it is provided by the by-laws of the Mexican Petroleum Company that regular monthly meetings of the said directors * * * shall be held on the first Monday of each month, and that no notice of said meeting is required, and the first Monday of September of the year 1904 was the 5th day of September, and was under the laws of the state of California a legal holiday. And when the board met on the said first Monday of September, 1904, no business was transacted because of its being a holiday, and the board met on the following day, and said assessment was levied and other business transacted. Prior to the said 6th day of September, 1904, said board of directors at a meeting adjourned from the regular monthly meeting in August met and there being no quorum present, adjourned said meeting to the 6th day of September, 1904." On this finding the trial court based its conclusion that the meeting of the board of directors on September 6, 1904, was a valid one and the assessment legally levied, being of the opinion, first, that although the by-laws of the corporation provided for a regular meeting of the board on September 5, 1904, which was the first Monday of the month, yet, as that date fell on a legal holiday, the board might meet on the following day with equal regularity and legal effect under section 11 of the Civil Code; secondly, that, whether it could or not, still the meeting on September 6, 1904, was a regular and valid meeting of the board because it was then held on the date to which the regular monthly meeting of the board in the August previous had been adjourned.

We do not think either of these conclusions correct. The fact that the first Monday of the month, fixed by the by-laws for the regular monthly meeting of the board of directors, fell on a holiday, did not warrant the board in meeting on the following Tuesday on the theory that under the section of the Code it could then hold the regular monthly meeting. The by-laws did not so provide, and section 11 of the Civil Code, which is invoked to uphold the validity of the meeting on that day, has no application. That section provides that, "whenever an act of a secular nature * * * is appointed by law or contract to be performed on a particular day which falls upon a holiday, it may be performed upon the next business day with the same effect as if it had been performed upon the day appointed." It will be observed that there is nothing mandatory about the provision. Even as applied to an act appointed by "law or contract" to be performed upon a given day, it is merely permissive. It may or may not be done on the appointed day, as the party to perform it chooses or an opportunity presents. The section, however, even in its permissibility only applies to an act appointed by "law or contract" to be performed. While the by-laws of the corporation under discussion fix the first Monday of each month for holding the regular meetings of the board of directors, still a by-law is not a "law or contract" within the meaning of the Code section.

In speaking of an act provided by "law or contract" to be performed, the section, in as far as it refers to "law" means such an act as is required to be performed within a given time by authority of some statutory provision or rule of law. A provision similar to the one in the Civil Code is found in both the Code of Civil Procedure (section 13) and the Political Code (section 13). When the section of the Code relied on speaks of an act to be performed by "contract," it means contracts such as are defined by sections 1549 and 1550 of the Civil Code itself—actual contracts entered into between all the parties; contracts which are definitely such and by the terms of which conditions or provisions are to be complied with by the parties within a specified time with a possible forfeiture of rights thereunder for noncompliance. The term "by-law" has a well-known but limited and peculiar meaning. It is used to designate those regulations which as one of its legal incidents a corporation is empowered to make affecting the management of its business, the control of its officers and agents, and the rights and duties of the members of the corporation between themselves and between the corporation. To pass and make effective such by-laws the consent of all parties, as in actual and ordinary contracts, is not necessary, as a bare majority of the stockholders of the corporation may do so. Civ. Code, § 301. While in a general sense the by-laws with the articles of incorporation constitute a contract under which the reciprocal rights and duties of the corporation and its stockholders are measured, the by-laws of themselves do not constitute such a contract so as to make the provision with reference to directors' meetings an act to be performed under a contract within the contemplation of the Code section.

The duty of the board of directors to hold its regular meetings at stated times did not spring from any contract between them and the corporation, but arose from a provision of the by-laws passed for the purpose of properly conducting the business of the corporation. To whatever extent the by-laws may for certain purposes be considered as part of a contract between the corporation and its stockholders defining their respective duties, and rights as far as a provision therein declares when and how directors' meetings shall be held, it is simply what it purports to be—a by-law; a regulation pertaining to the administration of the business of the corporation and in no sense a contract. The extent and purpose of the Code provision is quite apparent. It is to extend the time for the performance of some act which is expressly enjoined by law to be performed by a given time which would fall upon a holiday; or to protect, relieve, or save one contracting party from a forfeiture or deprivation of a right by the other contracting party on account of noncompliance with the terms of a contract when noncompliance might be impracticable or impossible by reason of the required date of performance falling on a holiday. The purpose of the section was in aid of the preservation of rights, either under a law or contract, which might by the intervention of a holiday be imperiled, and was not intended and cannot be construed to mean, as is claimed in the present instance, to apply to the time for holding meetings of the board of directors so as to authorize stated meetings to be held at a date other than fixed in the by-laws simply because that date falls on a holiday.

It was entirely permissible for the board of directors to meet on the date fixed for its regular meeting and the by-laws required it to do so. There was nothing in the general law or in the by-laws prohibiting such meeting because the date fixed fell on a holiday. It was a matter of their own volition whether the members of the board should meet or not on the date stated, although their duty was to do so. The regular meeting of the board was not an act required to be performed by contract, and the board had no authority to meet at any other time than that fixed by the by-laws unless upon notice to all the directors, and, as the meeting here in question was not held on the date fixed and was subsequently held without notice to two of the directors such meeting was not legally held, the board so assembled was without authority to act at all, and the assessment here in question levied at that meeting was void unless the meeting can be held valid on other grounds. It will be observed that the court in addition to the finding we have just discussed found also that "when the board met on the said first Monday of September, 1904, no business was transacted because of its being a holiday, and the board met on the following day and said assessment was levied and other business transacted." As to this finding, there is no evidence that the board or any members of it met on the first Monday of September. In fact, in a note made in the minutes of the board by the secretary of the corporation, it is evident that they did not meet at all. This is immaterial, however, as it is not pretended that if they did hold a meeting on that day they adjourned it over until the next day—September 6th—when the assessment was levied. If they met on the first Monday as there was no adjournment over, the meeting on the next day without notice to all the directors was invalid.

Now as to the position that the meeting of September 6th can be sustained as an adjourned meeting of an adjourned meeting of the regular monthly meeting of the August previous. It might be an interesting question whether even a quorum of a board can make successive adjournments of a previous regular meeting, so that the last adjournment would be to a date beyond that fixed for the next regular meeting of the board by the by-laws, as appears to have been attempted here, but by less than a quorum of the board. Discussion of that proposition, however, is unnecessary because at the meeting in August when it is claimed that an adjournment was made until September 6th there was no quorum of the board present. The by-laws of the corporation provided that a quorum should consist of five members, while in fact there were but two members of the board present when the adjournment was attempted to be made, and they alone assumed to order it. There can be no question but that less than a quorum of a board of directors have no authority to adjourn a meeting to any date whatever. It was so held in Raisch v. M., K. & T. Oil Co., 7 Cal. App. 667, 95 Pac. 662, by our District Court of Appeal. The question there, as here, involved the validity of an assessment upon corporate stock. In the case referred to, the board levied it on a day to which less than a quorum thereof had at a previous meeting adjourned such meeting. It was held by the District Court of Appeal that less than a quorum of the board could not effect a valid adjournment. The court, after discussing the reasons why such power may not rest with less than a quorum, says: "The Code provides that the corporate powers, business, and property of all corporations must be exercised, conducted, and controlled by a board of directors, that a majority of the directors is a sufficient number to form a board for the transaction of business, and that every decision of a majority of the directors forming such board, made when duly assembled, is valid as a corporate act. Civ. Code, § 308. It is provided that: 'Unless a quorum is present and acting, no business performed or act done is valid as against the corporation.' Civ. Code, § 305. The adjournment was an act done, and hence, under the express provisions of the Code, it was not a valid act. It is significant in this connection that there is no provision of the Code to which our attention has been called authorizing a meeting of the directors of a corporation to be adjourned by a minority. * * * Counsel have been unable to cite us to any authority, either in this state or elsewhere, directly in point. We have examined the cases cited, but find nothing to aid us in the solution of the question involved here. We therefore conclude there was no power in the minority of the board of directors to adjourn the time of holding the regular meeting, and that the assessment was levied without authority, and is therefore void."

We think there can be no question but that the rule as announced by the District Court of Appeal is the correct one and in harmony with it the attempt of less than a quorum of the board of directors of the defendant corporation to adjourn the August meeting over to September 6th was ineffectual for any purpose, and the meeting on this latter date was invalid. The court found that the plaintiff was guilty of laches in bringing his action, and also that his right of action was barred by section 347 of the Civil Code and section 341 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Both these Code sections referred to make the same provision, namely, that "no action must be sustained to recover stock sold for delinquent assessment upon the ground of irregularity of the assessment, * * *" unless the tender of the amount for which the stock was sold at said time, and unless such action is commenced within six months after the sale of the stock. The sale of the stock in question here was made December 20, 1904. This action was commenced January 4, 1906. The sections referred to only apply where there has been some irregularity in the assessment or irregularity or defect in the notice of sale or the sale itself. The assessment in question here, as we have seen, was not merely an irregular assessment. It was absolutely void. Herbert Kraft Co. Bank v. Orland, 133 Cal. 64, 66, 65 Pac. 143. Hence these sections have no application. There is nothing in the evidence upon which the finding of laches can be sustained.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

VALENTI et al. v. SIERRA RY. CO.

(Sac. 1,676.)

1. DEATH (§ 71*)—EXPECTANCY OF BENEFICIARIES.

That one of the children of deceased had become of age before the trial of the action for her death, brought under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, by her husband and children jointly as her heirs, did not affect the admissibility of tables of life expectancy as far as fixing the probable duration of his life for the purpose of determining the damages sustained by him through his mother's death; the statute not limiting the right of recovery to minor children, and his right to recover for any pecuniary loss sustained by him by reason of her death not being limited to the term of his minority, but he being entitled to recover for the loss of any pecuniary benefit which he would with reasonable certainty have received from her after his arrival at majority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 90; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 280*)—DUTY TO PASSENGERS—DEGREE OF CARE—INSTRUCTIONS.

The instruction that a railroad company engaged as a common carrier in transporting passengers for reward is bound to use the utmost care and diligence for their safety is not incorrect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1085–1092, 1098–1106, 1109, 1117; Dec. Dig. § 280.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

While the abstract rule, as given in an instruction, that a railroad company engaged as a common carrier in transporting passengers is bound to use the utmost care and diligence for their safety, may be subject to the qualification that this degree of care and diligence is such only as can reasonably be exercised consistent with the character and mode of conveyance adopted and the practical operation of the road and transaction of the business of the carrier, the carrier can complain of its not being given only where there is evidence in the case to which it can be addressed, which is not the case where it is not questioned but that the collision of trains resulting in injury to a passenger was due to the negligence of the carrier, for which no excuse existed.

4. CARRIERS (§ 321*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER—NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—"BRAKES."

Though the evidence in an action for injury to a passenger from the slipping of a work train against a passenger train was that the work train was equipped with a Westinghouse brake and machinery, as well as with a steam brake, the instruction as to defendant being negligent if the train could not be held on the track by its "brakes" is not open to the criticism that with "brakes" should be included "braking appliances and machinery"; the term "brakes," as ordinarily understood, including all the mechanism employed to control the motion of the train, and the jury undoubtedly having so understood it.

5. Trial (§ 295*) — Instructions — Matters Left to Jury—Construction as a Whole.

The jury having already been fully instructed as to the degree of care required by law of defendant, and instructions being required to be considered as a whole, the degree of care required by law cannot be considered to have been left to the jury by the bracketed part of the instruction: "If, after considering the whole evidence in the case, [you should find that defendant had made such a showing as to the exercise of care required of it by law] as to leave the evidence on the issue of negligence in such condition that you cannot conclude that the evidence of negligence has been satisfactorily shown, it has met the requirements of law, and your verdict should be for defendant."

6. Death (§ 104*)—Damages—Instructions.

The instructions in an action for death by the husband and children of deceased that, in determining the damages sustained by the husband, the jury could consider the pecuniary loss, if any, sustained by him in being deprived of the services, society, and comfort of his wife, and, in determining the pecuniary loss sustained by the children, they could consider the value of the mother's services to the children, her care and labor bestowed on them, her ability to care for, train, and assist them, and her efforts for their welfare, limit the recovery to pecuniary loss, and correctly state the law.

7. Appeal and Error (§ 1004*) — Verdict — Damages.

A verdict in an action for death by the husband and children of deceased can be disturbed only when the recovery in view of the evidence is so excessive as to be apparently either the result of passion or prejudice of the jury.

8. Death (§ 99*)—Amount of Damages—Evidence.

Evidence in an action for death by the husband and four minor children of deceased, one a young girl, held to authorize a verdict of $14,000.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Frank Valenti and others against the Sierra Railway Company of California. From an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 151 Cal. 534, 91 Pac. 481.

S. D. Woods and F. W. Street, for appellant. Nicol & Orr and F. P. Otis, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought to recover damages from the defendant for the death of the wife of plaintiff Frank Valenti, and mother of the other plaintiffs (minors at the time of her death), alleged to have been occasioned through the negligence of the defendant in the operation of one of its trains. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiffs for $14,000, upon which judgment was entered. Defendant moved for a new trial, and from the order denying it this appeal is taken.

No claim is made that the verdict is not justified by the evidence except to the extent that it is insisted that it is excessive; hence but a brief statement of the facts need be made. Marie Valenti, plaintiffs' intestate, on June 25, 1904, was a passenger on the regular daily passenger train of the defendant running from Oakdale, in Stanislaus county, to Angels Camp, in Calaveras county, and was killed as a result of a collision between a work train of defendant and the passenger train upon which she was riding. This work train consisted of an engine, oil car, and several flat cars, and had run into a siding to let the passenger train go by, and, immediately after it had passed, the engineer of the work train proceeded to back it out again upon the main track. At this point on the road the grade was very heavy, and in backing out the engineer was unable to control the train on account of defective brake equipment, and it rapidly descended the heavy grade, colliding with the rear end of the passenger train in which Mrs. Valenti was riding, and causing her death. It was the claim of appellant on the trial that one of the causes of the collision was the presence of oil on the rails—drippings from the oil tank in the work train—which rendered the rails so slippery that the work train could not be held thereon by its brakes. The jury, however, in answer to particular questions of fact, found that the collision was not occasioned by the presence of oil on the tracks, but that the work train and engine were not properly equipped with brakes to hold the train upon the track. So much for the statement of facts.

A reversal is sought on account of alleged errors committed by the court in rulings upon the admission of evidence, instructions to the jury, and on the ground that the verdict is excessive. This case was here before on appeal after verdict and judgment for plaintiffs (Valente v. Sierra Railway Co., 151 Cal. 534, 91 Pac. 481), and, while many alleged errors were discussed, a reversal was ordered for error in giving a particular instruction relative to the burden of proof.

Several questions which were then presented for consideration and decided adversely to appellant are again urged under the claim either that the suggestions of the court on the former appeal had not been complied with on the second trial, or that there are now presented additional points not then presented challenging their accuracy. In our opinion, however, the second trial seems to have been had with due regard to all matters discussed on the former appeal.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

In respect to the claim that there was error in rulings on evidence, but two points are made. As to one the ruling is so clearly correct that the matter need not be mentioned. As to the other, that the court improperly admitted in evidence Farr's Table of Life Expectancy to show the probable duration of the lives of the deceased and of the beneficiaries, we expressly held on the former appeal that this evidence was admissible, with the suggestion that the jury should be instructed, however, in connection therewith that in no event could damages be awarded a beneficiary beyond the probable duration of the life of the deceased. The trial court seems to have carried out the suggestion by appropriate instruction so that appellant's contention is without merit.

The particular claim of appellant that such tables were inadmissible as far as fixing the probable duration of Harry Valenti's life—one of the children plaintiffs—is without merit. Harry Valenti, when his mother was killed, was a minor, but had attained his majority when the present trial was being had. This fact did not, as counsel for appellant seem to assume, affect the admissibility of the tables for the purpose of determining the question of damages which may have been sustained by him through the death of his mother. This action was brought under section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure by all the plaintiffs jointly—the husband and children—as heirs of the deceased, and the right of the son Harry Valenti as an heir to recover damages for any pecuniary loss he might have sustained by reason of the death of his mother did not apply only as to the term of his minority. The statute does not limit the right of recovery to minor children. The children as heirs of decedent were entitled to recover for the loss of any benefit or pecuniary value (as explained by the court in its charge to the jury) which they would with reasonable certainty have received from the mother after their arrival at majority, as well as during minority (Redfield v. Oakland C. S. Co., 110 Cal. 277, 42 Pac. 822, 1063), measured by what would have been the probable duration of the life of the mother.

Complaint is made by appellant of an instruction to the jury that "a railroad company engaged as a common carrier in transporting passengers for reward is bound to use the utmost care and diligence for their safety." This instruction differing somewhat in phraseology was before this court on the former appeal. While we held that it was perhaps too broad as stating an abstract proposition of law, we did not hold that it was in any manner an incorrect one. It is not. Boyce v. California Stage Co., 25 Cal. 469; Boone v. Oakland T. Co., 139 Cal. 494, 73 Pac. 243; Kline v. Santa Barbara R. Co., 150 Cal. 741, 90 Pac. 125.

But it is said that as an abstract proposition of law given in this case it was misleading; that from it the jury were warranted in concluding that a common carrier of passengers was an insurer of the safety of passengers, which is not the law; that as an abstract proposition it is subject to the qualification (which it is insisted should have been stated to the jury) that this degree of care and diligence which is to be exercised so as to avoid danger to passengers is such only as can reasonably be exercised consistent with the character and mode of conveyance adopted and the practical operation of the road and transaction of the business of the carrier. Conceding that the abstract rule as given by the court is subject to the qualification suggested, as it no doubt is, still appellant could only complain that it was not given if there was evidence in the case to which it could be addressed. As already stated, no question is made on this appeal but that the collision was due to the negligence and carelessness of the defendant for which no excuse existed, and hence there was nothing to which the qualification of the rule could apply, even if it had been given.

It is further insisted that in one of its instructions the court ignored a material part of the evidence in the case. In the instruction complained of the court told the jury that, "if they believed that the work or gravel train could not be held thereon (defendant's tracks) by its brakes and also found," etc., the defendant was guilty of negligence. The evidence showed that the train was equipped with a Westinghouse brake and machinery. It also had a steam brake. Counsel's criticism of this instruction is that the court should have included with "brakes" also "braking appliances and machinery." This criticism is overrefined. The term "brakes" included all the mechanism which was used to retard or stop the motion of the train. The term "brakes," as ordinarily understood, comprehensively includes all the mechanism employed for the purpose of controlling the motion of the train and the jury undoubtedly so understood it.

The court instructed the jury "if, after considering the whole evidence in the case, you should find that the defendant had made such a showing as to the exercise of care required of it by law, as to leave the evidence upon the issue of negligence in such condition that you cannot conclude that the evidence of negligence has been satisfactorily shown, it has met the requirements of the law, and your verdict should be for the defendant." This instruction was a modification of one requested by the defendant and refused. The modification consisted of the italicized portion. Appellant insists that by the italicized portion the court left it for the jury to determine what degree of care was required by law; a duty belonging exclusively to the court. The instruction without the modification correctly states the law (Valente v. Sierra R. R. Co., 151 Cal. 539, 91 Pac. 481), and we do not perceive any just criticism as to the modification. Instructions must be taken and considered as a whole. Anderson v. Seropian, 147 Cal. 201, 81 Pac. 521. When the charge to the jury in this case is so considered, it is apparent that the court left nothing to be determined by them as to the degree of care required by the law. It had fully instructed them on this point, and, when it further instructed the jury as to what it should do if it found "the defendant has made such a showing as to the exercise of the care required of it by law," it referred to the rules of law previously given which defined such care, and the jury could not otherwise have understood it.

The court on the matter of damages instructed the jury that in determining the damages sustained by the husband they had a right to take into consideration the pecuniary loss, if any, sustained by him in being deprived of the services, society, and comfort of his wife, and in determining the pecuniary loss sustained by the children they had a right to consider the value of the mother's services to her children, her care and labor bestowed upon them, her ability to care for, train, and assist them, and her efforts for their welfare. There was nothing misleading, ambiguous, or indefinite in these instructions. There was nothing that would warrant the jury in believing, as suggested by counsel for appellant, that they could assess damages for anything else than for pecuniary loss or that they could consider any other elements in determining it than such as the court mentioned. The matters which the jury were told could be taken into consideration—services, society, care, comfort, etc., of the deceased as a wife and mother—they were instructed could only be taken into consideration for the purpose of determining the pecuniary loss sustained by the plaintiffs through her death. The instruction had relation to pecuniary loss only, and, as given, correctly stated the law in estimating damages therefor. Redfield v. Oakland C. S. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 285, 42 Pac. 822, 1063; Keast v. Santa Ysabel G. M. Co., 136 Cal. 260, 68 Pac. 771; Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., 147 Cal. 624, 82 Pac. 306, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 307.

It is claimed that the verdict for $14,000 was excessive. A verdict in this character of cases can only be disturbed where the amount awarded, in view of the evidence, is so excessive as to be apparently either the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. It is not seriously claimed that the jury were under any such influences. Here the husband and four minor children—one a girl of tender years—suffered the loss of a devoted wife and mother through the negligence and carelessness of the defendant, and the verdict represents the loss which the jury determined they jointly sustained. The evidence shows that the deceased was a good and dutiful wife and mother, devoted to her husband and children, giving constant personal care and attention to their comfort and happiness, and devoting herself to the moral and educational training of her children, with the prospect of many years of life before her to be given to her home and family. In this case, as in cases of this character, the damages sustained are largely of a prospective nature. On proof of the family life at the time of the death of the wife and mother—her devotion to her husband and children evidenced by the constant discharge of her wifely and motherly duties—the jury were to determine the loss sustained by the husband and children in being deprived, through the negligence of defendant, of the continued benefit and advantage of her society, comfort, and care. Manifestly there can be no fixed standard by which that loss can be determined. Necessarily the law had committed its ascertainment to the discretion and sound judgment of the jury, and it cannot be said that for the loss of a devoted wife and mother and deprivation by the husband and minor children of the advantages and benefits which, from the evidence in this case, the jury were warranted in finding she would continue to bestow on them had she lived, that the verdict rendered by the jury is at all excessive.

These are all the points made which merit any consideration.

No error having been committed by the trial court in its rulings on the admission of evidence or in its instructions, and the point that the verdict is excessive being untenable, the order denying the motion of defendant for a new trial, which is all that is appealed from, is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. B. Nutter, Judge.

See, also, 145 Cal. 62, 78 Pac. 343.

Wm. Craig (J. F. Ramage, of counsel), for appellants. S. M. Spurrier and Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought to quiet the title of plaintiffs to the N. E. ¼ of section 27, township 2 S., range 5 E., Mt. Diablo Base and meridian, situated in San Joaquin county. Judgment went for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal therefrom, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The plaintiffs deraign title to two-thirds of the land in controversy as heirs at law of one Joseph McKinney, deceased, and as to the other third by virtue of a deed from one Dudley Sebree, the only other heir at law.

Some of the conceded facts in the case are that Joseph McKinney died in San Joaquin county in April, 1893, the owner of land in that and other counties, in the state, of the then aggregate value of $40,000. He left a will whereby he devised to one Olive A. Jennings the land here in controversy, together with a large amount of other real property, and made her his residuary legatee. This will was duly admitted to probate. The plaintiffs and Sebree were half-brothers of McKinney, residing in Kentucky at the time of the latter's death, and had not seen or heard from him for upwards of 30 years. They did not know of the death of McKinney, or that he had left any estate, until they were informed thereof by one J. H. Kyle, an attorney of Missouri, who visited them and imparted the information, and with whom they then entered into a contract employing him to represent their interests in the estate of McKinney, agreeing to pay him a contingent fee, based upon the amount of property recovered for them, of not less than $20,000. They also gave said Kyle a power of attorney which (omitting immaterial parts) declared that: "We do by these presents make, constitute, and appoint J. H. Kyle our true and lawful attorney for us and in our name, place, and stead, to sell, convey, make, execute, acknowledge, and deliver a good and sufficient warranty deed in our name or behalf, or any other such deed or conveyance as in his judgment he may deem fit or proper for such price or prices, and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem best, to any and all interest that we may have as half-brothers and heirs at law of Joseph McKinney, deceased, of and to the following described land, subject to our approval, to wit: [Here follows a particular description of lands and a comprehensive clause applying to all lands and personal property of the estate.] Giving him full power and authority (to appear in all courts and institute any character of suit with reference to the legality of any writing purporting to be the act of McKinney, deceased), to submit any matter in dispute respecting the premises to arbitration, and otherwise and generally to say, do, transact, determine, accomplish and finish all matters and things whatsoever concerning the complete recovery or alienation of any interest we may have legally or equitably in said premises or any other land, as aforesaid. Giving and granting unto our said attorney full power and authority (etc.), hereby ratifying and confirming all that our said attorney may or shall lawfully do or cause to be done by virtue hereof."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Having secured his contract of employment and the above power of attorney, Kyle came to California, and, after attempting ineffectually to make a compromise or settlement in behalf of plaintiffs and Sebree as heirs at law of McKinney with the beneficiaries under his will, employed counsel and in the name of plaintiffs and Sebree commenced in August, 1893, a contest of the will of McKinney, which subsequently, in May, 1894, resulted in a judgment revoking and annulling the probate of McKinney's will. Olive A. Jennings, the principal beneficiary under the will and the one most actively engaged in the attempt to sustain it, in due time appealed to the Supreme Court from said judgment. She also moved for a new trial, had her bill of exceptions settled, allowed and filed, and from an order denying her motion also took an appeal to this court.

In addition to the above, the court found that, prior to the time of filing such contest, Dudley Sebree, one of the heirs at law, came to San Joaquin county, and at all times thereafter during the pendency of said contest remained there; that subsequent to the taking of the appeal by Olive A. Jennings, and during the pendency thereof in the Supreme Court, the attorneys representing plaintiffs and said Dudley Sebree were of the opinion that the judgment revoking and annulling the probate of the will appealed from would probably be reversed by the Supreme Court, and that it would be to the best interests of plaintiffs and Sebree to compromise and settle said contest, and so advised Sebree and plaintiffs; that, with this opinion in view, they made overtures to said Olive A. Jennings and the other parties interested in the will as beneficiaries, and such negotiations were had between December, 1895, and June, 1896, that it was ultimately agreed that in consideration of the conveyance by plaintiffs and Dudley Sebree to said Olive A. Jennings of 560 acres of land belonging to Joseph McKinney in his lifetime, including the tract involved in this controversy, and the payment by her of the sum of $500, said Olive A. Jennings would cause her appeals to be dismissed; that the probate of said will should stand revoked, and that a decree of the court declaring McKinney to have died intestate, and said plaintiffs and Dudley Sebree to be his sole heirs at law, should be made final; that prior to the effecting of such compromise the plaintiffs and Sebree were advised and informed of its terms and consented and agreed thereto; that thereafter, in pursuance of such settlement and adjustment, said Olive A. Jennings dismissed her appeals and a decree of the court declaring that McKinney died intestate and plaintiffs and said Sebree to be his sole heirs became final; that, in pursuance of such settlement, the plaintiffs and Sebree through said J. H. Kyle as their attorney in fact made on June 26, 1896, a deed of conveyance to said Olive A. Jennings of said 560 acres of land, which was duly recorded; that said 560 acres of land conveyed to Olive A. Jennings were at the time of the conveyance thereof of the value of about $7,000, and such conveyance was the only consideration for the dismissal of her appeals and the extinguishment of any claim she had as residuary legatee to the property of McKinney; that said settlement and adjustment of the contest were in all respects fair; that plaintiffs were informed of such settlement and adjustment and of said conveyance by Kyle to said Jennings of said 560 acres of land, and they, together with Dudley Sebree, consented to and approved such conveyance, and at all times thereafter and until the month of July, 1900, plaintiffs and Dudley Sebree continued to recognize, approve, and acquiesce in said conveyance of said land to said Olive A. Jennings, and at all times since June. 1906, have recognized and consented to said stipulation whereby the said contest was settled by the dismissal of said appeal of the said Olive A. Jennings.

It was further found by the court that by the terms of the compromise and settlement with Olive A. Jennings, of which plaintiffs and Sebree were informed and advised and to which they agreed and consented, a decree of distribution to Olive A. Jennings of said 560 acres of land was to be obtained in the estate of McKinney by the attorneys for plaintiffs and Sebree, the latter to petition for letters of administration of the estate; that Sebree was appointed and qualified as administrator, and on August 7, 1897, filed, as administrator of the estate of McKinney, a petition for partial distribution of the lands of the estate (there still remaining considerable personal property); that the petition set forth the terms of the compromise with Olive A. Jennings, and asked that there be distributed to her the 560 acres deeded to her under the compromise and other lands to the heirs; and that said petition subsequently coming on for hearing a decree of partial distribution as to all the lands of the estate was made, including a distribution to Olive A. Jennings of the said 560 acres. The defendant, by mesne conveyance, subsequently acquired the land involved in this action, being a part of the 560 acres conveyed to Olive A. Jennings under the compromise agreement and distributed to her under the decree of partial distribution in the McKinney estate.

On the merits of the appeal it is insisted by appellants, first, that no title or interest belonging to them in the estate of McKinney could be conveyed by their agent Kyle except for a pecuniary consideration, and an approval thereof by an instrument in writing executed by them and their coheir Sebree, hence the deed from Kyle to Jennings of the land involved, being the result of a compromise of litigation and not a sale, was void; second, that the decree of partial distribution under which the property was distributed to Jennings was void; third, that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the finding of the court as to the approval of, consent to, and ratification by plaintiffs and Sebree of the conveyance by Kyle to Jennings; and, fourth, that, even if these findings in this respect are sustained by the evidence, they did not amount to an approval, authorization, or ratification of the deed within the law.

It may be conceded without discussion that, looking exclusively to the provisions of the power of attorney, Kyle could not make a conveyance of any of the lands affected thereby except for a pecuniary consideration approved by plaintiffs and Sebree. The word "sale" usually imports a money consideration, and this was the effect of the holding of this court on an appeal in an action involving a consideration of this same power of attorney. Alcorn v. Buschke et al., 133 Cal. 655, 66 Pac. 15. It may equally be conceded that the decree of partial distribution was void because the court had no jurisdiction to entertain it on the petition of the administrator, the statute only authorizing it on the petition of an heir, devisee, or legatee. It was so decided as to this very proceeding on partial distribution. Alcorn v. Buschke, supra; Alcorn v. Brandeman, Howard, and Gieseke, 145 Cal. 62, 78 Pac. 343. See, also, In re Letellier, 74 Cal. 311, 15 Pac. 847.

These points being eliminated, we approach the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings as to an approval, consent, and ratification by plaintiffs and Sebree of the conveyance from Kyle to Jennings and a consideration of the legal effect of such findings, if they are to stand.

In determining the sufficiency of the evidence, it is necessary to consider the objections urged to the deposition of the witness Kyle, who acted as agent under the power of attorney in disposing of the land to Jennings. The findings under consideration are based mainly on the testimony of this witness taken by deposition, and to the admission of which deposition appellants objected. The deposition was taken in the state of Missouri on behalf of defendant upon a commission issued by the trial court after proper notice to the plaintiffs. No commissioner being agreed upon by the parties, the court appointed L. W. Good of Clinton, Mo., as commissioner to examine said witness on oral interrogatories. The deposition was taken before the commissioner appointed; the examination being taken down by a shorthand reporter appointed by the commissioner for that purpose. The commissioner certified to the taking of the deposition both as notary public and commissioner, and duly returned it to the county clerk of San Joaquin county. The order of court appointing L. W. Good commissioner did not appoint him as a notary public to take the deposition, but appointed him individually as commissioner to do so.

The objections urged by the appellants against the admission of the deposition in evidence were, first, that the commission could not be issued to L. W. Good simply as an individual commissioner; second, that the commissioner had no authority to appoint a stenographer to take the testimony of the witness; third, that L. W. Good as notary public could not administer the oath to the witness Kyle or certify to the deposition as such notary. These objections were overruled by the court and the deposition admitted in evidence. As to the first objection, it was claimed thereunder that by section 2024, Code Civ. Proc., the court could only issue a commission to take the testimony of a witness outside the state to a notary public, judge, or justice of the peace or commissioner of deeds in a sister state appointed as such by the Governor of the state, under section 811 of the Political Code. There is no merit in this claim. Section 2024 provides that the commission may be issued to "a person agreed on by the parties, or, if there is no agreement, it may be issued by the court or judge to any notary public, judge or justice of the peace or commissioner selected by the court or judge * * * issuing it." There is nothing in the section requiring it to be issued to a commissioner of deeds. It may be issued to any person whom the court deems a competent and proper person to act. Counsel for appellants doubtless make the claim that, when the section refers to a commissioner, it must mean a commissioner of deeds from the fact that under the practice act (St. 1851, c. 5) § 433, before the amendment thereto by the Code of Civil Procedure in 1872, it was expressly provided that the commission, if not directed to a judge or justice of the peace, must run to a commissioner appointed by the Governor of the state to take affidavits and depositions in other states. In 1872, however, when section 2024 of the Code was enacted, that provision of the practice act was amended, and ever since has stood, in the particular under discussion, as it stands now, and was obviously amended so as to allow the selection of any individual commissioner whom the court might deem capable and competent to act. There is nothing in the other objections. Section 2006, Code Civ. Proc., expressly sanctions the taking of depositions in shorthand. The certificate of L. W. Good showed affirmatively that he administered the oath to the witness Kyle as commissioner, and, as far as his certificate to the deposition is signed by him as notary public and also as commissioner, his signature as notary public is immaterial—his signature as commissioner being alone legally sufficient.

Now as to the finding of approval and consent of plaintiffs and Sebree to the compromise and settlement of the litigation in the estate of McKinney and to the conveyance of the land in controversy to Jennings by their agent Kyle in conformity to such compromise. There can be no question but that, although the attorneys for plaintiffs and Sebree had obtained a decree annulling the will of McKinney, they were extremely doubtful of having it sustained on appeal, and that the overtures for a compromise with Olive Jennings came from the attorneys for plaintiffs after a conference with Kyle and Sebree, who were here in California. Neither Olive Jennings nor her attorneys had sought a compromise. They had rejected the efforts to do so before the action to set aside the will was brought, and from the decree doing so had perfected and were prosecuting her appeals when a compromise was suggested. As to that compromise and the relation of plaintiffs and Sebree to it, it is true that the finding is supported in the main by the testimony of Kyle. This, however, does not of itself detract from its force or sufficiency. No question is made of the credibility of Kyle as a witness. He was the representative of the plaintiffs and Sebree, engaged and acting for them to secure the estate, and it is only natural that the facts relative to the matter should come from him and from the plaintiffs and Sebree. They were matters of such a character as to be peculiarly within the knowledge of these parties.

The evidence shows that Sebree was in San Joaquin county when the negotiations for a compromise with Jennings were had, was fully informed of the negotiations therefor, and actively participated in the consummation of the compromise to the extent even of furnishing three hundred dollars to bring it about. He was present at the execution of the deed by Kyle to Jennings, and in his verified petition for partial distribution of the land set forth the terms of the compromise with her, and asked distribution to her of the 560 acres in controversy. These facts are confirmed, not only by the testimony of Kyle, but by the testimony of other witnesses. From Kyle's testimony it appears that when the first overtures for a compromise were made by himself and the attorneys of record, with the consent and approval and active co-operation of Sebree, he wrote to the plaintiffs in Kentucky of the fear of the attorneys representing them as to the result of the appeals by Jennings, and the efforts which he and the attorneys and Sebree were then making to effect a compromise with Jennings and the terms offered, which involved a conveyance to her of part of the property of the estate, in consideration of the dismissal of her appeals. This initial effort at a compromise was without result. About a year subsequent the effort was again renewed on behalf of plaintiffs and Sebree by Kyle and the attorneys and Kyle informed plaintiffs of the renewed effort. In reply to these letters, the plaintiffs wrote Kyle that they were satisfied and approved of the action he was taking to effect the compromise. When the compromise was actually effected upon the terms offered to Jennings, and of which Kyle had written the plaintiffs, and of which they approved, the latter again wrote them to that effect—that he had consummated the compromise by conveying to Jennings 560 acres of land in consideration of her dismissing her appeal, which she had done. In response to this letter of advice on the subject, plaintiffs wrote him that they were satisfied with his action, and were grateful to him for his services in the matter. This evidence fully sustains the findings made by the court that the conveyance to Jennings was with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the plaintiffs. It is true that Kyle could produce no letters received from the plaintiffs on the subject, but this was explained by him to be impossible on account of their destruction in the burning of his residence in Missouri. It is also true that the plaintiffs denied the reception of any letters from Kyle on the subject, or their writing any approval or consent to the conveyance or authorizing the compromise, and denied any knowledge of the conveyance to Jennings until after it was made.

While counsel for appellants devote much time to a discussion of the evidence as addressed to this finding, particular consideration of it would not be at all profitable aside from the general way in which we have referred to it. Aside from this immediate transaction, there is no question but that Kyle acted fairly towards the plaintiffs and Sebree, and fairly expended his efforts in an endeavor to secure for them the estate of their deceased half-brother. It is in evidence that he did write to them on matters of the estate, and that Sebree, who was on the ground, was in constant communication with his brothers, between whom the most intimate relations existed. There was no reason why either Kyle or Sebree should withhold information as to a proposed settlement at the time it was being negotiated, or of its terms that it had been effected, as they were all acting in what they deemed was the best interests of the plaintiffs and Sebree. There is no reason why the trial court should assume that the testimony of Kyle was untrue, that he had surreptitiously made a compromise and conveyed the property of plaintiffs and Sebree to effect it. There was no occasion for clandestine action on his part. Sebree was on the ground, and, as one of the heirs and principals in the power of attorney to Kyle, was participating in the efforts to compromise with Jennings on the basis of a conveyance to her, and there was no reason why Kyle, under these circumstances, should withhold information from or neglect to inform the other heirs of his efforts with a view of obtaining their consent and approval with Sebree's to a conveyance for that purpose. On the contrary, it was only natural he should do so, particularly as his power of attorney did not in terms authorize him to convey the land for purposes of a compromise, or to make any conveyance at all except with the approval of the plaintiffs and Sebree. As far as the testimony of plaintiffs is concerned, it appears that they learned of some compromise having been made right after it was actually effected in June, 1896. Who informed them of it does not appear, although the only persons communicating with them were Kyle and Sebree. After acquiring information of it, it appears that they made no protest or objection, either to Kyle or any one concerned or interested in the compromise, or took any action with reference to it, until this suit to quiet title to the property conveyed under the compromise was instituted in 1900. The court had a right to conclude that this long acquiescence by plaintiffs in the compromise after knowledge of it proceeded from the fact testified to by Kyle that preliminary to the conveyance by him to Olive Jennings he had advised plaintiffs of the negotiations for a compromise of the litigation on the basis of such conveyance to her, and that the plaintiffs had consented and approved of it, and that the conveyance was made for that purpose and with their consent and approval. But, as we say, there can be no good reason for discussing the evidence in detail, or indulging in deductions therefrom as to the finding of consent and approval by plaintiffs of the conveyance to Jennings by Kyle in consummation of the compromise, because it can only result in accentuating the fact that there was a radical conflict in it as to the essential facts necessary to support the finding in that respect, and, under such circumstances, it is a familiar rule of law that this court cannot disturb a finding when based upon conflicting evidence.

As it appears that the finding is supported by the evidence, there can be no doubt about the law applicable to the facts as found. As far as the plaintiffs are concerned, considering their claim (aside from the interest derived under the conveyance from Sebree), it is disposed of by the fact that they expressly and in writing consented to and approved of the conveyance of this land to Jennings by Kyle as their agent for the purpose of effecting a compromise of the litigation in the McKinney estate. While respondents, in addition to the claim of express consent and approval of the conveyance to Jennings, invoke also the doctrine of equitable estoppel, we perceive no reason for devoting any time to it. If the conveyance had been made by Kyle of his own volition, and without any authority from or approval by the plaintiffs, a different question might arise and a consideration of the doctrine of equitable estoppel become pertinent. The validity of the conveyance can be fully sustained, however, under the finding that it was made by the express consent and approval of the plaintiffs. Counsel for appellants have not suggested any reason why this is not true. In fact, no valid reason can be given. The power of attorney was for the benefit of plaintiffs and Sebree, and, while it empowered Kyle to convey the lands of the McKinney estate, any such conveyance was in terms subject to their approval. We are not here dealing with a contract between the plaintiffs and Sebree and Kyle, but with an instrument conferring a power of sale upon the latter, to be exercised for the benefit of the former, and the exercise of which, by the terms of the instrument, was within their control. While the instrument authorized Kyle to sell and convey any of the property in which they were interested for such prices and upon such terms and conditions as he might deem best, such sales or conveyances were to be subject to their approval. Under these circumstances, they could authorize a conveyance on any terms or for any purpose they might elect, and for any consideration they deemed satisfactory to themselves. However much Kyle might be constrained by its terms as to any conveyance he might make in the exercise of his powers, undoubtedly the plaintiffs could consent or authorize a conveyance under it by him for any purpose or consideration satisfactory to them. They authorized him to convey the land to Jennings in consideration of the abandonment of her appeals and consequent acquisition of the estate of McKinney by them free from any claim on her part. There is no question but what Jennings parted with substantial rights, and that a valuable consideration passed from her to the plaintiffs for the conveyance to her of this land. Plaintiffs had the power and authority to direct their agent Kyle to make the conveyance for the purpose of effecting a compromise, and we can perceive no reason why any question can be made about the legal sufficiency of their act as sustaining the validity of the conveyance as directed by them. The only question in the case is whether they had originally consented to and approved of a conveyance to be made by their agent Kyle and actually made by him with such consent and approval, and, the court having found that they did, this would seem to leave no further room for dispute.

As far as the claim of plaintiffs to one-third of the property in question is based on the conveyance from Sebree to them, but little need be said. There cannot be the slightest question but that Sebree knew all about the negotiations which resulted in the compromise and conveyance. He actively participated in bringing the compromise about, contributed from his own funds to a settlement with other claimants in order to effect it, and was present when the affair was concluded and the dismissal of the appeal obtained from Jennings and the deed to her made by Kyle. The evidence may not show that Sebree expressly consented to or authorized a conveyance, but the circumstances detailed warranted the court in finding that the deed was made with his consent and approval. Aside from this, it further appears that in pursuance of one of the terms of the compromise agreement Sebree, as administrator of the estate, filed a petition for partial distribution in which he asked distribution to Jennings of the property embraced in the deed. The petition set forth, among other things, that Sebree and plaintiffs were the sole heirs of McKinney, and the fact that a compromise of the litigation over the estate between them and Jennings had been effected under an agreement whereby there was to be distributed to the latter of the property of the estate of McKinney to which they would otherwise be entitled those lands set forth in the petition, and that she was entitled to this distribution, agreeable to their compromise, as the consideration for having dismissed her appeal from the judgment revoking the will of McKinney. After notice and a hearing a distribution to Jennings was made as prayed for. Conceding that said decree was void, at least as to the plaintiffs, as was held in Alcorn v. Buschke and Alcorn v. Brandeman, supra, still, as to Sebree, who signed and verified it and who intended it to be effective, it was a clear recognition and approval of the compromise agreement and the conveyance to Jennings made under it, and operated as a ratification of the act of his agent Kyle in making the deed, if there could be any reasonable ground for doubt as to the full consent of Sebree to its execution by Kyle at the time it was made.

The findings of the court that the proposed compromise and settlement between plaintiffs, Sebree and Jennings, of the litigation between them, which included the execution of the conveyance in question by their agent, Kyle, was had with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the plaintiffs and Sebree, previously had and given, and was actually consummated with such knowledge, consent, and approval. Being sustained by the evidence, the court was clearly right in holding that the deed to Jennings made in pursuance thereof was unimpeachable, and, as to her successor, the respondent here, was equally good and valid.

In concluding this matter, it may be said that as far as the claim of appellants is that the decisions in Alcorn v. Buschke, supra, and Alcorn v. Brandeman, Howard and Gieseke, supra, are the law of the case on this appeal, they are clearly in error. In the cases relied on, the appeals were from judgments entered after demurrers to the complaint were sustained. The only questions passed on were as to the authority given Kyle under the power of attorney, because it was alleged that the deed to Jennings was made without consideration and without the knowledge or consent of plaintiffs or Sebree, and without the approval of either of them; also the validity of the decree of partial distribution. The doctrine of "the law of the case" only applies where the matters presented upon the second appeal are the same as were presented and disposed of on the first appeal. The answer of the defendant to the complaint after reversal of the judgment in Alcorn v. Brandeman, Howard, and Gieseke denied that the deed to Jennings was without the knowledge or consent of plaintiffs or Sebree or without consideration, affirmatively alleged both consent and approval of plaintiffs and Sebree to the conveyance, and that it was supported by a valuable consideration. Under these circumstances, it is clear that the rule of "the law of the case" has no application.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ALCORN et al. v. BRANDEMAN. (Sac. 1,678.)

Action by James Ben Alcorn and others against Henry Brandeman. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order refusing a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 145 Cal. 62, 78 Pac. 343.

Wm. Craig (J. F. Ramage, of counsel), for appellants. Thos. S. Louttit, Clark & Louttit, and W. W. Middlecoff, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment in favor of the defendant, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. This action was brought to quiet title to a tract of land in San Joaquin county, and involves the validity of a conveyance made by one Kyle as attorney in fact for plaintiffs and one Sebree to Olive A. Jennings, under whom defendant claims.

This appeal presents practically the same questions as are involved in the case of James Ben Alcorn et al. v. E. Gieseke (Sac. ALCORN et al. v. HOWARD et al. (Sac. 1,694.)

Action by James Ben Alcorn and others against C. A. Howard and Amy P. Howard, administratrix, substituted defendant. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order refusing a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 145 Cal. 62, 78 Pac. 343.

Wm. Craig (J. F. Ramage, of counsel), for appellants. S. M. Spurrier and Nicol & Orr, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment in favor of the defendant and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. This action was brought to quiet title to a tract of land in San Joaquin county, and involves the validity of a conveyance made by one Kyle as attorney in fact for plaintiffs and one Sebree to Olive A. Jennings, under whom defendant claims.

This appeal presents practically the same questions as are involved in the case of James Ben Alcorn et al. v. E. Gieseke (Sac. No. 1,693, this day decided) 111 Pac. 98, affirming the judgment and order of the trial court. The defendants in both cases claim under Jennings to two separate portions of a larger tract conveyed to her by the deed whose validity is involved; and, on the authority of Alcorn v. Gieseke, the judgment and order in the present appeal are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PIA. (Cr. 254.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 19, 1910. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 13, 1910.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 412*)—Evidence—Declarations—Admissibility.

Where, on a trial for rape, the evidence showed that at and for some time prior to the commission of the offense two women, one of whom was prosecutrix, were employed in an office, evidence of a declaration by accused made about a month before the attack that he intended to have intercourse with the woman who worked in the office, by force, if necessary, was admissible to corroborate the proof that he raped prosecutrix who came within accused's description; and the fact that the declaration was made so long before the offense went only to the probative force of the testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 894; Dec. Dig. § 412.*]

2. Indictment and Information (§ 125*) — Duplicity—Rape.

An information charging that accused assaulted prosecutrix with intent to have sexual intercourse with her, and that by force and violence and against her will he feloniously accomplished that act, charges only the crime rape.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 334–400; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Thos. J. Lennon, Judge.

Guiseppi Carlo Pia was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

James C. Sims, Leonard Stone, and E. B. Martinelli, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for life. His motion in arrest of judgment was also denied, and this appeal is from the orders denying his said motions and from the judgment.

The first point urged in support of the appeal is the admission of certain testimony given by the witness Basilio Calzascia claimed to have been erroneously admitted. Prior to the calling of this witness, the evidence introduced showed that at the time of the commission of the offense charged and for some time previously two young women were employed in the office of the "Marin Journal" at San Rafael, one of whom was the prosecutrix Mary Elizabeth Grapes. In this state of the evidence the witness Calzascia testified, over the objection and exception of defendant, that about a month before the date of the attack charged he overheard two conversations, one between the defendant and Luigi Gamba, and the other between the defendant and a man named Milano; that in the first of these conversations the defendant spoke of the "girl who works for the Marin Journal," and in the second he said in effect that he intended to have sexual intercourse with her, if not with her consent then by force. Defendant now contends that, as the conversations testified to do not clearly show that the prosecutrix was the girl referred to, they had nothing to do with the case and were therefore inadmissible. This position is untenable. The testimony showed that the defendant intended under certain circumstances to commit the crime of rape on one of two certain women, and it tended to corroborate other evidence in the case to the effect that he committed an offense of this character against the person of the prosecuting witness, who was one of the two persons coming within the description employed by the defendant to designate the object of his contemplated attack. In the case of People v. Harlan, 133 Cal. 16, 65 Pac. 9, the defendant had declared that he was procuring a conveyance to go to a place named for the purpose of having sexual intercourse with a "little girl," without stating who the girl was. The Supreme Court, in sustaining the ruling of the trial court admitting this declaration, said: "This declaration illustrated the intention and purpose of the defendant, and its relation to the case is apparent when we consider that the other evidence in the case tends to show that in the afternoon of the same day of the declaration the defendant with false promises enticed the prosecutrix into a conveyance, * * * and drove her to the place where the crime was committed. The fact that the defendant procured the horse and buggy for the purpose of enabling him to have sexual connection with a 'little girl' would in some measure corroborate other evidence tending to show that he subsequently accomplished that purpose."

In Massey v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 371, 20

S. W. 758, speaking on a like subject, the court said: "The intended victim need not be named if the subsequent facts show with reasonable probability to whom he (defendant) referred, or the threat was such as to evidence a determination to rape some person—not a particular one—that night." In Barnes v. State, 88 Ala. 204, 7 South. 38, 16 Am. Rep. 48, the syllabus (which correctly states the point decided) is as follows: "In a prosecution for rape, declarations made by the accused three months before the commission of the crime, tending to show his desire to have carnal knowledge of the prosecutrix, as well as his belief that she would not yield to his wishes, are relevant, as affording to the jury a basis for inferring that he had gratified his passion in the manner charged in the indictment." See, also, Ricks v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 229, 87 S. W. 345; 4 Elliott on Evidence, § 3103; People v. Hayes, 9 Cal. App. 301, 99 Pac. 389; State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 36 Am. St. Rep. 89; Kerr on Homicide, 462.

The fact that the declarations were made by the defendant a month before the commission of the offense was a matter which went to the probative force of the testimony, but not to its admissibility.

Defendant claims that the information in this case states two separate public offenses in the same count, to wit, an assault with intent to commit rape and the crime of rape. The information charges that the defendant assaulted the prosecutrix with the intent to accomplish an act of sexual intercourse with her, and by force and violence and against her will he did feloniously accomplish that act. It is plain that this information charges but one offense, namely, that of rape, and that the court committed no error in denying the motion in arrest of judgment.

The evidence supports the verdict.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

I concur: HALL, J.

COOPER, P. J. I concur in the judgment. Under our system, questions of fact are solely for the determination of the jury, and this court is not at liberty to set aside the verdict of a jury where there is sufficient evidence in law to support it. I have no hesitation, however, in saying that after carefully reading the testimony, I have grave doubts as to whether or not the defendant was the party who committed the atrocious crime. The evidence as to his identity is not at all satisfactory, but it satisfied the jury and the trial judge who presided while the witnesses were testifying; and, if the defendant is the party, the verdict is correct.

It too often happens that in cases of this kind, where public clamor is great, that the jury are influenced by such public clamor and excitement to give a verdict that they would not give under ordinary circumstances. If anything should hereafter transpire by which the defendant's innocence can be established, the remedy is with the executive.

WATSON v. DINGLEY. (Civ. 768.)

Appeal and Error (§ 396*)—Notice.

It was not necessary that appellant serve notice of an appeal taken under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, but it was necessary that, within 10 days after notice of entry of the judgment, he give notice as required by that section, requesting that a transcript of the testimony, etc., be made up, and for failure to give such notice the appeal will be dismissed, under District Court of Appeal Rule 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by W. M. Watson, administrator, against A. S. Dingley. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Will A. Dower, for appellant. Maddux & Maddux, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Motion to dismiss defendant's appeal on the ground that appellant has failed to file a transcript of the record on appeal within the time prescribed by law and the rules of this court.

It appears from the certificate of the clerk that on December 15, 1909, judgment was duly made and entered in favor of plaintiff and against defendant for the sum of $671.75 and $24.60 costs and on that day notice of said decision was duly served and filed. On January 5, 1910, defendant served and filed notice of intention to move for a new trial, and on February 14, 1910, served and filed notice of appeal from the judgment in said action and an undertaking on appeal. It further appears that the proof of service of notice of appeal has been filed. No bill of exceptions or statement on motion for new trial has been left with the clerk to be delivered to the judge who tried the case, and no bill of exceptions or statement has been settled or filed, and the clerk has never been requested by the defendant to certify to a transcript of the record. The notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was filed July 1, 1910, of which due service was made.

It was not necessary for defendant to serve his notice of appeal, which was apparently taken under section 953a, Code Civ. Proc., but it was necessary that he give notice, as required by that section, requesting "that a transcript of the testimony offered or taken * * * and all matters to which the same relate, be made up and prepared. Said notice must be filed within 10 days after notice of entry of the judgment, order or decree." Defendant makes no appearance here, and it appears without conflict that he failed to give the notice required by said section. Under rule 2, it becomes our duty to grant the motion. GRIFFITH v. LOS ANGELES PAC. CO.

(Civ. 815.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Aug. 19, 1910. Rehearing Denied Sept. 17, 1910; Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 13, 1910.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 558*) — EXAMINATION — EXPERTS.

A cross-examination of a medical expert which permits a showing of the contents of standard medical books is permissible only to show what the authors thereof have declared on the subject, when the expert has based his opinion wholly or in part on his reading of medical books, and then only when the statements in such books are not in harmony with his testimony.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1048*)—HARMLESS ERROR — ERRONEOUS EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where a physician testifying that he found an anesthetic area about the lower portion of the spinal column of plaintiff's body, more pronounced on the right side than on the left, expressly declared that he had neither heard nor read of a case where there was a spinal injury with resulting paralysis of one side of the body only, the sustaining of an objection to a question on cross-examination whether medical authorities did not state that paralysis of spinal origin must exist on both sides was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4145; Dec. Dig. § 1048.*]

J. W. McKinley and Gurney E. Newlin (Roy V. Reppy, of counsel), for appellant. N. R. Rutherford, Jr., and E. B. Drake, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff was a passenger on one of the cars operated by defendant when a collision occurred between the car upon which plaintiff was riding and another car running on the same track in the opposite direction, by reason of which plaintiff suffered severe physical injuries. Damages in the amount of $35,200 were claimed in this action, and by a verdict of a jury the sum of $7,500 was awarded to plaintiff. At the trial it was admitted by defendant that plaintiff was injured through its negligence; the only issue submitted to the jury being as to the extent of plaintiff's injuries and the amount that he should recover therefor. A motion for a new trial was made by defendant, and from the order denying the motion this appeal is taken. But one ruling of the trial court is presented for review.

O. M. Justice, a physician, was called as a witness on behalf of plaintiff, and testified that he found symptoms of spinal injury when he examined plaintiff, and gave it as his opinion that such an injury had been sustained, and that it was of a permanent character. As a foundation for his opinion, he testified that he had found an "anesthetic area" about the lower portion of the spinal column of plaintiff's body; that this area was more pronounced on the right than on the left side. It was defendant's contention that there was no spinal injury, and the cross-examination of the witness Justice was along a line calculated to obtain admissions from him inconsistent with the opinion which he had expressed. The witness had not referred to any medical work or works, either specifically or in a general way, up to the time the cross-examination was commenced. Upon cross-examination he testified that: "Paralysis of spinal origin as a rule exists on both sides. I cannot say that it always does, but I have never heard of a case, nor do I recall one, where paralysis of spinal origin was on one side only. Nor do I remember reading any such case." He was then asked: "Q. What books have you read on this subject?" to which he replied: "A. I think probably the one I would adhere to more strongly than any other is Dana, possibly." This question then followed: "Q. Doesn't Dana state that—and every other authority that you have ever read—that paralysis of spinal origin must exist on both sides?" An objection interposed by plaintiff's counsel to this question was sustained. The sole error assigned by defendant is on account of the ruling of the trial court in not permitting an answer to be made to the question. The rule affecting the examination of an expert medical witness, which permits a showing of the contents of the books of standard authors skilled in that particular profession, is limited. It is permissible only to show what such authors have declared upon a subject, when a witness has based his opinion wholly or in part upon his reading of books of that character. Fisher v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 89 Cal. 400, 26 Pac. 894; Lilley v. Parkinson, 91 Cal. 655, 27 Pac. 1091. And then only when statements found in such books are not in harmony with the testimony of the witness. Here the physician expressly declared that he had neither heard nor read of a case where there was spinal injury with resulting paralysis of one side of the body only. An answer in the affirmative to the question propounded by defendant's counsel would not have contradicted in any degree any testimony of the witness based upon his reading of works of medical authors, for he admitted that he had read nothing in support of his opinion as to the character and effect of the injuries caused to plaintiff's spine. The ruling of the trial judge was therefore without prejudicial error.

PEOPLE v. CURRIE. (Cr. 128.)

1. Rape (§ 40*)—Female Under the Age of Consent—Relations with Other Men—Evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 59; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

2. Witnesses (§ 330*)—Impeachment.

Where prosecutrix under the age of consent testified on her examination in chief as to her pregnancy to corroborate her testimony that accused had intercourse with her on February 24th or 25th, while her child was born October 31st following, accused to discredit her testimony could show on her cross-examination that her pregnancy might have been due to her relations with other men.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Steve Currie was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed.

L. N. Peter, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was tried upon an information for the rape of a female under the age of consent, was convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 18 years. He appeals from the judgment of conviction, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The conviction rests upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix whose narrative of the facts is by no means conclusive, but not such as to justify its entire rejection as "inherently improbable" as it is characterized by defendant. She testified that the crime was committed the 24th or 25th of February, 1908. She testified in chief that she was afterwards examined by Dr. Rutledge, and that he found her to be pregnant. She was asked on cross-examination to whom she first told of the assault and replied: "Never told any one. The doctor came and found out for himself. Q. Was that the first time Currie had ever taken any liberties with you? A. Yes sir." She testified that she gave birth to a child on October 31, 1908, at a hospital in Sacramento, and the attending physician testified to the date, and also that the child "was full nine months old," and that, had it not been nine months old, there would "have been peculiarities about the child or mother to show that it was born sooner than provided for." On cross-examination of the prosecutrix defendant endeavored to show that prior to the alleged relation with defendant she had had illicit relations with persons other than defendant, and particularly with a young man who was named, and she was also asked the direct questions: "Had you had sexual intercourse with any other person except Currie up to that time? Did you ever have any opportunity prior to the 24th or 25th day of February, 1908, to become pregnant?" Other questions were asked along this line, to all of which the objection of the district attorney was sustained. Counsel for defendant stated to the court that the purpose was to show that according to the laws of nature "it was utterly impossible that she could have had sexual intercourse on the date she gave"; also, "to show that the pregnant condition to which she referred in her direct testimony must have been due to somebody else besides this defendant." The trial court resolutely refused the testimony for these or any purposes.

It is well settled that in cases of this character, where the prosecutrix is under the age of consent, her relations with other men as tending to show want of chastity are immaterial. Here, however, the district attorney had brought out the fact in chief that she was found to be pregnant after defendant's intercourse with her as she testified; the object being to corroborate her testimony by that important fact. She had testified that defendant had never, previously to February 24th or 25th, had sexual intercourse with her. It also appeared by her own testimony that she gave birth to an eight-pound child on October 31, 1908, about eight months after the alleged assault upon her. Defendant had a clear right to discredit her testimony by showing on cross-examination whether her pregnancy was due to her relations with defendant or might not have been caused by some other person. In testifying to her pregnancy as an evidence of defendant's guilt, defendant had the right to test the truthfulness of this damaging fact by the means taken at the trial, and it was prejudicial error to deny him this right. In the recent case of People v. Davenport, 110 Pac. 318, this question was considered, and the court said: "As we have already seen, the evidence would not be admissible for the purpose of showing her unchastity at the time of the alleged offense, but, if it had a logical tendency to rebut any unfavorable inference against the defendant that might be drawn from any act testified to on the direct examination, it should have been admitted for that purpose." See, also, People v. Fong Chung, 5 Cal. App. 587, 91 Pac. 105; People v. Ah Lean, 7 Cal. App. 626, 95 Pac. 380.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Peter Palassou was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook and Wm. Tomsky, for appellant. Attorney General U. S. Webb, C. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., and James F. Brennan, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the People.

COOPER, P. J. Defendant appeals from a judgment convicting him of the crime of manslaughter and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The court correctly refused the instruction requested by defendant's counsel, by which it was sought to leave the jury to pass upon the question as to whether or not the special pleas, interposed by defendant, of a former acquittal and of once in jeopardy had been proven, and in lien thereof instructed the jury to find for the people upon both such pleas. There was no conflict in the evidence, which was to the effect that the defendant had upon the prior occasion been in jail, charged with the same offense for which he was here tried, and was upon his own motion discharged and the information dismissed because he had not been brought to trial within 60 days as required by law. This was not a bar to a future prosecution under a new information for the same offense (Pen. Code, § 1387; In re Bergerow, 136 Cal. 293, 68 Pac. 773, 56 L. R. A. 528), and the court had the right to instruct the jury to find a verdict for the people upon the pleas (People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 28, 50 Pac. 15).

It is claimed that the court erred in eliminating certain parts of defendant's requested instruction numbered 34, and in giving the instruction with the omission of the said parts. The instruction as requested and as given related to the testimony of defendant's daughter Emelie as to certain statements made by deceased, who was the mother of Emelie and the wife of defendant, the statements having been made at a time when Emelie went to her mother after hearing her mother cry from the effects of an assault defendant had just made upon her. The jury were told by the instruction as given that the statements made by the deceased in the presence and hearing of the daughter were admitted for the sole purpose of showing the conduct of the defendant at the time such statements were made. The eliminated portions of the instruction contained matter argumentative and charging as to the effect of the evidence. In the eliminated portion the court was requested to tell the jury that the statements heard by the daughter and to which she had testified could not be considered by the jury as "tending to prove their truthfulness or any other fact than the one for which they were admitted." The instruction as given plainly charged the jury that the statements could not be considered by the jury for any other purpose except for the one purpose of showing the conduct of the defendant at the time of such statements. This was certainly as favorable to defendant as he had the right to expect under the circumstances.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The court refused to give the following instruction asked by defendant: "Any evidence introduced here on this trial as to threats previously made by the defendant cannot be used or considered by the jury in determining whether a blow was inflicted by the defendant or not. Such evidence must be limited by them to the question of intent and motive"—and such refusal is now claimed as error. In our opinion—conceding there was a conflict in the evidence as to whether or not defendant gave the blow which killed the deceased, or conceding there was a conflict in the evidence as to whether death was accidentally produced or produced by a blow from defendant—the jury had the right to take into consideration the threats previously made by defendant. The jury had the right to consider any prior threats made by defendant in determining the question as to whether or not the blow given by the defendant was intentional and unlawful, or accidental. The court elsewhere instructed the jury that, if the deceased came to her death by reason of a fall with which defendant had nothing to do, he could not be convicted; that, if the deceased died as the result of a blow inflicted by defendant, he could not be convicted of murder in any degree unless the jury should find beyond all reasonable doubt that the blow was given with malice aforethought, and with the intent to kill.

It is said in the brief of appellant that the court allowed "a vast amount of evidence to be introduced as to other transactions remote and entirely disconnected from the acts with which he was charged." The only instance to which our attention is particularly called in the brief as to other remote and disconnected transactions is as to a question asked defendant's daughter Emelie while being examined in chief by the district attorney. The witness had testified as to certain conduct and acts of defendant and as to certain acts of cruelty to deceased by defendant, such as threatening to choke her upon one occasion when he caught her around the neck, throwing a plate at her, and upon one occasion taking a knife and threatening to "cut her insides out." The witness was then asked the following question: "Did you upon any other occasion during the year preceding than you have mentioned hear your father do anything, or hear your father say anything, to your mother with reference to what he was going to do to her?" The question was objected to upon the ground that it was leading, incompetent, and irrelevant, and not within the issues. The objection was overruled, and the witness answered as follows: "Yes, sir. One day my father came home from the milk wagon about 3 o'clock. He was angry over something, and he went and kicked my mother in the side, and threw her over and dragged her all around the place. Then he left her and came down into the stable about 4 o'clock. I started to do some work, and he went back home again the second time. Mamma was sitting in the chair. I watched him through the barn to see if he was going to strike her the second time, and he went up again and caught her around the neck, and he dragged her again around on the floor, and I went and told him to leave her go. He came back to the stable the second time. He went back a third time to the house and my brother and I followed him. Just as we got in the room we heard mamma scream. We went up the front way and he had her in the bed, and he was choking her. He had her on the floor." The court correctly overruled the defendant's objection to the question, and committed no error in denying a motion to strike out the answer of the witness. The evidence was not allowed for the purpose of showing a distinct and unconnected crime, but for the purpose of showing the course of conduct of the defendant towards his wife on prior occasions which ultimately culminated in her death. Such conduct and such acts leading up to and directly connected with the crime with which the defendant is charged would certainly shed light upon the questions as to the defendant's motive, and as to whether or not the death was the result of defendant's blow or of an accident. It is not a case of where the court allowed proof of a separate and distinct crime not connected with the offense for which the defendant was being tried. And the courts have uniformly held that evidence which shows a motive or throws light upon the facts and circumstances leading up to the particular crime is admissible, although the acts and conduct on prior occasions may have of themselves constituted a distinct crime.

Our attention not being called to the other alleged rulings upon the admission of evidence except by reference to folios of the transcript where it is said the erroneous rulings may be found, we do not deem it our duty to search for and discuss the other rulings which have not in any way been discussed by counsel. Particularly is this so in this case, where counsel for appellant states in his brief that the alleged erroneous rulings are all in regard to the same class of evidence as the ruling we have just discussed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

TREADWAY v. BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF VETERANS' HOME OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 710.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 11, 1910. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 10, 1910.)

1. Statutes (§ 78*)—Special Laws.

St. 1897, c. 101, as amended by St. 1905, c. 373, and by St. 1907, c. 267, creating a state home for aged and indigent soldiers and sailors, providing for the admission of such soldiers and sailors, and declaring that undisposed pension money of soldiers who die intestate while members of the home shall go to enumerated relatives, etc., though a special law for a special purpose, is not within Const. art. 4, § 25, prohibiting special legislation in enumerated cases, including statutes affecting the estates of decedents, etc., since the act does not affect the estates of deceased persons, or change the law of succession, but merely extends to soldiers and sailors the benefits of the home on specified conditions.

2. Army and Navy (§ 52*)—Soldiers' Homes—Regulations.

The Legislature may directly, by the act creating a soldiers' home, or indirectly, by delegating the power to the governing body of the home, prescribe the conditions on which the persons provided for may become members of the home.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Army and Navy, Cent. Dig. §§ 100–102; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

3. Army and Navy (§ 52*)—Soldiers' Homes—Regulations.

St. 1907, c. 267, providing that soldiers applying for admission to the soldiers' home must agree that their pension money shall be paid to the treasurer of the home to be held for their use while members, and on their death intestate while members to be paid to the home subject to the right of enumerated relatives if called for within a specified time, is a reasonable regulation and valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Army and Navy, Cent. Dig. §§ 100–102; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

4. Executors and Administrators (§ 53*)—Assets—Pension Money—Statutes.

Because of the federal statute and Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 20, exempting from execution pension money received by a pensioner of the United States, the public administrator of a deceased pensioner may not maintain an action for the possession of pension money to subject it to the payment of his fees and commissions and the fee of his attorney.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 53;* Exemptions, Cent. Dig. § 34.]

5. Executors and Administrators (§ 45*)—Assets—Pension Money—Soldiers' Homes—Regulations.

Where a soldier on admission to the soldiers' home created by St. 1897, c. 101, expressly assented to the regulations of the home, which required the payment of pension money to the treasurer of the home, to be held for the soldier's use during life, and on his death intestate to be paid to enumerated relatives, and he paid his pension money to the treasurer, his administrator could not recover the money in the hands of the treasurer, because of the trust created by the soldier's assent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; H. C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by C. C. Treadway, as administrator of William Zawadill, deceased, against the Board of Directors of the Veterans' Home of California and C. De Colmesnil, treasurer. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Frank L. Coombs, for appellants. H. L. Johnston, C. E. Trower, and L. E. Johnston, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff brings the action as administrator of the estate of William Zawadill, deceased, to recover from defendants the sum of $500, alleged to have been on deposit with the treasurer of the Veterans' Home of California to the credit of and subject to the order and disposition of said deceased at the time of his death, to wit, on the 7th day of January, 1908. The answer admitted the due appointment of plaintiff as administrator of the estate of said deceased, but denied that deceased at his death had any money in the hands of said defendant, treasurer as aforesaid, subject to the orders or disposition of the deceased, except that said defendant had in his possession and control the sum of $517.05, "which said sum consisted of a balance, at the time of the death of said William Zawadill, held by the treasurer of said home for the purposes and for the reasons hereinafter set forth." It is further averred that defendant, the Veterans' Home of California, is a state institution, created by and existing under the act of the Legislature of the state of California, approved March 11, 1897, entitled "An act to accept from the Veterans' Home Association the conveyance of, and to vest the title in the state of California, to the tract of land in Napa county known as the Veterans' Home, with the improvements and furnishings thereon, to make the same a state home for United States soldiers, sailors and marines, and to provide for the government thereof by the state." In substance it is further averred that the said Zawadill on November 29, 1903, made his application in writing to be admitted to said home, as a member thereof, subject to and in conformity with the laws of the state, relating to such matters, at that time in force, and under the by-laws, rules, and regulations of the said home, and as a condition thereof, and in consideration of the benefits to arise therefrom, he did then and there agree with the board of directors of said home and with the said home to be governed by and to abide by the laws of the state, the by-laws, rules, and regulations of said home, then existing or that might thereafter, by changes or by amendment or otherwise, be in force relating thereto; that in the month of December, 1903, the said board of directors considered said application and, finding the said applicant qualified to become a member of said home, duly and regularly admitted him to said home as a member thereof, and he then became, and ever since, to the time of his death, was such member, and "subject in all matters, and especially in the matter of the disposition of the moneys claimed by plaintiff herein, to the laws of the state of California, the by-laws, rules, and regulations of said Veterans' Home of California, at said time and subject to such new laws, by-laws, rules, and regulations in force at the time of his death." It is then averred that while such member the said Zawadill, in various amounts and at divers times, deposited with the treasurer of said home, to be kept and retained by said treasurer and disposed of in the case of the death of said Zawadill, in accordance with the laws of the state, and the by-laws and rules and regulations relating to said home, the aggregate sum of $517.05, in pension moneys, as mentioned in his said application; that he died intestate on January 7, 1908, leaving said sum in the hands of said treasurer as a balance to be held and disposed of according to the laws of the state and the by-laws and regulations of said home as they existed at the time of the death of said Zawadill, and the said treasurer now holds said money in accordance therewith and in accordance with said application of said deceased for membership, "and as a trust fund to be paid in accordance with section 10 of the said act of the Legislature of the state of California creating said Veterans' Home, as amended, which amendment was approved March 16, 1907, and in accordance with the by-laws, rules, and regulations of said home, passed, and adopted in accordance with said amendment," which said amended by-laws, rules, and regulations were adopted and in force prior to the death of said deceased. The answer makes the said application and certain of the said by-laws, rules, and regulations, part of the answer as "Exhibits A," "B," and "C."

Regulations of the home in force when deceased became a member, as shown by Exhibit A, declare that every worthy officer, soldier, sailor, or marine, who is a bona fide resident of this state and who honorably served in the army or navy of the United States during the war with Mexico, the Civil War (or any prior war), and who is in indigent circumstances, and by reason of age, infirmity, or wounds received in service is incapable of self-support, shall be entitled to admission into the home, subject to the laws of the state of California and to the regulations prescribed by the board of directors for its control and management. It is further provided that a candidate for admission must make a formal application signed by himself, and such application must be favorably acted upon by said board before he can be admitted, and the application must be accompanied by evidence satisfactory to the board of the facts stated by the applicant, to wit: As to his residence in this state, his service in the army or navy of the United States during the late Rebellion, the Mexican War, or other wars prior thereto, or the Spanish and Philippine Wars. "If a U. S. pensioner, he must file with his application his pension certificate, and a consent or agreement to transfer to the home the amounts received by him as pensioner, while a member of the home, under the following rules and regulations, now in force, or such other rules and regulations as may be established by the board of directors, to wit: Members of the home who are pensioners shall, upon receipt of pension, or by the twenty-fourth day of each pension month, pay over to the commandant, or to such officer as he may designate, all of his pension money. In case of death of a pensioner, any balance of pension money remaining in the hands of the treasurer of the home at the date of the pensioner's death shall be paid to his widow, minor children, or dependent mother or father in the order named, and, should no widow, minor child, or dependent parent be discovered within one year from the time of the death of the pensioner, said balance shall be paid to the post fund; to be used for the common benefit of the members of the home under the direction of the board of directors subject to future reclamation by the relatives hereinbefore designated, upon application filed with the board of directors within five years after the pensioner's death. Failure or refusal of any member to make payment at the time specified, and as provided, shall be considered a violation of the rules, and the commandant is hereby directed to give such offending member an honorable discharge from the home. Any member so discharged shall not be readmitted within six months from the date of his discharge." Before admission the applicant must sign the following: "I further stipulate and agree, as a condition consequent upon my admission to the said home, that I will, if a United States pensioner, or whenever I become such, on and after each recurring pension pay day, or at such times as may be fixed by the board of directors of said home, sign and execute the necessary vouchers and other papers for the collection of the pension money due me, and indorse the check issued in payment thereof; and I hereby authorize and empower the commandant of said home to transmit said check, or the proceeds thereof, to the treasurer of the home, to hold and dispose of the same as provided by its bylaws, and the rules, regulations and orders which have been or may hereafter be established by its board of directors." Exhibit B is a copy of the "Agreement with the Board of Directors of the Veterans' Home of California," entered into by said deceased, as follows: "I, William Zawadill, having made application for admission to the Veterans' Home of California, location Napa county, do hereby agree to fully comply with the by-laws of said home, if permitted to become a member thereof, and to obey and abide by all the orders, rules and regulations made by its board of directors or officers, and to promptly and cheerfully perform all the duties required of me as a member of said home. I further agree, as a condition consequent upon my admission to the said home, that I will, if a United States pensioner, or whenever I become such. [Then follows the concluding stipulation provided for by Exhibit A.] Witness my hand this 29 day of November, 1903. William Zawadill. Signed in presence of: W. F. Wallace." A communication signed by the secretary of the home and directed to the then commandant read as follows: "In consideration of the above agreement and stipulation the application of William Zawadill for admission to the Veterans' Home has been duly approved, and therefore, on presentation of this, you will admit him to membership therein."

Exhibit C sets forth certain pertinent regulations of the home, being a part of amended and revised regulations adopted in 1907 after the amendment of the act of 1897, and prior to the death of deceased, namely, Nos. 148, 149, 150, 161, and 170. Sections or paragraphs numbered 148 and 149 relate to the qualifications and condition on which the applicant may enter the home, and are substantially the same as set forth in Exhibit A. Regulation 150 relates to the residence of the applicant, his service in the army or navy, his indigent circumstances and need of aid or the benefits of the home in consequence of physical disability, name, age, etc., much the same as set forth in Exhibit A, and further: "That he has no relatives able to maintain him who are liable for his support under the laws of California." Regulation numbered 161 reads: "In case of the death of a pensioner or member of the home, any pension or other money due him and remaining in the hands of the treasurer shall be paid directly, and without probate, to his widow, minor children, or mother or father, in the order named, if demand is made within one year; otherwise the same shall escheat to the home, subject to future reclamation by the above relatives for a period of five years." The foregoing are alleged to be all the rules and regulations of the home pertinent to any issue in the case. A general demurrer to the amended answer was sustained, and plaintiff had judgment as prayed for in the complaint upon the default of defendants to make further answer.

By the act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 106) the state took over all the property of the Veterans' Home Association, a private corporation, "for the purposes of a home for aged and indigent ex-soldiers, sailors and marines of the United States army and navy." Section 1. "Said property shall continue to be used as a home for aged and indigent ex-soldiers, sailors and marines." Section 2. The act provides for a governing board of directors who "shall have power to manage said home and administer its affairs, make by-laws for the government of the board, * * * adopt rules and regulations for the government of said home, which rules and regulations shall conform, as near as possible, to the rules and regulations by which the United States Soldiers' Home and branches thereof, are governed." Section 5 provides for the organization of the board, duties of officers, etc. Other sections relate to matters of administration not here material. Section 10 requires that all money received by the directors or any officer (except such as is paid by the state for disbursement), including pension moneys belonging to the pensioners of the home, and all other trust moneys, shall be immediately paid over to the treasurer of the board, who shall forward to the state treasurer all moneys, except pension moneys and other trust funds, the canteen fund and the emergency fund.

Section 12 provides that "no person shall be admitted to reside in said home (families of officers and employés excepted) who is not an honorably discharged United States soldier, sailor or marine" requires one year's residence in the state. "The board may make such additional rules governing the admission of applicants as in its judgment may be deemed just and proper and for the best interests of the home."

Section 16 provides that the board might receive applicants from states or territories upon condition that they pay "for their maintenance and support the same rate per capita that the maintenance and support of said home shall cost the state of California per capita." This section was repealed by the act of 1905.

This act was amended in some respects by act of March 20, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 471). Section 1 of the act amends section 2 of the act of 1897 and provides as follows: "Said property shall continue to be used as a home for aged and indigent United States ex-soldiers, sailors and marines. The home shall be a state home, under the exclusive management and control of the state, by a board of directors, to be appointed by the governor" and fixes the term of their office. Section 2 amends section 3, and prescribes the oath to be taken by the officers of the home. Section 3 amends section 5, and provides for the organization of the board and its employés and their compensation. Section 4 amends section 7, and relates to making reports to the Governor. Section 5 amends section 10 and reads substantially as section 10 of the act of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 330), to be noticed later. Section 7 amends section 12 and relates to admission to the home and requires of ex-soldiers, sailors, and marines a residence in the state of six months. "The board may make such additional rules governing the admission of applicants and may prescribe conditions precedent upon which they may enter, and the conditions on which they remain, as in its judgment may be deemed just and proper for the best interests of the home." Section 8 amends section 13 and relates to traveling expenses; and section 9 repeals sections 14 and 16.

The act of 1907 (St. 1907, p. 330) consists of one section, as follows:

"Section 1. Section ten of an act approved March 11, 1897, entitled 'An act to accept from the Veterans' Home Association the conveyance of, and to vest the title in the state of California, to the tract of land in Napa county known as the Veterans' Home, with the improvements and furnishings thereon, to make the same a state home for the United States soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to provide for the government thereof by the state,' as amended by an act approved March 20, 1905, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 10. All moneys received by the directors, or any officer of the home (except such as may be paid to them by the state for disbursement), including pension moneys belonging to the pensioners in the home, and all other trust moneys, shall be immediately paid over to the treasurer of the home."

Then follows a provision requiring the treasurer of the home on or before the 10th day of each month to forward to the state treasurer all moneys then in his possession, "except pension and other trust funds" and some other special funds. "Said moneys shall be immediately deposited by the State Treasurer to the fund hereinafter designated 'Fund for the support and maintenance of the Veterans' Home of California.' Any balance of pension money held by the board, or by its authority upon the death of a pensioner, or any moneys belonging to members of the home, shall, upon their death, be held as a trust fund, to be paid by the board, directly, without probate, or by its order, to the widow, minor children or mother or father of the pensioner or member in the order named; and should no widow, minor child, or parent be discovered within one year from the time of the death of the pensioner, or of the member, said balance, or moneys, shall be paid to the post fund of the home, to be used for the common benefit of the members of the home under the direction of the board, subject to future reclamation by the relatives hereinbefore designated in the order named, upon application filed by the one entitled to the same within five years after the death of said pensioner, or member." The act then provides for the disposition of any personal effects of the deceased by public sale after one year, the proceeds to go to the post fund to be used for the common benefit of the members, "as hereinabove provided for pension and other moneys, and subject to future reclamation within the period of five years from the date of the death of the member as hereinbefore mentioned. The board of directors shall make rules and regulations to carry this into effect: Provided, however, that nothing in this act shall in any way conflict with the right of any member of the home to dispose of his property, including such pension moneys, by last will."

It seemed necessary to set forth somewhat fully the averments of the answer, including the application of deceased, the rules and regulations of the home, together with the statutory provisions relating thereto, for the several acts of the Legislature and the rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof and the application for membership of the deceased are to be read together in determining the questions presented. Respondent's position is, as was doubtless the view taken by the trial court, that the act of 1907 is unconstitutional, and any regulations of the home pursuant thereto are necessarily void. The feature of the law and regulations thus assailed is the provision which makes disposition of the pension money of a member of the home who dies intestate.

It is conceded that the Legislature had the power to create this home, and that there is no other similar state institution. Board of Directors v. Nye, 8 Cal. App. 527, 97 Pac. 208, where the subject is exhaustively treated. It can hardly be said that the act creating the home is a general law, for it applies to no other similar institution. It is essentially a special law enacted for a special purpose, and, it seems to us, does not present the case "where a general law can be made applicable." Board of Directors v. Nye, supra. We may, therefore, dismiss respondent's first objection. Special laws are not inhibited by the Constitution, except as provided by article 4, § 25, and its several subdivisions, of which latter subdivisions 12 and 30 only are claimed to apply. In no other respects are the laws or regulations relating to the home called in question. Conceding, then, the power to create the home as a state institution, why may not the Legislature, either directly by the provisions of the act, or indirectly by delegating the power to the governing body of the home, prescribe the conditions and terms upon which the persons provided for by the law may become members of the home? The law does not purport to affect "the estates of deceased persons" or "change the law of descent or succession" and was intended for no such purpose. It merely extends to the class of persons indicated the benefits and privileges of the home on certain conditions. In the particular complained of applicants agree that their pension money shall be paid to the treasurer of the home from time to time as received, to be held for their personal benefit and use while members, but in case of their death while members, and without having made other disposition of it, any balance unexpended shall go to the home for the benefit of all the members, subject to the right of certain named persons to this balance if called for within a stated period—five years. It cannot be said that this regulation is harsh or burdensome or ungenerous, for the applicant is supposed to be in indigent circumstances when admitted, having no one under any legal obligation to support him, and it is only when the member dies intestate that the law operates to dispose of any balance to his credit, and to this he agreed when admitted as a member. No question can arise as to the rights of creditors, for the United States statute protects the pension from execution, and the statute of this state makes the following exemption: "All money received by any person, a resident of this state, as a pensioner of the United States government, whether the same shall be in the actual possession of such pensioner, or deposited, loaned, or invested by him." Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 20. The only object, therefore, which the public administrator can have in getting possession of this pension money is to subject it to the payment of his fees and commissions and the fee of his attorney. The law wisely provides that this may not be done.

But, if we are mistaken in this view of the law, there is still another ground relied on by defendant, which, we think, justified the defendant in refusing to turn over this money to plaintiff. It will be observed that section 10 of the act of 1907 and the act of 1905 is but giving legislative approval in terms of the rules and regulations of the home in force when the deceased became a member, and to which he gave his express consent. Looking back to the provisions set forth in Exhibits A and B, it will be seen that the agreement under which the deceased became a member of the home has been fully executed. The pension money is held by the treasurer of the home under this agreement, and it came into his possession and is held subject to conditions precedent to the admission of deceased as a member of the home. Respondent concedes that the directors of the home and treasurer became trustees of Zawadill during his lifetime, but it is contended "that upon his death they held such property as trustees for the legal representatives, creditors and heirs of the said Zawadill."

It seems to us that the principles announced in Hellman v. McWilliams, 70 Cal. 449, 11 Pac. 659, and Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370, fit this case and should control it. In the Booth Case Mrs. Frances A. Bell, a widow, at her death had certain money on deposit in defendant bank. In her lifetime she executed and delivered to the bank an order, in the matter of this deposit, reading: "Pay to the individual order of either Cornelia E. Booth or Aurelia L. James, or myself. [Signed] Frances A. Bell." Verbally she stated to the teller of the bank "that she wanted to fix the account so that in the event of her death her sisters, who were in the East, could draw the money without the estate being probated." The account was changed to meet Mrs. Bell's directions. She continued to draw from the fund in her lifetime, leaving a balance at her death, to recover which was the purpose of the action. The executors of Mrs. Bell's will were made defendants "because of a claim by them of a right to receive and control said money as part of the estate." It was held that a trust was thus sufficiently created as to the trustor and the beneficiaries, under section 2221 of the Civil Code, and as to the trustee was sufficiently created under section 2222 of the same Code. It was also held that the mutual consent of the trustor and trustee created a trust of which the beneficiaries may take advantage, in so far as it has not been rescinded or revoked, also that the power of the trustor to withdraw the deposit does not affect the validity of the trust as to the remainder thereof; and it is immaterial whether such power be considered a power of revocation under section 2280 of the Civil Code, or a trust in favor of so much of the fund as she might withdraw and in favor of her sisters, as to the remainder. The Code does not require that the beneficiary shall be informed of the trust, and it is well settled that no set form of words is necessary to create a trust of personal property. It was said in the opinion: "I do not think it necessary to determine whether the control over the fund reserved by Mrs. Bell is to be regarded as a power of revocation, or whether the whole transaction is to be regarded as a trust in her favor of so much of the fund as she might see proper to withdraw in her lifetime, and of the remainder for her sisters. In either case the practical result is the same; for a power of revocation of the whole may be exercised as to a part, and, when so exercised, does not affect the remainder."

It would be difficult to express more clearly the intention of the trustor than is such intention expressed in the present case. Faithful to his agreement and to the regulations to which he had given his written consent, he confided his pension to the keeping of the treasurer of the home, reserving the right to withdraw it in his lifetime, but with directions that, should he die intestate, any balance in the hands of the treasurer should be disposed of as specifically directed. This he had the right and the power to do. The Supreme Court said in Nichols v. Emery, 109 Cal. 323, 331, 41 Pac. 1089, 1092, 50 Am. St.

Rep. 43: "A man may desire to make disposition of his property in his lifetime to avoid administration of his estate after death. Indeed, in view of the fact, both patent and painful, that the fiercest and most expensive litigation, suggesting the bitterest feeling, springs up over wills, such a desire is natural. And when it is given legal expression, as by gifts absolute during life, or by gifts in trust during life, or voluntary settlements, there is manifest, not only an absence of testamentary intent, but an absolute hostility to such intent."

The judgment is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the answer.

14 Cal. App. 89

JENKINS et al. v. WILLIAMS, County Auditor. (Civ. 707.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 17, 1910. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 13, 1910.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 178*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS —BONDS—ORDER.

Pol. Code, § 4088, authorizes a county to issue bonds for bridges, and declares that the county board shall specify the purpose for which the indebtedness is to be incurred, the amount of the bonds to be issued, the rate of interest, etc., and shall provide for submitting the question to the electors. It requires the board before issuing the bonds to provide by ordinance for an annual tax to be used for the payment of principal and interest of the bonds. Held, that the order of the board providing for bonds subject to ratification by the electors without which the election would be of no validity is jurisdictional, and that such order, when published, forms an essential part of the propositions to be submitted at the election.

2. COUNTIES (§ 161*) — BONDS—PURPOSE—ORDER OF SUPERVISOR.

Under Pol. Code, § 4088, authorizing the issuance of county bonds for roads, bridges, etc., pursuant to an order of the supervisors ratified by a subsequent election, the order specifying the improvements to be made has all the force of an ordinance; and hence, though the ballot voted at the election ratifying the bonds contains but a general statement of the amount and purpose of the bonds to be issued, the money obtained from a sale of the bonds must be devoted specifically to the purposes particularized in the order.

3. COUNTIES (§ 161*)—IMPROVEMENT BONDS—EXPENDITURE OF PROCEEDS.

Where an order for the issuance of bonds provided that the proceeds should be devoted in specified amounts to the improvement of separate designated bridges, the fact that the bonds for bridge purposes constituted a single fund, and not a separate bonded indebtedness for each bridge to be constructed, did not relieve the county board of its obligation to expend the proceeds in accordance with the distribution in the order.

4. COUNTIES (§ 161*)—BONDS—BRIDGE FUND —APPLICATION.

Where county bonds were issued under an order of the supervisors for their issuance to make repairs of a specified amount on each of certain named bridges, the auditor properly set apart the fund received from the sale of the bonds to pay for the repairs as specified in the order, and had no power to issue a warrant to be paid out of the fund for any one bridge in excess of the amount designated for that bridge.

5. COUNTIES (§ 161*)—BONDS—BRIDGE FUND —APPLICATION OF SURPLUS.

Pol. Code, § 4088, provides for the issuance of county bonds for roads, bridges, etc., and declares that the revenue derived from the sale of the bonds shall be applied to the purpose specified in the order of the board of supervisors and no other, and, if there shall be any surplus, it shall be applied to the payment of the bonds. Held, that where an order for the issuance of bridge bonds specifically stated the amounts to be expended on designated bridges, and there was a surplus unexpended in the construction of one of the bridges, such surplus must be applied to the payment of the bonds, and could not be used for the repair of other bridges.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Mandamus by M. A. Jenkins and another against L. P. Williams, as auditor of the county of Sacramento. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Eugene Wachhorst, Dist. Atty., for appellant. Devine & Butler, Snook & Church, and Devlin & Devlin, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This was an action to compel defendant by mandamus to draw his warrant for the sum of $503.16 in favor of plaintiffs on the county treasurer of Sacramento county. Plaintiff had judgment, from which and from the order denying his motion to set aside and vacate the judgment defendant appeals.

It appears from the finding marked "IX" that the board of supervisors on August 6, 1907, duly passed an order declaring that it was necessary that a bonded indebtedness be incurred "for the purposes hereinafter stated," and, to that end, the board ordered that a special election be held "for the purpose of submitting to the qualified electors of the county of Sacramento the question of issuance of bonds for the purpose of creating an indebtedness of six hundred and sixty thousand dollars for the purpose of erecting and constructing a new county courthouse, and in connection therewith a new county jail, in the said county of Sacramento; and also for the sum of six hundred thousand dollars for the purpose of building and constructing roads and highways in said Sacramento county; and also for the sum of two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars for the purpose of building and constructing bridges in said Sacramento county." Said amounts above specified and said purposes so stated are more particularly designated and described as follows, to wit: "First. The sum of $660,000.00 to be expended" in the erection of a courthouse and county jail. "Second. The sum of $600,000.00 for the purpose of building roads and highways in said county of Sacramento, as follows, viz.: Sacramento to Folsom, 21 miles—$105,000.00." Then follow six other roads, specifically named, their length and amount to be expended on each, making in all $600,000. "Third. The sum of $225,000.00 for the purpose of building and constructing bridges in said county of Sacramento as follows, to wit: Michigan Bar bridge, repairs, $3,000.00. New steel bridge over Cosumnes river at Bridge House, Sacramento county, $18,000.00. Twelfth Street American river bridge, repairs, $5,000.00. New Morman Island bridge (one-half), $15,000.00. * * *" Of these several bridges there are 30 in all, the building or repair of which amounted to $225,000, varying in sums from $63,000, the highest, to $500, the lowest. "All of said bonds for the several purposes hereinbefore enumerated shall be of the denomination"—then follow description, time to run, etc. "The said special election to be held throughout the county of Sacramento, * * * for the purpose of submitting to a vote of the qualified electors of Sacramento county the above and foregoing propositions, is hereby fixed for Tuesday, the 10th day of September, A. D. 1907."

Findings X and XI are: That the board duly published notice of this election by proclamation in which the purpose of the election was set forth fully and in the terms and language substantially of the foregoing order made by the board. The election was duly called and held and the ballots used at said election were in form and substance as follows:

Bonds for the sum of $660,000.00, to be expended in the construction and erection of a new court house and in connection therewith a new county jail, in said county of Sacramento	Yes.
The same	No.
Bonds for the sum of $600,000.00 to be expended in building and constructing roads and highways in said county of Sacramento	Yes.
The same	No.
Bonds for the sum of $225,000.00 to be expended in building and constructing bridges in said county of Sacramento	Yes.
The same	No.

The election was in favor of the bonded indebtedness and bonds were issued and sold in accordance therewith.

It further appears, by finding XII, that the sum of $225,000 was raised from the sale of said bridge bonds, as aforesaid, and the same paid into the treasury of the county; "that thereupon the said sum of $225,000 was by the auditor of said county of Sacramento, to wit, the respondent above named, without any order therefor having been made by the board of supervisors of said county of Sacramento, placed in his books in several and separate funds and in amounts corresponding to the estimated cost of the several bridges."

Appellant invites attention to finding IX and finding XII, and claims that the auditor was acting under the order of the board of supervisors in placing the bridge funds in several accounts corresponding with the amounts designated by the board to be expended in each instance. Appellant therefore claims that finding XII is not supported by the evidence.

It was further found that the amount used in the construction of several of said bridges fell short of the amount apportioned for the building of the same, and "that there is therefore now in the treasury of the said county of Sacramento more than the sum of $503.16 as a surplus from the cost of construction and work and labor performed on said several bridges." It was also found that there remains in the treasury of said county the sum of $86,741.47, the same being the total of all sums unexpended for work upon the several bridges in the said county to the date of the filing of the petition. It was undisputed and the evidence was that all the bridges had not as yet been constructed, and it did not appear how much money would be required to complete them, but it did appear that, after the completion of the new Morman Island bridge, there was a surplus of over $503.16, apportioned for that bridge. It appears, also, that the board entered into a written contract with plaintiffs to pay them $5,388 to perform the work on the "Twelfth Street American river bridge, repairs," and that they completed the work, were paid $5,000 and no more, and that they duly presented their claim to the board for $503.16, to be paid out of this bridge bond fund, which was allowed and ordered paid but defendant refused to issue his warrant therefor.

The conclusion of law found by the court was that plaintiffs are entitled to a writ commanding defendant to pay the said claim of $503.16 "out of the moneys in his hands from the sale of bonds for bridges," and such was its judgment.

The statute under which the board proceeded is found in section 4088 of the Political Code (St. 1907, p. 382, county government act). So much of the section as is necessary to be now considered reads as follows: "* * * Any county may incur or refund a bonded indebtedness for any purposes for which the board of supervisors are herein authorized to expend the funds of said county, or for the purpose of building or constructing roads, bridges or highways. Such indebtedness shall be incurred in the following manner, to wit: The board of supervisors thereof shall by order specify the purpose for which the indebtedness is to be incurred, the amount of bonds they propose to issue, the rate of interest, * * * and shall further provide for submitting the question of the issuance of said bonds to the qualified electors of the county at the next general election or at a special election to be called by the board for that purpose, and the words to appear upon the ballot shall be 'Bonds—Yes,' and 'Bonds—No,' or words of similar import, together with a general statement of the amount and purpose of the bonds to be issued. Several separate propositions may be submitted at the same election. * * *" The section then provides for the calling of the election, who shall be qualified electors, and provides for publishing notice of the election—"such notice must contain the time and place of holding the election, * * * the amount and denomination of the bonds, the rate of interest to be paid," etc. Provision is then made as to the form of the bond, how and when to be paid and the like. "And the board of supervisors, before or at the time of issuing said bonds by ordinance shall provide for the levy of an annual tax sufficient to effect the object of this provision. Such tax when collected shall be paid to the treasury of the county, and used solely to pay the interest and principal of said bonds as they respectively become due. The revenue derived from the sale of said bonds shall be applied to the purpose specified in the order of the board, and no other. Should there be any surplus it shall be applied toward the payment of said bonds. The board of supervisors of any county can contract a bonded indebtedness for county purposes only as in this title provided."

The position taken by the plaintiffs at the trial and here is that the face of the ballot expressed the will of the voters, regardless of the notice given to them by the order and proclamation of the board; that the $225,000 was to constitute the bridge fund, and all of it could be lawfully used for the construction of one bridge if necessary; that the ballot sufficiently complied with the statute in making a "general statement of the amount and purpose of the bonds to be issued." If this position be correct, it would follow that the board might not only expend all the bridge bond money on a single bridge, but it might also expend all the road and highway money upon a single road, and this, too, in direct conflict with the order of the board and the proclamation and notice given to the electors. We cannot agree to this construction of the statute. It is not necessary to consider whether it would have been sufficient compliance with the statute had the order and the notice or proclamation to the electors simply stated the purpose as it was stated in the ballot—i. e., "the sum of $225,000.00 to be expended in building and constructing bridges in said Sacramento county"—for that is not what the board did. See McMahon v. Board of Supervisors, 46 Cal. 214. The electors were notified that they would be called upon to vote "Yes" or "No" upon the proposition to bond the county for that amount to be used as it was ordered, by the board it should be used to construct 30 different and specifically named bridges, the amount to be expended on each bridge being specifically mentioned, and the electors did not authorize, and certainly did not intend to authorize, the bonding of the county to such an extent leaving it discretionary with the board to expend the entire amount on one bridge and wherever the board might elect. The statute seems to be plain enough. It says: "Such indebtedness shall be incurred in the following manner, to wit: The board of supervisors thereof shall by order specify the purpose for which the indebtedness is to be incurred." And it then directs that in submitting the purpose set forth in the order to be voted upon by the electors there shall appear upon the ballot: "Bonds—Yes and Bonds—No, or words of similar import, together with a general statement of the amount and purpose of the bonds to be issued." The brief statement of the purpose upon the ballot identifies the proposition more fully set forth in the order of which the electors are fully advised by publication of the order. To make the meaning of the Legislature clear, the act provides that "the revenue derived from the sale of said bonds shall be applied to the purpose specified in the order of the board of supervisors, and no other." The language is, "the purpose specified in the order of the board," not in the ballot the form of which they prescribed as directed by the statute. In dealing with any surplus which might arise in expending the money for any of the specified purposes, the law expressly provides that "it shall be applied toward the payment of said bonds." Finally, the board is informed that it can "contract a bonded indebtedness for county purposes only as in this title provided." In its order the board declared that it was necessary to incur a bonded indebtedness "for the purposes hereinafter stated," and that "said amounts above specified and said purposes so stated are more particularly designated and described as follows." Then follow the specifically enumerated specified purposes submitted to the electors for their vote "Yes" or "No." Here was $600,000 which the voters were told was to be expended in constructing 7 different roads in the county and $225,000 to be expended in constructing 30 different bridges, and we are asked to hold that these large amounts, ordered by the board for specific purposes, could be divided up and shifted about at the discretion or possible caprice of the board and for purposes in direct violation of its order and the statute. The order of the board was jurisdictional, without which the election and the bonds would have had no validity. The published order of the board formed an essential part of the propositions submitted to the vote of the electors, and it was the order which was ratified by them. Respondents' contention would lead to results still wider than we have suggested, for by it the board could expend all this money on roads and bridges, no one of which was enumerated in the order, and this must be so if it be true that the statement made on the ballot of the purpose is the measure of the board's power.

It is claimed by plaintiffs that "the board of supervisors cannot order a bonded indebtedness for a number of purposes, and then submit the question to the voters as a single purpose. It naturally follows, therefore, that it was not the intention of the board to have the estimated cost of construction and repairs of each separate bridge considered as a distinct purpose, for, if it had, each purpose would have had to have been submitted separately to the voters. A bonded indebtedness therefore of $225,000 was created for the construction and repair of bridges in the county, and that constituted but a single purpose." The force of the argument rests upon the contention that the purpose declared upon the ballot is controlling, and that the provisions of the order of August 6, 1907, are of no consequence. But this order has all the force of an ordinance, although not so called, and, as it was "passed in pursuance of the statute, has the force and effect of a law of the state and is to be construed as if its terms had been incorporated in the statute itself." Murphy v. San Luis Obispo, 119 Cal. 624, 51 Pac. 1085, 39 L. R. A. 444; City of San Luis Obispo v. Fitzgerald, 126 Cal. 279, 58 Pac. 699. This order or ordinance was published to give notice to the voters of its purpose and what it was proposed to do with the money derived from the bonds. It does not seem reasonable that the board of supervisors intended, or that the voters intended, that the power should be reserved to the board to expend the money at their discretion. The more reasonable construction to be given the order and the statute is that the purposes specified in the order should control. It was not necessary that the ballot should contain a statement of all these purposes in order to comply with the statute, inasmuch as they were particularized in the order, for the statute only requires that the ballot shall contain "a general statement of the amount and purpose of the bonds to be issued," but, where the order defines the purposes specifically, it should be as binding upon the board as though these specific purposes had been expressed on the ballot. Nor does the fact that the bonds for bridge purposes constituted one fund—i. e., that there was not created a separate bonded indebtedness for each bridge to be constructed—affect the question. The order still remains as the measure of the board's power to expend the money. The auditor rightly set apart this fund agreeably to the order, and in our opinion he has no power to issue a warrant to be paid out of this fund for any one bridge in excess of the amount thus set apart.

It is further contended by plaintiffs that the provision of the statute relating to any surplus remaining of the fund refers only to such surplus as shall be left over after all the bridges are completed. But, as plaintiffs contend that the board is in no wise controlled by the purposes mentioned in the order, it would not be likely to happen that there would ever be a surplus, for, under the construction urged, the board could use the bridge bond fund for constructing bridges anywhere in the county at any time and so long as there was money left to do so. The statute says: "Should there be any surplus it shall be applied toward the payment of said bonds." Consistently we must hold that the surplus here referred to is money unexpended in the construction of any bridge, which the board has specifically declared was to be constructed or repaired out of this bridge bond fund.

But plaintiffs further contend that, as this fund was a single fund to be used at the discretion of the board, the latter had the right to contract to pay any cost in the construction of any one bridge which might happen to be in excess of the amount mentioned in the order for the construction of that particular bridge. This would be true if plaintiffs' construction of the statute were correct, for they urge that the board had the power to expend the entire fund on one bridge. But, if the board had not such power, it could not confer it in violation of the statute by making a contract. By force of the statute and its order, the power of the board was limited in the expenditure of the money arising from the sale of these bridge bonds to the sum of $5,000 for the "Twelfth Street American river bridge, repairs," and, if the board has incurred liabilities for this purpose in excess of that amount, such excess must be paid, if at all, out of some other fund.

It seems to us that the views herein expressed are consistent with the letter and spirit of the statute, and that the construction contended for by plaintiffs would open the door to possible, if not probable, dangerous abuse of power, and would take from the vote of the people all its significance as well as defeat its purpose.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Action by Albert Larsen, by S. Larsen, his guardian ad litem, against the Magne-Silica Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and from the refusal of a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Waldo M. York and J. M. York, for appellant. L. H. Roseberry and B. F. Thomas, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was one to recover damages on account of personal injuries. Trial was had before a jury, verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial defendant appeals.

The contention of appellant that there is no evidence tending to show neglect on the part of defendant or its officers, if determined adversely to appellant, disposes of the questions involved in the motion for a nonsuit, as well as the other specifications of error presented.

We find evidence in the record tending to show that defendant was engaged in operating a mine from which it was seeking to extract infusorial earth. This earth when in place is shown to lie in strata overlying which heavier earth, ordinarily of a depth of five to six feet, is found. The safest and best way to mine for this infusorial earth was to first remove the waste on top. This was the customary way and the safest way. Defendant was undertaking at the time of the injury complained of to mine this earth without removing the waste and without propping or supporting the same, which was a dangerous method of procedure. Plaintiff, a youth of less than 18, without previous experience as a miner, was employed by defendant generally without reference to any particular kind of employment. It is shown that while he was employed by one Starr, the superintendent of the mine, yet in the absence of Starr therefrom one Jacobson, a miner, directed the other employés as to their duties and the manner of their performance. Plaintiff during his employment, which lasted several months, was chiefly engaged in hauling waste and piling rock, and much of the time working upon a ranch owned by the superintendent, and was not employed in connection with the mining operations proper to the extent of a week during his entire employment. It appears that on the Saturday preceding the injury, which occurred on Monday, the superintendent directed plaintiff to assist the other employés who were taking out this rock or infusorial earth from the face of the cliff, and in which operation they were prying out the rock without removing the waste. This work plaintiff continued until the close of the day, and on the Monday following reported for work, and, Starr being absent, Jacobson directed him to continue his previous employment. Plaintiff undertook to remove a portion of this rock strata, as the other employés were seeking to do, by prying out the rock without removing the waste, and in so doing a cave occurred and large quantities of earth and rock fell upon plaintiff and injured him. Neither the defendant nor any one in authority or connected with the operation of the mine ever disclosed to plaintiff the danger connected with the work, nor any steps which should be taken by him to avert danger. It is true that upon one occasion, while plaintiff was engaged in hauling rock, he saw a large quantity of earth fall, but did not see what occasioned it. Before plaintiff undertook to remove the wedge of rock which occasioned the cave producing the injury, he applied to Jacobson for instructions as to whether he should remove the waste first before seeking to take out the wedge, and was told to proceed to take out the wedge. After removing a portion of the wedge, he reported to Jacobson his progress, and Jacobson pointed to another portion of the wedge and said, "Take that out." Doing this seems to have removed the support from the earth above and which resulted in the cave. Plaintiff knew nothing about the character of this earth or its resisting force or strength. It further appears that at least 18 months' experience in a mine of this character would be necessary in order to render one capable of mining in such employment.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is insisted by appellant that no one authorized by defendant ever directed plaintiff to do this particular work, and that, if he obeyed the instructions of Jacobson, it was in obedience to suggestions from a fellow-employé, for which defendant is not responsible. In work of this character where inexperienced men are employed, it is incumbent upon the employer, if the work be of a dangerous character, to apprise employés of the danger and instruct them in the manner of the performance of their duties, so as to minimize the danger incident thereto. Jacobson is shown to have exercised general duties as a superintendent in the absence of Starr, the superintendent proper. While he did not hire or discharge men, he directed their movements and work. In this he was discharging a duty of his principal. It is further insisted that plaintiff had knowledge of the dangerous character of the work and assumed the risk. In Ingerman v. Moore, 90 Cal. 410, 27 Pac. 306, 25 Am. St. Rep. 138, in speaking of the duty which the master owed with reference to dangerous machinery, it is said: "When one who is known to be an inexperienced person is put to work upon machinery which is dangerous to operate unless with care, and by one familiar with its structure, the employer is bound to give him such instructions as will cause him to fully understand and appreciate the danger attending the employment and the necessity for care." This rule as to machinery should and does apply to any employment of a dangerous character. When directed by a master or one in authority to perform work, the servant's duty is to obey, "and he has a right to rely upon the superior knowledge of the master and act as directed, unless the danger in doing so is so open or apparent that a man of ordinary prudence would discern the danger and refuse obedience. His position was one of subordination, and he had a right to rely upon the superior knowledge of the master, and to assume that the master would not put him in a place of peril." Forsman v. Seattle Electric Co. (Wash.) 109 Pac. 121. As to whether or not plaintiff had knowledge and appreciation of the danger were matters to be determined by the jury from the facts in the case. In considering these facts the jury were warranted in taking into consideration the youth of plaintiff, his inexperience, and the work to which he was assigned, the particular character of the danger attending the work, and the failure of defendant to give him any warning concerning it. Jenson v. Will & Finck Co., 150 Cal. 398, 89 Pac. 113. In Quinn v. Electric Laundry Co., 155 Cal. 508, 101 Pac. 797, an instruction is approved to the effect that: "A servant's implied assumption of risks, which accompanies and is a part of a contract of hiring, is confined to that particular work and class of work for which he is employed; and if the master orders him to work temporarily in another department of the general business where the work is of such a different nature and character that it cannot be said to be within the scope of the employment, and where he is associated with a different class of employés, he will not, by obeying such orders, necessarily thereby assume the risks incident to the work; and, in a case involving the principle here declared, it will not be held, as a matter of law, that the injured party assumed the risk, unless the evidence is clear, explicit, and uncontradicted to that point." The words "to that point," used in the instruction, were held to relate to the assumption of risks on the knowledge or want of knowledge of the injured employé. We have here a case presented wherein, by reason of the youth and inexperience of plaintiff, the master omitted a plain duty in not warning him of the incident danger, and further, upon the authority last cited, under the circumstances of this case, evidence clear and explicit in its character of previous knowledge of danger is absent, and, the jury having determined as it did that plaintiff did not have such knowledge, the same is conclusive of that matter.

We think the evidence in the record entirely sufficient to warrant the jury in determining that the injury to plaintiff was occasioned by the negligence of defendant, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by the Troy Laundry Machinery Company, Limited, against the Drivers' Independent Laundry Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 109 Pac. 36.

D. Z. Gardiner and Millsap & Sparks, for appellant. Horace S. Wilson and Constan Jensen, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover from defendant the sum of $900 as a balance alleged to be owing and unpaid on account of the purchase price of certain laundry machinery. A written contract, dated December 16, 1907, described the property purchased as "one secondhand No. 3, Troy triplex mangle."

Defendant answered the complaint, admitting the execution of the contract and the performance of all the conditions required to be performed by plaintiff thereunder, and then alleged: "That prior to the signing of the contract set out in the complaint, and in order to and for the purpose of inducing the defendant to sign and execute said contract, the plaintiff represented to defendant and stated to the defendant that the mangle referred to in said contract was all right and would do the amount and kind of work usually done by the best of such machines; that plaintiff was well acquainted with said machine, and knew its character and condition, and the kind, amount, and quality of work that said machine would do; that defendant was unacquainted with the amount, kind, and quality of work that said machine would do, but knew that plaintiff was well acquainted with said facts, and the defendant relied on the aforesaid representations and statements of the plaintiff concerning said machine, and was induced thereby to enter into and execute said contract, and but for said representations and statements would not have done so, and would not have made said conditional or any purchase of said mangle." Allegations following recited that after the mangle was set up and operated it was discovered that it would not do the amount or kind or quality of work usually done by such machines and was in fact useless and worthless; that defendant immediately gave notice that it rescinded the contract, whereupon plaintiff promised to repair the mangle and put it into a condition to do the required work, and did attempt so to do, but failed, and that the machine remained useless and valueless; that defendant immediately gave notice to plaintiff that it insisted upon its rescission of the contract and offered to return the machine to plaintiff. Damages were alleged to have been suffered in the amount of $475, which defendant sought to recover under its counterclaim.

Upon the trial, defendant, after introducing the testimony of several witnesses going mainly to show the authority of the agents of the parties to make the contract sued upon, and while J. E. Reid, the president of defendant company, was being examined as a witness, offered in evidence a writing, dated September 16, 1907, purporting to be a contract whereby the use of "one Troy duplex mangle" and "one electric motor" was let by plaintiff to defendant for a stipulated rental for a period of 90 days. This witness, upon objection by plaintiff's counsel being made, was not allowed to state what conversations were had with plaintiff's agent at the time the contract of September 16th was entered into, and he was then asked whether he had any conversations with plaintiff's agent at the time the contract of December 16th was executed. This line of inquiry was objected to, and the trial judge in ruling remarked: "I will sustain any objection to any conversation prior to the first contract as immaterial. I sustain the objection as to conversations had at the time of entering into the second contract, because they tend to vary the terms of a written contract." The court found that the contract of September 16, 1907, referred to the same machine as that mentioned in the contract of December 16, 1907; that defendant took possession of the property and retained it, and still had possession of it; that the plaintiff did not, prior to the signing of the contract set out in the complaint, or at all, make the false representations alleged in defendant's answer. Judgment for plaintiff followed, from which defendant has appealed.

The defendant complains that the court erred in excluding evidence offered in support of the allegations of fraud and to establish its counterclaim. This contention seems to be well founded. The answer of defendant presented, in an appropriate and sufficient way, an issue as to whether or not the consent of defendant to the making of the contract sued on had been obtained by fraud. If it had been made to appear in the record that the mangle described in the contract of September 16, 1907, was the same mangle as that described in the contract of December 16, 1907, and that defendant had used, or had had an opportunity of using, the mangle prior to the making of the last contract, the ruling would have been correct; for in that case defendant would or should have known just what work could be accomplished by the use of the mangle, and it could not then have been deceived by the false representations, if they had been made as alleged. "A false representation, to constitute fraud, must actually deceive; that is, it must be relied upon by the other party, and must induce him to act to his prejudice. If it is not believed, or the party disregards it and makes inquiries for himself, there is no fraud. * * * If the representation was one calculated to induce the other party to make the contract, the presumption is that he was influenced by it; and in order to take away his right to relief on the ground of fraud it must be shown that he did not rely upon it." Clark on Contracts, p. 232.

A careful examination of the testimony, as shown by the record submitted here in the bill of exceptions, fails to disclose any evidence upon which to base the finding of the court that the mangles described in the two contracts were one and the same machine. The contrary seems established by reason of the difference in the machines as described in the respective contracts; in one it is styled a duplex machine, while in the other a triplex. The entire absence of evidence in support of a finding material in the maintenance of a judgment presents a question of law. Identity not appearing, defendant was not estopped from asserting that it had been misled to its prejudice by the representations alleged. The effect of the evidence thus tendered would not have been to vary the terms of the written contract. Maxson v. Llewelyn, 122 Cal. 199, 54 Pac. 732; Civ. Code, §§ 1565, 1572.

PEOPLE v. ROLLINS. (Cr. 239.)

2. Criminal Law (§ 407*)—Evidence—Admissions.

While on a prosecution for obtaining money through false representations, including one that defendant owned mining properties in Alaska, letters written from there, in answer to inquiries, stating that he owned no such properties, were incompetent to establish the truth of their statements, yet having been read by witness to defendant, in a conversation between them, on defendant's insisting that he owned said properties, and witness having, after so reading them, repeatedly asked defendant if he still maintained that he owned the properties, and his answers having been evasive, and he having finally said that he was unable to say whether or not he owned any properties there, the letters are competent to prove an admission against interest by defendant by showing his conduct with reference to them when they were read to him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

J. R. Rollins was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

Frank J. Gordon and J. J. Von Hovenberg, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was found guilty of the crime of grand larceny as charged. He moved for a new trial, and, this motion being denied, he was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 10 years. This appeal is from the judgment.

Briefly the facts of the case are as follows: Three men, Williams, Ameral, and Wilson, with the defendant Rollins, doing business under the name of "The Hypatia Mining and Development Company," entered into an arrangement for cheating and defrauding a certain class of laborers. Pursuant to this arrangement, they caused an advertisement to appear in a newspaper, in answer to which 19 or 20 men called at the office of the defendant, and were there collectively told by Williams that the Hypatia Mining & Development Company was organizing a party of 25 to go to Alaska to work on mining claims owned by defendant Rollins and to locate mining claims on property which had been prospected by said Rollins; that said defendant had tried on other occasions to get men to go there and do this mining work, but that, after arriving there, other companies by offering better pay had enticed them away; that consequently on this occasion, to avert a similar experience, each man desiring to avail himself of the Rollins proposition would be required to deposit with the defendant and his associates the sum of $200 as a guaranty that the contract would be performed upon his part; that of this sum $40 or $50 could be paid down, and the balance paid in installments. The deposit was to be returned at the completion of the contract, which covered a period of three years. For every dollar deposited they were each to be given one share of stock on the company's books, which, while not entitling them to the possession of the stock, still gave them the right to any dividends paid upon it. In addition each man was to receive his board and lodging while in Alaska and wages at the rate of $4.50 per day or $6.50 per day, according to the kind of work engaged upon. Williams was to visit Alaska at once and ascertain if the facts were as represented by Rollins. If he found that they were, the expenses of his trip were to be paid out of the money deposited by the men. If the outlook was not satisfactory, Williams was to pay his own expenses.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Rollins was present at this meeting, and he advised MacLeod, the complaining witness, to accept the proposition. Accordingly the next day MacLeod paid Williams $50 on account of the deposit above mentioned, and shortly thereafter, upon making further inquiries in connection with his employment, was informed by Rollins that Williams had collected all the money that he could, and instead of going to Alaska had gone to Los Angeles, and had there squandered it. Rollins promised MacLeod, however, that he would reimburse him the amount of money advanced to Williams, and to that end referred him to Wilson. Wilson told him that the company would make good the loss, but that in order to do so a new contract similar to the first one must be made with the company, including the deposit of the $200 guaranty; that in the present case, however, a credit of $50 would be allowed on account of the payment made to Williams, but that $50 more must be paid at once. This payment was made. The truth of the matter was that Rollins had no mining interests in Alaska or elsewhere, the Hypatia Mining & Development Company was a fiction, and the whole scheme was a bare-faced swindle.

Defendant's brief is only a little better than would be a statement that he relies upon each objection made during the trial and found in the transcript. For example, on one page of his brief he makes nine points with reference to rulings on evidence, and none of these is sustained by argument or citation of authority. Notwithstanding this often-condemned method of briefing a case (People v. Chutnacut, 141 Cal. 685, 75 Pac. 340; People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 309, 67 Pac. 770; People v. Cebulla, 137 Cal. 318, 70 Pac. 181; People v. Bordet, 110 Pac. 155), we have examined each of the points made, and we are giving them all the consideration they deserve when we say that they were made as to evidence tending to prove a conspiracy, or to material acts and declarations of co-conspirators during the life of the conspiracy and in relation to it, and the evidence was clearly admissible.

Defendant also claims that the court committed error in permitting three certain letters to be read during the examination of the witness Petersen. These letters were from the land office departments of Canada and the United States in reply to inquiries made by the police department of Oakland, and stated in effect that Rollins owned no mining properties in the places in Alaska claimed by him. They were read to the defendant by the witness Petersen in a conversation between them upon the defendant insisting that he owned the said mining properties, and, after so reading them, Petersen repeatedly asked the defendant if he still maintained that he owned such properties. His answers were all evasive, and he finally said that he was unable to state whether he owned any mining claims there or not. These letters were competent evidence—not to establish the truth of their contents, but to prove an admission against interest on defendant's part by showing his conduct with reference to them when they were read to him. His action under the circumstances of this case amounted to an implied acquiescence in the truth of the statements contained in the letters, and certainly for this purpose they were admissible. People v. McCrea, 32 Cal. 98; People v. Collins, 48 Cal. 277; People v. Estrado, 49 Cal. 171; People v. Palmer, 53 Cal. 615; People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 532, 66 Pac. 794. It may not be amiss to observe here that the defendant would have been entitled to an instruction to the jury, if he had asked for it, to the effect that these letters were not admitted as substantive evidence of the truth of the facts stated in them, but to show the attitude of the defendant with reference to them when they were read to him. See cases last cited. He did not ask for such an instruction.

Defendant requested the court to instruct the jury to acquit him upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to prove the charge. The evidence was abundantly sufficient to go to the jury, and the proposed instruction was properly refused.

Defendant also complains that the court committed error in permitting MacLeod over objection to testify as to the conversations with accomplices of the defendant before proof of the conspiracy. It is true that the declaration of a conspirator cannot be given in evidence against his fellow conspirators without first proving the conspiracy. But the rule goes to the order of proof, and unless injury is shown—which is not the case here—a departure from the rule is a matter of no moment. People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 567; People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 65, 55 Pac. 698; People v. Bianchino, 5 Cal. App. 633, 91 Pac. 112; People v. Donnolly, 143 Cal. 398, 77 Pac. 177. In the case at bar the evidence was sufficient to justify the jury in the implied finding to the effect that there was a conspiracy.

The judgment is affirmed.

McCLEARY et al. v. BROADDUS et al.

(Civ. 742.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 9, 1910. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 7, 1910.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 14*) — MINING CLAIMS—SOURCE OF TITLE.

Discovery and appropriation are the source of title to mining claims; development by working being only a condition of continued ownership until a patent is obtained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 19; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 14*)—"APPROPRIATION."

"Appropriation" of a mining claim is accomplished by the posting of notice at or near the point where the ledge is exposed, followed by the recording of notice and the marking of boundaries.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 466–477; vol. 8, p. 7580.]

3. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 14*)—LOCATION—ORDER OF STEPS REQUISITE.

When every act necessary to complete a mining location has been performed before an adverse claim has accrued, the order in which the acts have been performed is immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 19; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

4. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 20*) — MINING CLAIMS—LOCATION.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2324 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426), making it essential to a valid mining location that the location be distinctly marked on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced, the ultimate fact in determining the validity of a location is the placing of such marks on the ground as to identify the claim, or of such a character that the boundaries can be readily traced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 40–44; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

5. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 38*)—LOCATION —MARKING BOUNDARIES—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that plaintiff's grantor made discovery on the land in controversy on August 1, 1905, and on the 4th posted a location notice, and on the 17th put up monuments from which the boundaries of the claim could be readily traced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 102–107; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

6. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 19*)—LOCATION —POSTING NOTICE—TIME AND PLACE.

In the absence of a mining custom or regulation, there is nothing in Rev. St. U. S. § 2324 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426), regulating mining locations, requiring the posting of notice on the day of discovery, or prescribing where it shall be posted on the claim, or at all; the only necessity being that the location be so marked on the ground that its boundaries may be readily traced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 37–39; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

7. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 19*)—LOCATION NOTICE—MARKING BOUNDARIES—TIME.

Ordinarily a notice of the location of a mining claim which does not sufficiently mark the boundaries of the claim is sufficient to hold the claim for a reasonable time in which to mark the boundaries, in the absence of an adverse prior discovery and a prior marking of boundaries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 37–39; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

8. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 17*)—LOCATION —DISCOVERY.

The discovery is the source of title to a mining claim, and vests in the discoverer a prior right to complete the location within a reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 24–28; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

9. MINES AND MINERALS (§§ 19, 22*)—LOCATION—NOTICE—POSTING AND RECORDING.

The mining law of the United States does not require a notice of location to be posted or recorded in order to vest the claimant with a prior right to complete his location.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 37, 45; Dec. Dig. §§ 19, 22.*]

10. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 38*) — ASSESSMENT WORK—PERFORMANCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to justify a finding of performance of the requisite assessment work on certain mining claims in controversy for the years 1906 and 1907.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 106; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

11. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 38*)—QUIETING TITLE—PERSONS ENTITLED TO SUE—OWNER OF UNDIVIDED INTEREST.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, authorizing the owner of an interest in real property to sue to quiet title against any one claiming adversely to him, the owner of an undivided interest in a mining claim is not required to join the owner of any other interest in a suit against third persons to quiet title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; John E. Raker, Judge.

Action by C. E. McCleary and others against W. D. Broaddus and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. F. Shartel and James Wylie, for appellants. F. M. Jamison and N. A. Cornish, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought to quiet title to a certain mining claim in Modoc county, known as the "Mountain Sheep Mining Claim." The defendants contend that the land is included within their locations, known as the Evening Star, White Quartz, and Klondyke mining claims, and the determination of the case involves the question of prior location and appropriation as to the respective claimants, and whether up to the time of the trial plaintiffs had done everything required of them by law to maintain the validity of their claim. In reaching a conclusion favorable to plaintiffs, the trial court found that their grantor, C. T. Fisher, "made a discovery of a mineral-bearing ledge in place containing gold on the ground embraced within the exterior boundaries of the Mountain Sheep mining claim on the 1st day of August, 1905, and that thereafter, on the 4th day of August, 1905, and the 17th day of August, 1905, the said C. T. Fisher proceeded to and did mark the exterior boundaries of the said Mountain Sheep mining claim upon the ground so that its boundaries could be readily traced upon the ground, and that the marking of the exterior boundaries of the said Mountain Sheep mining claim by the said C. T. Fisher, following the discovery by him as aforesaid, on the 1st day of August, 1905, was done within a reasonable time after the discovery was made by him as aforesaid; that the discovery of the ledge of mineral-bearing quartz in place upon said Mountain Sheep mining claim, made by the said C. T. Fisher and his location of said Mountain Sheep mining claim, and marking the exterior boundaries thereof so that the boundaries of said last-named claim could be readily traced upon the ground, as aforesaid, was prior in time and prior in right to the said discoveries of the mineral-bearing ledges and each of them made by the said defendants upon the said Evening Star, White Quartz, and Klondyke mining claims, and each of them and prior to the marking of the boundaries of the Evening Star, White Quartz, and Klondyke mining claims and each of them." It is claimed that these findings are not justified by the evidence.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The parties are substantially agreed, except possibly in one particular, as to what steps are necessary to make and maintain a valid mining location. Indeed, the proceeding has been frequently the subject of adjudication, and concerning it there would appear to be little room for controversy. A general and comprehensive statement of what is required is found in the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 535, 5 Sup. Ct. 564, 28 L. Ed. 1113, wherein it is said: "In all legislation, whether of Congress or of the state or territory and by all mining regulations and rules, discovery and appropriation are recognized as the source of title to mining claims, and development by working as the condition of continued ownership until a patent is obtained." The only uncertainty involved in the foregoing statement is as to the exact meaning of appropriation. Ordinarily this is effected in the following manner, as pointed out by the Supreme Court in Dwinnell v. Dyer, 145 Cal. 21, 78 Pac. 253, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 763: "The posting of notice at or near the point where the ledge is exposed; next the recording of notice; next the marking of boundaries." But, in the language of the learned Chief Justice: "It is indeed universally held that, when every act necessary to complete a location has been done before an adverse claim has accrued, the order in which such acts have been performed is immaterial."

Section 2324 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426) of the statutes of the United States makes it essential that "the location must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced." In commenting upon this requirement the Supreme Court in Donahue v. Meister, 88 Cal. 131, 25 Pac. 1099, 22 Am. St. Rep. 283, declared that it is the "main act of original location." In Eaton v. Norris, 131 Cal. 563, 63 Pac. 856, it is said that "the ultimate fact in determining the validity of a location is the placing of such marks on the ground as to identify the claim, or, to use the language of the statute, of such a character that the boundaries can be readily traced." As to the purpose of the posted notices, it is stated that they may be an aid in determining the situs of the monuments (Lindley on Mines, § 373), and therefore "constitute a part of the marking as does every other object placed on the ground for the purpose of marking it or otherwise, if it in fact does help to mark it."

Did the said Fisher, in compliance with these requirements of the law, make a valid location of the claim in question? There is evidence in the record that he made the discovery on the 1st day of August, 1905. He testified as follows: "Q. What was your object and purpose in being there the first day of August? A. I was prospecting. Q. I will ask you to state what discovery you made of mineral at that time if any? A. I found gold out of the rock, or supposed it to be gold, about the center of the claim." He further stated that "there was a quartz lead there as near as I could trace it. It would be over half the length of the claim." It maybe, as said by appellants, that "this testimony of Fisher's is as devoid of truth as cunning and malice can make it"; but it is needless to add that such consideration was for the trial court. The testimony is not inherently improbable, and, under the rule, we must accept it as establishing the proper discovery. Again, he testified that on the 4th of August, 1905, one Lester Bonner wrote a notice of location, and Fisher signed it and posted it on a tree on the northeast corner of the claim, and built a monument there of stone and pieces of decayed wood about four feet high. He went back the next day and "put up the northwest and center monuments, and then prospected on the ground for quite a while. On August 17th I put up the northeast side center, the southeast corner, the south or southeast end center, and the southwest corner, and the southwest side center monuments of stone about three feet high so that the lines of the boundaries could be readily traced from those monuments." As to what was done on the 4th of August and subsequently Fisher is corroborated by other witnesses. There is evidence, then, that everything was done by Fisher which was necessary to effect a valid location. There is some criticism of the fact that his notice was not posted until the said 4th of August, and that it was placed some distance from the point of discovery.

As to this, it may be said that there is no evidence of the existence of any mining custom or regulation in the district relating to the subject, and there is nothing in the statute requiring the posting of notice on the day of discovery or prescribing where it shall be posted on the claim or at all. As we have already seen, the practice is as suggested by appellants, but the essential things are the discovery and the "marking of the location upon the ground so that the boundaries may be readily traced." And it is conceded that the discoverer has a reasonable time in which to so mark the location.

The claim of appellants, on the other hand, rests upon the discovery and the posting of a notice on the second day of August and the marking of the boundaries on a date subsequent to that of respondents. The location notice posted by appellants the second day of August and recorded on the first day of September was in the following form:

"Location Notice.

"Notice is hereby given, that we, undersigned citizens, having complied with the laws of the United States and local laws, have located and claim 1,500 feet in a northwesterly and southeasterly direction, and 300 feet on each side of this location monument. This monument is the beginning point of this claim. This claim shall be known as the White Quartz. Located the 22nd day of August, 1905."

It is admitted by appellants that their location notices did not sufficiently mark the boundaries of the claim, but their contention is "that location notices are sufficient to hold mining claims for a reasonable time in which to mark the boundaries." Ordinarily that is true, because the notice is evidence of an original discovery, or else the mining customs or rules require the posting of such notice. But here we have a prior discovery on the part of respondents and a prior marking of the boundaries. The discovery is manifestly the source of the title, and vests the discoverer with the prior right to complete his location. He could only lose this prior right to perfect his claim by a failure within a reasonable time to mark his location so that the boundaries could be traced upon the ground. But respondents not only proceeded within a reasonable time to perform this ultimate act, but before appellants made any effort to mark said boundaries.

The mistake of appellants is in the contention that the prior discovery must be accompanied by a prior posting of notice in order to vest the claimant with the prior right to complete his location. "But the mining law of the United States," as held in Anderson v. Caughey, 3 Cal. App. 26, 84 Pac. 224, "does not require the notice of location to be posted or recorded (Carter v. Bacigalupi, 83 Cal. 187 [23 Pac. 361]; Dwinnell v. Dyer, 145 Cal. 12 [78 Pac. 247, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 763]); and it is only where the local customs and rules of the miners of the district require these steps that they are necessary."

It is the contention also of appellants that Fisher and his successors in interest fell short of satisfying the condition of continued ownership by reason of failure to do the improvement work required by the statute. There is testimony, though, to support the finding of the court in that respect. C. E. McCleary testified that about $2,000 worth of work was done in 1906 and $100 worth in 1907. William A. Schauers also testified that something over $100 worth was done in 1907. This places the finding of the court beyond our reach. Miller v. Scoble, 8 Cal. App. 344, 97 Pac. 93.

We think there is no merit in the contention that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained on the ground of the nonjoinder of the owner of the other one-fourth of the mine; the plaintiffs claiming to own only three-fourths. Section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes the owner of any interest in real property to bring an action to quiet his title against any one claiming adversely to him. He is not required to join the owner of any other interest in the suit. The rule is that tenants in common may but need not join as plaintiffs. 17 Ency. of Plead. & Prac. p. 319.

We have endeavored to consider fully, but without unnecessary elaboration, all the points made in the interesting brief of appellants, but we can see no reason to interfere with the conclusion of the learned trial judge, and the judgment and the order are affirmed.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action to quiet title under the McEnerney act. Walter A. and J. W. Barry appeared as defendants and answered. Judgment passed for plaintiff. In their answer they attack the validity of the deed under which plaintiff claimed title, upon the ground that its execution had been procured through undue influence, and that it was given without consideration. No evidence to sustain these contentions was offered at the trial, and it appeared, further, that this was not the only nor yet the principal source of plaintiff's title. Upon this appeal the appellants make the point, for the first time, that the deed to which reference has been made is void as an attempt to create an estate to commence in futuro. This is the sole proposition urged, and the only case from this state offered in support of it is that of Hawes v. Stebbins, 49 Cal. 369. Hawes v. Stebbins, as the slightest inspection of the case will disclose, grew out of facts and conditions existing prior to the adoption of the code provisions changing the rule, and its decision was governed by the well-recognized common-law rule resting for its origin in delivery of seisin. That rule has long since been abrogated in this state. Indeed, it was abrogated at the time Hawes v. Stebbins was decided, and reference in the opinion in that case is made to the fact in the following language: "The remedy, if one be needed, should be provided by statute, for it would then be prospective in its operation, and it has, in fact, been furnished by section 767 of the Civil Code." Section 767 of the Civil Code provides in terms that "a future estate may be limited by the act of the party to commence in possession at a future day, either without the intervention of a precedent estate or on the termination, by lapse of time or otherwise, of a precedent estate created at the same time." See, also, section 773, Civ. Code. In Blakeman v. Miller, 136 Cal. 138, 68 Pac. 587, 89 Am. St. Rep. 120, it is said: "The technical rule against the creation of future estates applied only to legal estates, and even as to them is now abolished." It is thus manifest that this appeal is frivolous, that the untenableness of appellants' position was demonstrated before their eyes in the one and only case from this state which they cite as authority. The conviction is irresistible that the appeal was taken only for the purpose of vexing respondent and clouding his title.

The judgment herein not being a money judgment, there is no accumulated interest to compensate for the delay. It is therefore adjudged that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, with a penalty against appellants in favor of plaintiff of $100 for taking and prosecuting a frivolous appeal.

ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO. v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (L. A. 2,431.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1910.)

1. TAXATION (§ 317*)—RAILROADS—LOCAL ASSESSMENTS — "ROADWAY" — "RIGHT OF WAY."

Railroad property within a city, consisting of parcels contiguous to the 30-foot continuous right of way and within a part of the 9-rod right of way permitted to railroads by Civ. Code, § 465, subd. 4, and used for freight and passenger depots, for local business, and for spur tracks necessary for the depots, and for a fruit packing house with a spur track for convenient use, and for a park and for tracks used for the storage of tools, is not a part of the right of way within Const. art. 13, § 10, providing that the franchise roadway, roadbed, and rails of railroads operated in more than one county shall be assessed by the State Board of Equalization, and is properly assessed by the city assessor; the word "roadway" being synonymous with the phrase "right of way," which includes the continuous strip of land permitted by law on which to construct the roadbed and lay the tracks.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6230–6234; vol. 8, pp. 7790–7791; vol. 7, p. 6257.]

2. TAXATION (§ 317*)—RAILROADS—LOCAL ASSESSMENTS.

The assessment by the State Board of Equalization, authorized by Const. art. 13, § 10, providing that the franchise, roadway, roadbed, and rails and the rolling stock of railroads, operating in more than one county, shall be assessed by the State Board of Equalization, is an exception to the general rule requiring all property to be assessed locally, and all railroad property must be assessed locally unless it comes within the category of franchise, roadbed, rails, or rolling stock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

3. TAXATION (§ 317*)—RAILROADS—"RAILS."

The word "rails" in Const. art. 13, § 10, providing that the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock of railroads operating in more than one county shall be assessed by the State Board of Equalization, does not include spur tracks and switches, though on the actual roadway.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

4. TAXATION (§ 317*) — RAILROADS — ASSESSMENTS.

A city assessor assessing railroad property cannot by any act estop the city from claiming that the property is properly assessed by the local assessor, notwithstanding Const. art. 13, § 10, relating to the assessment of enumerated railroad property by the State Board of Equalization.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

5. TAXATION (§ 317*) — RAILROADS — ASSESSMENTS.

The description by an assessor of a city assessing spur tracks of a railroad as on the "nine-rod right of way" does not estop the city from asserting that the property is properly assessed by the local assessor, notwithstanding Const. art. 13, § 10, even if the assessor could estop the city.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

E. W. Camp, U. T. Clotfelter, and A. H. Van Cott, for appellant. J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty. and Hartley Shaw, Asst. Dist. Atty., for respondent.

MELVIN, J. The action was to recover from the county of Los Angeles taxes paid by plaintiff under protest. Appellant's contention is that the taxes were illegally levied, assessed, and collected; its argument in this regard being that all the property locally assessed is within the purview of section 10, art. 13, Const., a part of "the franchise, roadway, roadbed, and rails" of a railroad operated in more than one county in the state, and was therefore assessable by the State Board of Equalization. Further that all of this property was situated within or upon and was a part of the nine-rod right of way permitted to railroads. Section 465, subd. 4, Civ. Code.

The complaint charged in separate counts. The first touched the assessment of certain pieces of real estate claimed to be a part of the nine-rod right of way. Generally speaking, the contention is not that the railroad owned a continuous right of way 9 rods wide, the fact being that its roadway was but 30 feet wide, but that the lands were contiguous to the 30-foot strip and within the limits of 9 rods, and should thus be held to be within the 9-rod right of way contemplated by the statute. As to these parcels of land, the court found that upon one the plaintiff maintained a freight depot for the accommodation of its local business in the city of Pasadena, together with certain spur tracks necessary for the depot; that upon the second there stood a fruit packing house having a spur track for its convenient use, upon the third the plaintiff maintained a passenger depot for the accommodation of its local business in the city of Pasadena, and a small park consisting of grass, flower beds, and shrubs; that upon the fourth plaintiff maintained a freight depot for the purpose of handling freight to and from the city of Pasadena, upon the fifth a passenger depot for the accommodation of local travel in the city of Pasadena; and that the sixth parcel contained no tracks or other improvements and was used solely for the storage of tools for use upon the railroad. A second cause of action bore specific relation to side tracks, switches, spurs, and passing tracks upon the nine-rod right of way, while the third cause of action dealt with side tracks or spur tracks not within the nine-rod right of way. As to all these the court found in effect that they were not a part of the right of way, roadbed, or rails of the main line, but were used for local purposes, and so upheld the assessment of the county assessor.

Plaintiff's contention to the effect that because the law permits it a nine-rod right of way all of its lands within such boundary must be considered as part of its right of way is erroneous. Plaintiff's right of way in this instance happened to be a continuous strip but 30 feet wide with here and there added lands contiguous to this strip. These added lands did not form part of the "right of way." As said in San Francisco & San Joaquin Valley R. R. Co. v. City of Stockton, 149 Cal. 83, 84 Pac. 771, "roadway" is synonymous with "right of way." "The only remaining class of property named in the constitutional provision is 'roadway.' * * * This court has said that it is synonymous with 'right of way' and includes 'whatever space of ground the company is allowed by law in which to construct its roadbed and lay its track' (S. F. v. C. P. R. R., supra [63 Cal. 467, 49 Am. Rep. 98]), which is but another way of saying that it is the continuous strip of land, not exceeding in width the nine rods permitted by law (Civ. Code, § 465, subd. 4), which the company acquires and uses for the construction and maintenance of its roadbed and railroad track. Said strip is, of course, ordinarily wider than the actual roadbed, and portions thereof are often used at points along the line for other than roadbed purposes, but, as long as all improvements thereon other than roadbed and rails are locally assessed, the property remaining for assessment by the state board, although it may have originally cost more in one place than in another, is, considering its use for railroad purposes, substantially of the same value the whole length of the road."

The cases which appellant cites in support of its contention arose over questions between the companies and landowners in relation to the width of the right of way which the companies had acquired by condemnation or grant, and it was held under the circumstances in each case that, no limitation upon the width of the right of way appearing, it would be presumed that it extended to the full width permitted by statute. These cases are clearly inapplicable to a question of the relative and respective powers of the State Board of Equalization and of county assessors to assess railroad property. The question has recently received elaborate consideration from this court in the case last above cited. It is in that case pointed out that the question as to which is the proper body or person to assess depends entirely upon the language of the Constitution, that the assessment by the board of equalization is an exception to the general rule requiring all property to be assessed locally, and that it matters not, therefore, how convenient, how useful, or, indeed, how necessary, to the functions of an operating railroad any particular property may be, it is to be locally assessed unless it comes within the category of franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, or rolling stock. Within the general term "rails" will not be included spur tracks and switches, even upon the actual roadway. "Under this construction of our constitutional provision, we have two general classes of railroad property for purposes of assessment, made entirely regardless of the question as to the necessity of the use of the property for the purposes of the railroad. One contains only such property as may fairly be said to be substantially the same both in quantity and value, the whole length of the road, while in the other is all such property as may fairly be considered purely local." The fact that the assessor in his description of the property in some instances assessed the sidetracks as being on the "nine-rod right of way" cannot, of course, be regarded as any admission or estoppel against the city. The assessor would have no power to make such an admission or to raise such an estoppel in the first place, and, in the second place, the language is language of description merely, and would not be held to create an estoppel even if an estoppel might thus be raised.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

KRELING et al. v. McMULLEN et al.

(S. F. 5,122.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1910.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 934*) — Default Judgment—Presumptions.

The court on appeal from a default judgment will make all reasonable presumptions in favor of the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3778; Dec. Dig. § 934.*]

2. Pledges (§ 58*)—Foreclosure.

Though a note and chattel mortgage securing it are but collateral security for the performance of the conditions of a lease by the mortgagee to the mortgagor, the holder of the principal obligation may foreclose the pledge without action on the principal obligation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pledges, Cent. Dig. § 186; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

3. Appeal and Error (§ 934*) — Presumptions—Default Judgment.

A default judgment foreclosing a chattel mortgage securing a note will not be disturbed on appeal on the ground that the complaint alleging an assignment of the note and mortgage to plaintiff shows that the note and mortgage were given as collateral security for the performance of the terms of a lease from mortgagee to mortgagor, and that the pledgee could not sell any evidence of debt so pledged, where the complaint contains no allegation negativing the presumption that the action is brought by the owner of the principal obligation, but defendant, desiring to show that plaintiff is not the owner of the principal obligation, must do so by answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 934.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Joseph W. Patton, for appellants. De Laveaga & Magee, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. The complaint alleged the making of a promissory note to the firm of Smith & Stevens payable in monthly installments; that the note was secured by a chattel mortgage upon certain property consisting of furniture, carpets, pictures, and other household effects; that the firm of Smith & Stevens duly sold and assigned the said note with the said mortgage to plaintiffs; and that plaintiffs thereupon became and ever since have been the owners and holders thereof. A copy of the mortgage is attached to the complaint and made a part of it. A breach of the contract entitling plaintiffs to foreclose is alleged, and the prayer is for foreclosure under the terms of the mortgage. The mortgagor, Victor McMullen, defaulted. She now appeals from the judgment, contending that the complaint establishes that the note and mortgage were given as collateral security for the performance of all the terms and conditions of a certain indenture of lease made between Smith & Stevens, lessors, and herself, lessee; that the pledgee cannot sell any evidence of debt of this kind so pledged to him; and that his only recourse in law is to collect it when due (Civ. Code, § 3006); that the complaint here establishes an attempt upon the part of the pledgee to do this forbidden thing; that it also establishes the asserted fact that the note and mortgage were given in pledge as collateral security; that the plaintiffs were not the owners or holders of the principal obligation; and that, finally, these purchasers cannot be regarded as innocent, since the mortgage which they took for the promissory note upon its face discloses that it was given as collateral security for another independent principal obligation.

The propositions of law which appellant thus enunciates are unquestionably sound, but they cannot avail her in view of the fact that this is an appeal from the judgment after default, and that it is the duty of the court under such circumstances to indulge in all reasonable presumptions and intendments in favor of the judgment. The cases upon this are so numerous and so uniform that it should be sufficient to cite Caruthers v. Hensley, 90 Cal. 560, 27 Pac. 411, and Cockrill v. Clyma, 98 Cal. 123, 32 Pac. 888. The action was in due form for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage. If, as appellant contends, the promissory note and the chattel mortgage here in suit were but collateral security, nevertheless it was the right of the holder of the principal obligation to foreclose the pledge, and this he could do without action upon the principal obligation. Merced Bank v. Casaccia, 103 Cal. 644, 37 Pac. 648; Fernandez v. Tormey, 121 Cal. 520, 53 Pac. 1119; Farmers' Bank v. Copsey, 134 Cal. 289, 66 Pac. 324. Therefore this action could have been appropriately brought by the owner of the principal obligation in its present form and under the principle of law which will support such judgments by all reasonable intendments it will be presumed, if necessary, that it was brought by the holder of the principal obligation. Distinctly, while the complaint might have been subject to demurrer for uncertainty upon this proposition, it contains no allegation which negatives, and therefore forbids the indulgence in this presumption. In the state of the pleadings had defendant desired to show that plaintiffs were not the owners of the principal obligation she would have been compelled to do so as matter of defense by answer. This she did not do.

Action by C. E. Norton and another, partners as Norton & Kennedy, against Charles N. Bassett and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Tanner, Taft & Odell and W. R. Bacon, for appellants. Flint Barker, Barker & Bowen, and Gray, Barker & Bowen, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. On a former appeal in this case (Norton v. Bassett, 154 Cal. 411, 97 Pac. 894) it was held that the statute of limitations barred the prosecution of this action by the beneficiaries out of possession. The facts will be found fully stated in the opinion handed down in that case. After this decision, plaintiffs undertook in the trial court to change their complaint so as to obviate the difficulty and remove the bar of the statute by amendments to the following effect: "That said plaintiffs have been in possession of said lands from the time the same were purchased as aforesaid up to the date of bringing this suit. * * * That said Charles N. Bassett, defendant, and said F. M. Kelsey, administrator, and said B. A. Nebeker, guardian, as aforesaid, each had actual notice of said interest and claim of plaintiffs in and to the premises mentioned in this complaint, and to the moneys arising from the profits thereof and the sale of lots, and had actual notice of the possession by said plaintiffs of said premises, and having notice it was expressly agreed that the plaintiffs should continue to act as the selling agents for said premises, and from sales of lots the proceeds should be paid over to said F. M. Kelsey, administrator, during the time that he was administering said estate, and to the guardian, B. A. Nebeker, during the time that the said Charles N. Bassett was a minor, to be applied as originally agreed between the said O. T. Bassett and plaintiffs and said Si Roll and at all times the said administrator and the said guardian and the said Charles N. Bassett admitted and recognized the claims and possession of said plaintiffs until the time when the said Charles N. Bassett arrived at the age of 21 years." Upon objection of defendants the superior court, with the record of the trial before it, refused plaintiffs leave to amend in these particulars, and entered judgment against them and in favor of defendants.

Upon this appeal plaintiffs insist that they were entitled of right absolute to amend, and, if such was not their absolute right, it was an abuse of the discretion of the court to refuse its permission to them to do so. In the matter of amending pleadings, this court has always counseled and sanctioned great liberality. No discussion upon so plain a proposition is necessary. Thus in People v. Mt. Shasta Co., 107 Cal. 258, 40 Pac. 391, it is said: "The court refused to allow the plaintiff to amend the complaint. This is generally a matter of absolute right, and, when it is refused, the court must be able to say that the complaint cannot be so amended as to state a good cause of action." See, also, Crosby v. Clark, 132 Cal. 8, 63 Pac. 1022. But, while such is the undoubted rule, there is always in the granting or refusing to grant leave to amend the exercise of the discretion of the trial court. Brittan v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 124 Cal. 291, 57 Pac. 84, 71 Am. St. Rep. 58; Bank of Woodland v. Heron, 122 Cal. 107, 54 Pac. 537. Speaking generally, it may be said that the test as to whether or not the court has abused its discretion will depend upon whether the amendment is a permissible amendment which will perfect a cause of action otherwise imperfectly pleaded. In this case the court had tried the action, had taken all of the evidence of all of the parties, from which evidence it was satisfied that plaintiffs were not in possession of the land, and could not prove such fact upon a new trial without gross stultification of the evidence which they had formerly given. In its findings upon the former trial the court declared: "It is true that the plaintiffs did not, nor did either of them, during the course of administration of the estate of O. T. Bassett assert or attempt to establish in the said proceeding any right to the possession of the said land or any part thereof." The amendment was offered nearly six years after the action was begun, after it had been prosecuted and tried upon an entirely different theory, and after all the evidence touching possession was before the trial court. Satisfied, as that court was, that this evidence did not and could not be held to establish possession in the plaintiffs, it was not only no abuse of discretion, but it was the duty of the court to refuse to allow amendments which would effectuate only a protraction of the litigation without changing the result. The argument that the title held by O. T. Bassett, deceased, will be regarded as a mere mortgage which has been paid in full, and that this action will therefore be treated as an action to redeem, is untenable. Whatever may have been the relation between the parties, however much the deed to Bassett may have partaken of the characteristics of a mortgage, it was, and was by the court found to be, a deed conveying to him the legal title, and the failure of the plaintiffs to prosecute their cause of action against the involuntary trustee, after the death of Bassett, results in perfecting that legal title.

WILSON et al. v. CITY OF ALHAMBRA et al. (L. A. 2,469.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1910.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 661*)—HIGHWAYS AND PUBLIC ROADS—POWERS OF THE CITY.

A city may make reasonable regulations in controlling the connection of private ways with public roads, but their powers stop there.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1435; Dec. Dig. § 661.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 651*)—ORDINANCE—VALIDITY—STREETS.

An ordinance prohibiting a private person from extending a street, which was 40 feet wide, through his property, unless such extension was made 50 feet wide, was unreasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 651.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 651*)—SUIT TO ENJOIN ENFORCEMENT OF ORDINANCE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

A contention by the city that a street 40 feet wide would be dangerous in case of fire and a nuisance was without merit, for in that case all the other 40-foot streets in the city could be declared nuisances.

4. INJUNCTION (§ 85*)—CITY ORDINANCE.

Where an unreasonable ordinance was enacted prohibiting a private person from extending a public road through his property unless it was made of a certain width, injunction against its enforcement was the proper remedy.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Suit by Warren Wilson and another against the City of Alhambra and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

HENSHAW, J. The action is for injunction. The facts are that Dos Robles street in the city of Alhambra is a street 40 feet wide, ending at the property line of plaintiff Wilson, who was the owner of a 6-acre tract of land. Wilson desired to extend Dos Robles street through his property, joining Dos Robles street with Alhambra road, another public way of the city running at right angles with the line of Dos Robles street extended; his purpose being to subdivide his property and sell building lots along the frontage of his proposed Dos Robles street extension. Wilson employed the city engineer of the city of Alhambra to draw plans and specifications for the construction of this street or way through his property, in conformity with all the regulations and requirements of the ordinances of the city of Alhambra. The work contemplated cement sidewalks, cement curbing, and gutters, as well as the construction of the driveway proper. The city engineer drew up the plans and specifications in accordance with the requirements of the city ordinances, and Wilson let his contract for the construction of the work. Being in ignorance of the existence of an ordinance of the city exacting permission for the doing of such work before operations were begun, they proceeded with it without obtaining such permit, and Wilson and the contractor were arrested and proceeded against criminally for the violation of this ordinance. Thereupon Wilson and his contractor made application to the proper authorities of the city of Alhambra for permit to do the work, offering to pay any moneys required, and to file an undertaking in any penal sum exacted. Their request was arbitrarily refused for no other assigned reason than that they had begun the work without first requesting a permit. They then undertook the further prosecution of the work and to make connection with Alhambra road, when the city of Alhambra adopted a new ordinance, No. 281, making it unlawful for any person "to establish, open, make, build, construct, maintain, lay out or adopt any private way, private drive, private street or other private street to be used for street and highway purposes in the city of Alhambra less than fifty feet in width." Wilson and his contractor were arrested for a violation of this ordinance because the street which they projected and were in the process of constructing over Wilson's private property was but 40 feet in width. Dos Robles street, a public street of the city of Alhambra, an extension of which in effect Wilson undertook to build through his property, was itself but 40 feet wide, and so were other public streets of the city. The court adopted the view that the ordinance was unreasonable, was an unwarranted interference with the rights of private property, and granted the injunction restraining the city of Alhambra from enforcing the ordinance against plaintiff.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The conclusion which the court reached we think was not only eminently just, but the only one permissible under the showing made. The power of the city to legislate and to pass reasonable regulations touching this subject-matter is, of course, not questioned. Nor need we be at pains to consider the distinctions which may be thought to exist between public highways and private ways publicly used. Section 2620 of the Political Code provides that the width of all public highways, except bridges, alleys, and lanes, and trails, shall be at least 40 feet, and the width of all private highways and by-roads, except bridges, shall be at least 20 feet. Whether plaintiff Wilson designed to construct a private way, used of right by the owners to whom he might sell his land, and through their license by others coming upon their lands, or whether, in effect, by use the street would become in time a public highway, are considerations quite immaterial to this determination. Plaintiff was unquestionably entitled to access and to a right of way to and from Alhambra road. The city had the right to control plaintiff by reasonable regulations in the work that he might do to make this right of way available, in other words, in making the connection between his private way and the public road. But further than this its powers did not extend. A man's right of access to a public highway may not be embarrassed, much less prohibited, by an unreasonable ordinance prescribing the width of such approach. And from another aspect the unreasonableness of this ordinance is made apparent, in that it requires plaintiff to construct a road wider than the city's own public street, of which the private way would, at the most, be but an extension. The court did not err in refusing to admit testimony proffered by defendant which it is asserted would show that a 40-foot street with a 24-foot roadway, such as this, "is dangerous to the public in case of fire, accidents, and travel," and could therefore be forbidden or abated as a nuisance. The subject is not one of expert testimony. Common knowledge establishes the contrary, and the contention, if sustained, would be to declare all other 40-foot streets in the city of Alhambra public nuisances, in accordance with section 2 of the ordinance in question. The findings are abundantly supported by the evidence, and the conclusions of law follow legally and logically therefrom. Plaintiff's remedy by injunction was proper. The case is not parallel with Mutual Elec. Light Co. v. Ashworth, 118 Cal. 1, 50 Pac. 10. There permit was refused by the street superintendent, and it was said that the remedy was by mandamus to compel the issuance of the permit in a proper case. Here no question of permit is involved. The city stands upon the sufficiency of its ordinance which forbids construction of the road under any circumstances whatsoever.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

2. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 63*)—PROCEEDINGS FOR DISTRIBUTION—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

A widow is entitled to the whole of her deceased husband's estate under Code Civ. Proc. § 1469, only when she is a member of his family at his death so as to be entitled to demand support of him, so that, on a widow's application for the whole of the estate under the statute, evidence was admissible to show that she had abandoned decedent before his death; Civ. Code, § 175, providing that a husband unjustifiably abandoned by his wife is not liable for her support until she offers to return.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of James W. Miller, deceased. From a decree made upon the widow's application to have the estate decreed to her, an appeal was taken. Reversed, and application remanded for new hearing.

T. J. Weldon and W. D. L. Held, for appellant. Mannon & Mannon, for respondent. Arthur J. Thatcher, in pro. per.

HENSHAW, J. James W. Miller died testate. The inventory and appraisement showed the value of his estate to be less than $1,500. His widow applied to the court for an order and decree vesting the whole estate in her under the provisions of section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Her application was contested by a legatee under the will, appellant herein. The will was offered in evidence upon the hearing. The will contained the following declaration: "As my said wife Jennie W. Miller has refused and neglected to live with me as a wife for several years last past and has totally abandoned me, I give and bequeath to her the sum of five dollars and no more." Certain evidence was offered and certain questions propounded designed to establish the fact indicated in the declaration in the will. To all of this objections were made and sustained. The formal proposition presented for determination is the correctness of the court's ruling in this regard. But, underlying this, the essential questions are, first, does the testamentary power conferred by section 1270 of the Civil Code control the provisions of section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or is section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure a controlling limitation upon the general power of testamentary disposition; second, is a widow by virtue of her widowhood alone entitled to distribution under section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or must she, to be so entitled, have been of the family of the deceased at the time of his death?

1. Upon the first proposition we entertain no doubt but that section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure controls the general power of testamentary disposition conferred by section 1270 of the Civil Code. It was so declared in Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 627, 653, 41 Pac. 772, 778, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97, in the following language: "The Code provisions making disposition of the homesteads and of estates in value less than fifteen hundred dollars are instances of the limitations put by the Legislature upon the free power of testamentary disposition." While in strictness this language in the Walkerly Case is obiter dictum, its construction of the statutes in this regard is clearly just and sound. The law, careful always of the rights of the family, by section 1469 shows a tender regard for it when the bread winner is taken by death, leaving but a small estate for the support of those dependent upon him; and so it has with wisdom and humanity decreed that under such circumstances the husband and father may not will it away from the family, but that it shall go to them expeditiously and without delay in administration.

2. Section 1469 is found in chapter 5, art. 1, Code Civ. Proc., under the specific title of "Provision for the support of the family." The word "family" as thus used has received at the hands of this court exact definition—a definition narrower than that which Woerner gives (1 Woerner, Am. Law of Admin. [2d Ed.] § 88), but none the less a just and reasonable definition under our law. In Re Noah, 73 Cal. 588, 15 Pac. 290, 2 Am. St. Rep. 829, this court quotes with approval the following: "It is an allowance made to the family. * * * I think that the statute was intended to embrace those who were the immediate family of the deceased; those who were by law entitled up to his death to look to him for support and protection. * * * Yet any person to be entitled to an allowance out of the estate must have been in receipt of, or in law entitled to demand of deceased, maintenance before his death. In re Byrne's Estate, Myr. Prob. 1." Section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows: "If upon the return of the inventory of the estate of the deceased person it shall appear therefrom that the value of the whole estate does not exceed the sum of $1,500, and if there be a widow or minor children of the deceased the court or a judge thereof shall by order require all persons interested to appear on a day fixed to show cause why the whole of said estate should not be assigned for the use and support of the family of the deceased. * * * If upon the hearing the court finds that the value of the estate does not exceed the sum of $1,500, it shall by a decree for that purpose assign to the widow of the deceased, if there be a widow, and, if no widow, then to the minor children of the deceased, if there be minor children, the whole of the estate." It will thus be noted that this section is not only found under the subtitle of "Provision for the support of the family," but itself declares that, where the estate is apparently of less value than $1,500, notice shall be given to show cause "why the whole of said estate should not be assigned for the use and support of the family of the deceased." When provision is made that the estate shall be assigned to the widow, if there be a widow and no minor children, it is manifest from the context and from the title to the chapter that it means that it shall be assigned to the widow, when she thus constitutes the family of the deceased, and to her and the minor children when together they constitute the family of the deceased. Thus it is said in Estate of Neff, 139 Cal. 71, 72 Pac. 632: "Taking all the Code sections together, and considering the regard which the law has for the interests of the family, it was clearly the intention of the Legislature that small estates under $1,500 shall go immediately to the family without further administration." And it is declared in Phelan v. Smith, 100 Cal. 158, 34 Pac. 667, that, where a decree sets apart a homestead for "the use of the family of the deceased" without mentioning the widow and children, it will be construed as using the term "family" in the sense of the statute providing for homesteads, to denote the surviving wife and children.

While the precise question whether a widow who was not at the time of her husband's death a member or part of his family is entitled to distribution under section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure has never arisen in this state, nevertheless, under similar statutes pertaining to the homestead and in other states under like statutes making provision for the maintenance or support of the family, the rule of decision has been uniform that the widow, to take, must come within the definition of "family," must have been a member thereof, or at least must, without fault of her own, have been entitled to maintenance and support from the husband during his lifetime. Thus in Wickersham v. Comerford, 96 Cal. 433, 31 Pac. 358, it was held that a wife separated from her husband by agreement of separation whereunder each spouse surrendered his or her claims upon the other for support or sustenance ceased to be a member of his family, and was therefore not entitled to family allowance under sections 1465, 1466, and 1468 of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor to a homestead, even for a limited period; the court in this connection saying: "And since I think the setting apart of a homestead by the court from the separate property of the husband, as required by section 1465, 'for the use of the surviving * * * wife * * * and the minor children, or * * * for the use of the minor children,' means the setting of it apart for the temporary use of the family in the sense in which the word 'family' is used in sections 1466 and 1468, it follows that the surviving wife is not entitled to such homestead unless she had been a member of her husband's family immediately before and at the time of his death." And in Re Noah, 73 Cal. 583, 15 Pac. 287, 2 Am. St. Rep. 829, where the wife had voluntarily separated from her husband, and, in consideration of money paid to her had waived all her marital claims, had continued to live apart from her husband without any attempt to set aside the agreement or to assume again their marital relations, or to demand from him further support, it was ruled that she had ceased to be a member of his family, and upon the husband's death was not entitled to a family allowance under sections 1465 and 1466 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In other jurisdictions the rule of decision is so uniform that it is embodied in the following declaration in 18 Cyc. 393: "The special allowance to a widow is usually denied where she was not living in a family relation with her husband at the time of his death unless her separation was involuntary and through no fault of hers or was based upon reasons constituting a sufficient ground for divorce." See, also, Linton v. Crosby, 56 Iowa, 386, 9 N. W. 311, 41 Am. Rep. 107; Booth Mercantile Co. v. Murphy, 14 Idaho, 212, 93 Pac. 777; Hettrick v. Hettrick, 55 Pa. 290; Goss v. Harris, 117 Ga. 345, 43 S. E. 734.

Under the views thus expressed, namely, that the widow is entitled to distribution under 1469 only when she is a member of the family of the deceased—that is to say, when she has been in the receipt of or in law entitled to demand of the deceased a maintenance before his death—it necessarily follows that the determination of the status of the widow in this regard, when her membership in the family is called in question, is always both pertinent and indeed necessary. Section 175 of the Civil Code declares that "a husband abandoned by his wife is not liable for her support until she offers to return, unless she was justified by his misconduct in abandoning him, nor is he liable for her support when she is living separate from him by agreement, unless such support is stipulated in the agreement."

It follows, therefore, that the evidence sought to be introduced by appellant, tending to determine the status of the widow as a member of the deceased's family, was improperly rejected, and for this reason the decree appealed from is reversed and the petition for distribution to the widow remanded for a new hearing, in accordance with the views herein expressed.

BOSE v. BOSE. (S. F. 5,401.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1910.)

1. Husband and Wife (§ 283*)—Right to Support—Abandonment by Wife.

Respondent married decedent after an acquaintanceship of two weeks, but they decided that they could not get along and separated a week after they were married without making any provision as to property rights, and they did not afterwards communicate with each other, though respondent tried to communicate with him by letter. Held, that the husband was not liable for respondent's support, she having lived apart from him by agreement; Civ. Code, § 175, providing that a husband unjustifiably abandoned by his wife is not liable for her support until she offers to return.

2. Executors and Administrators (§ 180*)—Allowance to Widow—Entire Estate—"Family."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1469, providing that if the inventory of an estate shows that it does not exceed $1,500, and if there be a widow or minor children, the court shall require all persons interested to show cause why the whole estate should not be assigned to the use of decedent's family, and, if the court finds that its value does not exceed $1,500, it shall assign the whole estate to the widow, if there be such, and, if not, to the minor children, a widow who is living apart from her husband at his death so as not to be entitled to support from him, is not a member of his family, so as to be entitled to the whole of the estate.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Friedrich Bose, also known as Johann Friedrich Bose, deceased. From a decree distributing the estate to decedent's widow, Bertha Bose appeals. Reversed, with directions to deny petition for distribution.

Bishop, Hoefler, Cook & Harwood, for appellant. Edwin J. Hanson, Cullinan & Hickey, and John J. O'Toole, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The deceased died intestate. The court, having found that the estate was of less value than $1,500, entered its decree assigning all of the estate to the widow, there being no minor children. The appellant is the mother of deceased, and under the law of succession would be entitled to share in the estate equally with the widow. Section 1386, Civ. Code. She appeals upon the ground that section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which distribution was had to the widow, is designed exclusively to make provision for the maintenance and support of the family of the deceased, and that it was affirmatively shown that the widow in this instance was not a member of the family, she having voluntarily separated from the deceased two years before his death and within one week after her marriage to him. Section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure touching this matter has received interpretation and construction in the Estate of James W. Miller, Deceased (S. F. 5,332, this day filed) 111 Pac. 255. By the testimony of the widow herself it is shown that she married decedent on September 12, 1906, after an acquaintanceship of two weeks; that it was "a case of love at first sight on his side"; that they "could not get along very well; just decided that they could not get along"; that they separated one week after the marriage; nothing was said about property rights and that she "just went her way" and never heard from him again; never received anything from him. Although she afterward endeavored to communicate with him by letter, the letters did not reach him, and she made no other effort to locate him. If this does not establish an abandonment of the husband by the wife, it at least presents a case where the husband was not liable for the wife's support, she living separate from him by agreement, and no support having been stipulated in the agreement. Civ. Code, § 175. It is beyond question that the widow under such circumstances did not constitute a part nor was she a member of the husband's family.

Wherefore it was error to distribute to her the estate of deceased. The decree doing so is therefore reversed, with directions to the trial court to deny the widow's petition.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by Emma L. Merritt and another, executors of the will of Adolph Sutro, deceased, against C. J. Barta and others. From the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James F. Tevlin (P. F. Dunn, of counsel), for appellant Hotaling Estate Company. Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Adolphus E. Graupner, Asst. City Atty., for appellant City. Bradley & McKinstry, J. C. McKinstry, and Campbell, Metson & Campbell, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The complaint states a cause of action to recover possession of land alleged to belong to the estate of Adolph Sutro, deceased, and to quiet title thereto. The defendants answered, denying the title of the plaintiffs' testator. They also filed a cross-complaint, averring the execution by Adolph Sutro in his lifetime of a contract to sell the land to one Drummond, to whose rights defendants have succeeded, and asking specific performance thereof. Issue was joined on the cross-complaint, and the court proceeded first to the trial of these issues without a jury, and, after hearing the evidence of the defendants in support thereof, granted a nonsuit thereon in favor of the plaintiffs and a judgment of nonsuit was entered accordingly. Thereafter the issues formed by the complaint and the answer of the defendants thereto were tried by a jury, and the appeals are taken from the judgment thereon given against the defendants and from an order denying their motion for a new trial of those issues. The proceedings on the cross-complaint, the evidence taken in support thereof, and the judgment thereon are not presented for review. Under these circumstances, the cross-complaint and the proceedings thereon are entirely excluded from our consideration. The case must be decided precisely as it would be if no cross-complaint had been filed.

The alleged contract of Sutro and the defendants was not pleaded as an estoppel against the defendants; and hence, although it was set up in the cross-complaint, it is not before us for consideration, and we cannot determine whether or not the defendants would have been thereby estopped to deny the plaintiffs' title. The land in controversy is a small lot in the form of a trapezium situated in the city of San Francisco, and alleged to be bounded north by I street, east by Forty-Ninth avenue, south by J street, and west by the street known as the "Great Highway," fronting on the Pacific Ocean. It constitutes a part of what are known as "Outside Lands." Under the act of April 15, 1851 (St. 1851, p. 357, c. 84), the southern boundary of the city was a line parallel with Clay street located 2½ miles south of the center of Portsmouth square, and the western boundary was parallel with Kearny street and 2 miles west of the center of Portsmouth square. These "Outside Lands" were the lands situated west and south of the above-mentioned boundaries. Soon after its organization, the city of San Francisco laid claim to these and other lands as successor to the Mexican pueblo, and began proceedings for the confirmation of its title by the United States. Prior to this proceeding, and also while it was pending, many parcels of the land were sold by the city and pueblo to private persons who took possession under the purchases. When the lands were confirmed to the city by the final decree of the United States Circuit Court in 1865, that court, for the protection of the persons holding these parcels of land, inserted in the decree a clause declaring that the title of the city should be held in trust for the benefit of the lot holders under grant from the pueblo, town, or city of San Francisco. Cal. A. of S. v. San Francisco, 107 Cal. 338, 40 Pac. 427. For the further confirmation of title to the city and the lot holders, Congress passed the act of March 8, 1866, granting the lands known as the "Pueblo Lands" to the city upon the trust that as to any parcel in the bona fide actual possession of any person at the time of the passage of the act the city should convey the same to such person or his successors, "except such parcels thereof as may be reserved and set apart by ordinance of said city for public uses," and that, as to any residue of the land, it should be held "in trust for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of the city." See Baker v. Brickell, 87 Cal. 333, 25 Pac. 489, 1067; Cal. A. of S. v. San Francisco, supra; Home for Inebriates v. San Francisco, 119 Cal. 534, 51 Pac. 950.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

On January 14, 1868, a city ordinance known as "Order No. 800" was passed. At that time the city limits had been extended so as to include these "Outside Lands." This ordinance provided that a plan should be adopted for the subdivision of these lands into lots and blocks showing the streets, public highway, parks, and other portions set apart for public use, and that, when adopted, a map thereof should be made, and that the said parts so set apart and designated on said map as streets, highways, parks, etc., "shall be deemed absolutely dedicated as such." The ordinance was adopted as a statute by the Legislature by the act of March 27, 1868, and all proceedings under it then or thereafter had were thereby expressly declared to be ratified and affirmed. St. 1867-68, p. 379, c. 331. Section 9 of this statute provided that the land lying south of a line drawn east from Seal Rock and "west of a line easterly not less than two hundred feet from ordinary high water mark is hereby reserved and set apart for public use as a public highway." The map made in pursuance of this statute is known as the "Map of Outside Lands."

It is claimed by the appellants that, by virtue of the survey made under this statute and the aforesaid map thereof, the lands here involved were included in one of the streets of the city, designated thereon as "FORTY NINTH AVENUE," that they were thereby set apart and reserved for public use, and that they still remain of that character. It was shown by the plaintiffs that on October 18, 1877, a deed of conveyance was executed by the city to one Paul Rousset, purporting to convey to him the tract in controversy, and that Rousset had afterwards conveyed the same to the plaintiffs' testator, Adolph Sutro. If this deed to Rousset was valid and effectual to transfer the title to the lot, the defendants are without right thereto, and the plaintiffs properly prevailed in the suit. If, at the time that deed was made in 1877, the lot still remained a part of a public street of the city, dedicated by virtue of the act of the Legislature as Forty-Ninth avenue, the city had no power to alienate it and the plaintiffs' title would fail. The defendant C. J. Barta being in possession, he would in that case have the right to a judgment in his favor allowing him to retain the possession as against the plaintiffs, although not against the city. The question is thus presented whether or not this land was in fact reserved for public use as a street by the survey and map of "Outside Lands," and, if so, whether or not it remained dedicated to public use at the time of the execution of the city deed in 1877.

At the time of the first hearing and decision of this case in this court, we did not have access to the "Map of Outside Lands," or to any copy thereof. The transcript gives a mere diagram which does not purport to be a copy of that part of the map, or of any map, and it delineates only the part of Forty-Ninth avenue which includes the lot in controversy. The Map of Outside Lands was made under the authority of the statute of 1868 aforesaid, and it was expressly ratified and recognized as an official map by the act of March 14, 1870 (St. 1869-70, p. 353, c. 249), providing for the execution of deeds to persons who had had previous possession of the lots delineated thereon, being the act under which the deed to Rousset was made. The court will therefore take judicial notice of the map as a public document prepared and promulgated by the state. Diggins v. Hartshorne, 108 Cal. 158, 41 Pac. 283.

After the first decision of this case, a rehearing was granted. Upon further consideration upon that hearing, a resubmission was ordered and the parties were requested to file additional briefs upon the question whether or not the effect of the Map of Outside Lands and the survey and proceedings leading up to it was to dedicate the block in question as a part of Forty-Ninth avenue. The brief thereupon filed on behalf of the appellant contains extracts from the proceedings of the board of supervisors and from the report of the committee accompanying the Map of Outside Lands. It is claimed that these tend to show such dedication. Other extracts are given in the brief for the respondent to show the contrary. We have examined these extracts and also a copy of the Map of Outside Lands. We are satisfied that the land comprising the lot herein claimed by the plaintiffs was not reserved or set apart for public use by that map, either as a part of Forty-Ninth avenue, or as a part of the Great Highway. The map shows 48 streets running north and south, designated as avenues, numbered from 1 on the east to 48 on the west, and intersected by streets running east and west designated by the letters of the alphabet. The avenues appear to be of the uniform width of 70 feet. The intervening blocks are all numbered. Immediately west of Forty-Eighth avenue a tier of blocks is laid off and numbered, corresponding with the others in all respects. Along the space immediately west of this tier of blocks, in the same relative position as the names of the other avenues, and in capital letters of the same style and size, are written the words "FORTY NINTH AVENUE," occupying, as do the others, a space equal to the width of an avenue. There is, however, no line for the western boundary of Forty-Ninth avenue. The triangular space between the west line of the blocks and the line marked as the east line of the Great Highway is blank, except for the words denoting Forty-Ninth avenue. From a line extended due east from Seal Rock, running southerly from said line and parallel with the ocean front, at a distance indicated by the scale as 200 feet east of high-water mark, a red line is drawn, and along this 200-foot strip is written a statement that the land between the red line and the ocean is reserved as a "Great Highway." This line is not parallel with the lines of the above-mentioned avenues and blocks to the east thereof. The east and west street next south of the park is marked "H" street and the next streets, southerly, as "I" and "J" streets, respectively. The west line of the said westerly tier of blocks intersects the red line at a point between O and P streets, five blocks south of J street. From that point north, the west line of these blocks diverges easterly from the line of the Great Highway, so that at a point opposite Seal Rock the west line of the blocks is something more than three hundred feet east of the red line drawn as the easterly boundary of the Great Highway. This wedge shaped tract is not laid off into blocks and no streets are delineated as crossing it. It is not marked in any way, except by the words, "FORTY NINTH AVENUE," very close to the line of the blocks, as aforesaid. If this strip or wedge was intended to be set apart as a street, the curious and absurd result would be two streets adjoining each other, running in the same direction; that is, the Great Highway, 200 feet wide, and a wedge-shaped street, immediately adjoining it on the east, some 300 feet wide at the north end and tapering to a point 1½ miles to the south where its eastern line would enter the Great Highway. An inspection of the map convinces us that there was no such intention, and that, on the contrary, the irregular shaped tract was purposely left unsurveyed, or at least without subdivision into blocks, and that the purpose of entering therein the words "FORTY NINTH AVENUE" was to indicate that an avenue of the same width as the others was to be subsequently laid off, immediately west of the western tier of blocks, when the irregular tract should be thereafter actually subdivided.

Assuming that we may judicially notice and consider the record of the proceedings of the board and the report of the committee which the board adopted, which are not in the transcript, we find nothing in them to establish an intention to dedicate the wedge-shaped strip lying between the last tier of blocks and the Great Highway as a public street. There are some expressions therein which indicate an opposite intention. The report of the committee recommended "that, when the land will admit of a right-angled survey of blocks," the blocks should be laid out 600 feet northerly and southerly and 240 feet easterly and westerly, and that the east and west streets should be 80 feet wide and the north and south streets 70 feet wide. Nothing is said concerning the wedge-shaped strip lying next to the Great Highway, or concerning any street of irregular width. This is clearly inconsistent with the idea that there was to be an irregular street over 300 feet wide at the north end and tapering to a point at the south end. It is claimed that the insertion of the words "FORTY NINTH AVENUE," along the extreme eastern verge of this tract, necessarily shows that the entire strip should be an irregular street. This is contrary to the declaration, adopted in the report, that the north and south streets were to be 70 feet wide. There is no explanation of the laying out of such an irregular street as this would make, nor of the remarkable fact that it aligns the Great Highway. These declarations, in connection with the map, make it much more reasonable to conclude that the strip was left unplatted and that the words "FORTY NINTH AVENUE" which occupy the exact space of a street 70 feet wide, were put along the eastern edge of the strip, next to the western tier of blocks, to show that there was to be an avenue of that number, and of the same width as the others, abutting the western line of that tier of blocks.

Another consideration fortifies this conclusion. If the map does not show that the strip was purposely left as land not subdivided, it is at least ambiguous upon the question of its character. The act of March 27, 1868, adopting "Order No. 800," was not self-executing. It contemplated and required the subsequent adoption of a plan of subdivision of these Outside Lands and a survey and subdivision thereof according to such plan. The board was made the agent of the state to accomplish these things. No time was fixed within which it must be done. There was no declaration that the first attempt at subdivision was to be final and conclusive in all respects, or that errors in the map could not be corrected, or that the whole of the lands should be included in the first survey and map, or that, if a part of it was not subdivided by the first survey and map, the work could not be completed by a subsequent survey and map, covering the uncompleted tracts. If this part of the tract was not subdivided by the survey and map resulting in the Map of Outside Lands, the board retained power to complete it, and, if the map made was ambiguous, the board had power to clear up the uncertainty by a new or amended map. In 1870 another map, known as the "Humphrey's Map," was made by the board, which, if the "Outside Lands Map" is to be taken as ambiguous or incomplete, was, in effect, a correction or completion thereof in respect of this strip. It is also in the nature of an interpretation by conduct, and it indicates that it was then understood that the previous survey and map were not complete.

This Humphrey's map shows a line drawn as the west line of Forty-Ninth avenue, making it seventy feet wide, in conformity with the other avenues, and from this western line of that avenue all the east and west streets are marked thereon as extending into this wedge-shaped strip toward the Great Highway, thus indicating a subdivision of the strip into blocks of the same length north and south as the other blocks. The part of the strip which is here involved is exhibited thereon as a block bounded by the streets as heretofore stated. Evidently one of the purposes intended to be served by the making of this Humphrey's map was to extend the subdivision into this strip and to show the width of Forty-Ninth avenue. The following diagrams show the wedge-shaped strip and adjoining blocks as delineated on the Map of Outside Lands and the Humphrey's map, respectively, and illustrate what has been said on the subject:

* BLOCK IN CONTROVERSY

The act of March 14, 1870, under which the Rousset deed was made, provided for a petition and a hearing upon the question whether or not the lands for which a deed was sought had been set apart for public use by the survey and map made in pursuance of "Order No. 800" embodied in the statute of March 27, 1868, aforesaid, and for an adjudication that it was not so dedicated, before a deed could be made for the land. If it were so adjudicated, and the other conditions prescribed had been complied with and found to exist, the board of supervisors were directed to order the execution of a deed, and thereupon the mayor was directed to execute a deed in the name of the city to the applicant for the land awarded to him. The execution of the deed to Rousset, and the recitals contained therein, imply that the board of supervisors determined that the land had not been dedicated to public use, but was the property of Rousset, under the provisions of the act of 1868 aforesaid. And as the lot was not reserved for public use, but was mere proprietary land of the city, the deed would be conclusive upon the city as a transfer of its title, under the provisions of the act of March 14, 1870, even if the applicant was not in possession at the passage of the act of Congress of March 8, 1866.

It follows that the title of the plaintiffs is shown to be valid, and that, as the defendants have nothing but the naked possession, they must yield to the holder of the legal title. Having reached this conclusion upon these grounds, the question to which the original briefs are chiefly directed, whether the Humphrey's map is valid, whether it operated to vacate dedications to public use which appeared to have been made by the Outside Lands map, and whether the Humphrey's map was authorized, or has been recognized or ratified by the Legislature, are all immaterial to the decision of the case and need not be considered.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

BEATTY, C. J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Justice SHAW, and desire only to suggest a consideration, not therein adverted to, which, in my opinion, fortifies the conclusion that the broad space between the Great Highway and the east line of Forty-Ninth avenue never was irrevocably or absolutely dedicated as a street of San Francisco, and there is no claim that it was ever dedicated or reserved for any other public purpose. It was not within the power of the supervisors to make a dedication of any part of the Outside Lands in violation of the trust upon which they were committed to their disposal. The grant of those lands to the city was upon a trust for the benefit of those in bona fide possession on March 8, 1866, and the city was administering that trust under the authority and subject to the restrictions of the act of March 27, 1868, confirming Order 800, which contained these qualifying words (St. 1867-68, p. 383, c. 331): "No person in actual possession of any of the lands mentioned in the first section of said order on the said eighth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, and on which five years taxes shall have been paid, as provided in such order, shall be dispossessed of any of said lands under any order heretofore or hereafter made by said board of supervisors for the reservation of any of said lands for public uses, except for streets, until compensation shall have been actually made to such person, as provided in said order number eight hundred; and until such compensation shall have been made such person shall be allowed to continue in possession of such lands so possessed by them." Not only is the ratification of the order subject to this express qualification, but the ratification itself extends only to what is done in conformity to the order, and both the order and the confirmatory statute are so far subject to the trust which they assume to execute that the plan to be adopted for the subdivision of the Outside Lands into lots and blocks in pursuance of the first section of Order 800 was subject to the inherent condition that it must be reasonable and equitable in its relation to the beneficiaries of the trust, and that, when adopted, it should be impartially followed out in its application to the holdings of those in possession of the lands. Such a plan was adopted. It provided for reservations of large tracts for park and cemetery and for smaller reservations for other purposes, for all of which the persons dispossessed were to be compensated. It provided also for the Great Highway and for the subdivision of the unreserved portion of the Outside Lands into blocks divided by north and south streets 70 feet wide, and east and west streets 80 feet wide. The blocks were to be rectangular and 240 by 600 feet in dimensions where they could be so surveyed, but in irregular spaces like that between the diverging lines of Forty-Ninth avenue and the Great Highway there is the clearest implication that fractional blocks should still be laid out as large as the regular execution of the plan would leave them, or, in other words, that a bona fide occupant of such irregular spaces should not be wholly dispossessed of his holding without compensation merely because, after laying off the streets in regular and impartial execution of a fair and equitable plan, he would have left a block smaller than the full block. The plan required him to give up so much of his land as fell within the streets running at right angles and 70 and 80 feet wide. It did not require him to give up more, and his rights as a beneficiary of the trust forbade such an arbitrary departure from the plan as would compel him to do so.

As this case is presented on the record, we must assume that the lands between high tide and the east line of Forty-Ninth avenue and including the demanded premises were in the bona fide occupation of Rousset or his grantors on March 8, 1866. If so, the board of supervisors violated their trust in approving a map which attempted to dedicate as a street more of his land than the plan of subdivision called for, and, whether this was done purposely or by mistake, it was not only their right, but their duty, to rectify the wrong. This they appear to have done by the subsequent adoption of the Humphrey's map, and the conveyance of the lot; and this fact—that they only did in the end what it was their paramount duty to do in the beginning—that they merely transferred to the person rightfully entitled that to which the city never had a valid claim, distinguishes this case from Hoadly v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 265, and all other cases depending on the principle that property dedicated to a public use is inalienable.

CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 543, 1153*)—EVIDENCE—TESTIMONY ON PRELIMINARY HEARING—ABSENCE OF WITNESS FROM STATE.

Under Pen. Code, § 686, authorizing the reading on the trial of testimony of a witness at the preliminary examination, on its being satisfactorily shown to the court that he cannot with due diligence be found in the state, the question of such satisfactory showing is addressed to the trial court, so that its determination in favor thereof cannot be disturbed, where there was some substantial evidence to support the conclusion.

But one point is urged as ground for reversal. At the trial the prosecution was permitted, over the objection of defendant, to read in evidence, from a reporter's transcript, the testimony of R. L. Hamilton given at the preliminary examination of defendant. Hamilton, as a witness before the committing magistrate, had given material testimony corroborative of the charge made by the complainant Ryan. The district attorney represented to the court at the trial that he was unable to procure the attendance of Hamilton as a witness, for the reason that the latter could not be found. To establish the necessary foundation entitling him to read in evidence the testimony of Hamilton taken at the preliminary examination, the prosecutor called three witnesses. Mrs. Hamilton, wife of the desired witness, testified that on the Wednesday preceding the day of the trial (that being Tuesday) her husband had left for Mexico; that he told her he was going to Mexico, to which country he had contemplated going for about two weeks prior thereto; that she did not know positively where he then was, but was satisfied that he was in Mexico. It appeared, further, by the testimony of Arthur H. Aiken and Robert Mahel, process servers attached to the office of the district attorney, that a subpœna had been issued 25 days before the date of the trial for service upon Hamilton, but that no search had been made until a few days immediately before the trial to discover the whereabouts of the missing witness. It was found then that Hamilton had left his customary place of abode and had informed his wife that he was going to Mexico. Upon this evidence the trial court became satisfied that due diligence had been used in the effort to procure the attendance of the witness, and that he could not be found within the state.

It is provided by section 686 of the Penal Code that the testimony of a witness heard at the preliminary examination of a person charged with crime, and taken down by question and answer in the presence of the defendant, who has an opportunity to cross-examine the witness, may at the trial be read in evidence "upon its being satisfactorily shown to the court that he is dead or insane, or cannot with due diligence be found within the state." In the late case of People v. Lewandowski, 143 Cal. 574, 77 Pac. 467, where a contention similar to that urged here was made, the Supreme Court said: "The question, however, as to whether it is satisfactorily shown that such witness cannot with due diligence be found within the state, is a question of fact that is addressed to the trial court, to be determined by it from evidence introduced before it (People v. Plyler, 126 Cal. 379 [58 Pac. 904]), and with the determination of that question of fact by the trial court this court will not interfere, unless the evidence thereon is such as to satisfy the court that the trial court abused the discretion confided to it in holding that due diligence had been used, and that the witness could not be found. People v. Witty, 138 Cal. 576 [72 Pac. 177]; People v. Reilly, 106 Cal. 648 [40 Pac. 13]."

There was evidence tending to show that the witness Hamilton was, in fact, out of the state of California. There was the further evidence that some search had been made for him in the endeavor to secure service of a subpœna. The court determined that a sufficient foundation had been laid to entitle the testimony of the witness taken at the preliminary examination, as shown by the reporter's transcript, to be read in evidence. If there was any substantial evidence to support that conclusion, the ruling cannot be disturbed. Such evidence was before the court.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Patrick McGee was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and appeals. Affirmed.

Carl Lindsay, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., C. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., and James F. Brennan, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was charged by information with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon. He was found guilty as charged, and sentenced to imprisonment for the term of 18 months. He appeals from the judgment, and also from the orders denying his motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. His principal ground of appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict.

Briefly the evidence shows as follows: On December 20, 1908, at 2 o'clock in the morning, John P. Fennell, the complaining witness, John J. Sullivan, and Florence O'Neill were walking along Kearny street, in San Francisco, toward Market street, when the defendant called out to Fennell, "You fellow in the gray suit, I want to speak to you." The defendant, being an utter stranger to Fennell, was told so by him, and directed to go away. The Fennell party proceeded hurriedly along their way. O'Neill, who had stopped to say good-bye to some friends, was a short distance in the rear of his companions, and upon coming up to defendant said to him: "You don't know any of us. Go home, young man." Immediately defendant struck O'Neill, knocking him down. Thereupon, O'Neill having called for help, Fennell came to his assistance. In the meantime the defendant had backed from the sidewalk to the middle of the street, and was carrying his right hand by his side with "something in his hand." Fennell, after having advanced to within about 12 feet of the defendant, noticing this, "hesitated," and said, "Why did you hit that man?" whereupon, without any explanation, threat, or warning of any kind, defendant fired two shots from a pistol at Fennell, the second of which struck Fennell in the head. Fennell was unarmed. The defendant's version of the affair is that the Fennell party was being followed by a suspicious looking character, and, believing that he knew Fennell, he called out to him, intending to warn him and his companions of their danger, but upon discovering that he was not acquainted with Fennell, and that his good offices were resented, he concluded that he would mind his own business and go home; that after proceeding on his way for a block O'Neill stepped from behind a pile of structural material and engaged him in a fist fight; that presently Sullivan and Fennell came to the assistance of O'Neill; that during the altercation Fennell called him a vile name and reached toward his hip pocket, and at this point, fearing for his life, he drew his pistol and fired two shots, intending both to go into the air, the second one of which, however, accidentally hit Fennell.

Upon this evidence the jury has found the defendant guilty, and the trial judge, by denying defendant's motion for a new trial, has approved the verdict. The defendant, as before stated, asks us to reverse the case upon the ground that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. The mere statement of the facts of the case as testified to, it seems to us, is a complete answer to this contention. The defendant was roaming the streets of San Francisco at an early and unusual hour of the morning. With no plausible reason he accosted Fennell and his companions, and persisted in following them, and without provocation struck O'Neill, knocking him to the ground, and a few moments later shot and very seriously wounded the complaining witness, without any apparent necessity or justification therefor. The defendant is fortunate that his shot did not kill Fennell. From the record before us he might have been prosecuted for a more serious offense.

At all events, the question of his guilt or innocence was for the jury, and, the verdict being sustained by substantial evidence, it cannot be disturbed by this court, unless it is vitiated by the failure of the trial court to give the following instruction requested by defendant: "The court instructs you that if you find from the evidence that the defendant had no motive for the commission of the offense charged in the information, that the absence of a motive is a circumstance in favor of one accused, which must be added to the presumption of innocence, and which you should take into consideration in deliberating upon your verdict." In People v. Glaze, 139 Cal. 154, 72 Pac. 965, the refusal to give a similar instruction was upheld by the court, where it is said: "The Constitution declares that 'Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact.' Article 6, § 19. A statement to the jury that a failure to prove the existence of a motive impelling the defendant to commit the crime is a 'circumstance in favor of his innocence,' while perhaps a correct statement of the view to be taken by the jury of such failure of proof, is nevertheless an instruction with respect to a matter of fact. As such the court was not bound to give it." While the giving of this instruction would have been harmless, still the refusal of the court to give it was not error.

The judgment and orders are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

James Ward was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter & Pratt and Stephen L. Sullivan, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, P. J. The information charged defendant with the crime of embezzlement, the jury found him guilty, and his motion for a new trial was denied. From the judgment of conviction, and an order denying such new trial, defendant appeals.

The only contention presented is that the evidence in the record is insufficient to support the verdict. An examination of such record develops a decided conflict in the evidence. The jury, however, accepted as true the statements of the prosecuting witness, and the court, upon the motion for a new trial, justified this action upon the part of the jury. It is not the province of this court to disturb such conclusion, if any evidence in the record warrants the same.

We are further of opinion that an examination of the record establishes that defendant obtained possession of money and personal property belonging to the prosecuting witness under an agreement that the same should be held only as security for the faithful performance of certain duties connected with a contract of employment entered into between the parties; that thereafter, upon the termination of such employment, defendant refused to return the same or any part thereof, and appropriated such money and personal property to his own use. The crime of embezzlement, as defined by section 503 of the Penal Code, was thus made out. The verdict, in our opinion, was a righteous one, and should be sustained.

Judgment and order affirmed.
